(2) The property sought to be acquired by condemnation was the property of a public service corporation—the Consolidated Turnpike Company—and such property could not be taken by another company unless, after hearing all parties interested, the State Corporation Commission shall certify that a public necessity or that an essential public convenience shall so require, and shall give its permission thereto, and that there was no such hearing or permission.

(3) The petition did not allege that the land sought to be condemned was necessary for the corporation which the receivers were operating, nor did it allege that they were unable to agree with the owners.

(4) There was no plat or survey of the property sought to be acquired filed with the petition, as required by statute.

(5) The notice served and published did not describe the same property referred to in the petition of the receivers.

We think that the appellant is estopped from relying upon any of the grounds named for a reversal of the order complained of. It not only claims under the proceedings in which the receivers who instituted this proceeding were authorized to institute it, but after its purchase in that case, in order to prevent the appellees from subjecting the deed of trust property in the state court, as they clearly had the right to do, but for the condemnation proceedings, it relied upon those proceedings, and by means thereof procured the said injunction from the federal court. To permit the appellant afterwards, when the appellees were asserting their rights in the condemnation case, to deny that the receivers who brought that proceeding had authority to institute it, or that their petition instituting it was sufficient, would be in violation of the well-settled rule of law that a litigant will not be allowed in a subsequent judicial proceeding to take a position in conflict with a position taken by him in a former judicial proceeding, which latter position is to the prejudice of the adverse party, where the parties are the same and the same questions are involved. Tatum v. Ballard, 94 Va. 370, 28 S. E. 871; C. & O. Ry.

Co. v. Rison, 99 Va. 18, 32, 37 S. E. 320, and authorities cited; 16 Cyc. 799, 800.

After the injunction was granted restraining Taylor, trustee, and Depue from prosecuting their suit to subject the trust property to the payment of the debt secured by the trust deed, Depue notified the plaintiff in error that he would move for a confirmation of the commissioners' report in the condemnation proceeding, or so much thereof as fixed the compensation, etc., for the property at $57,200. In response to this notice the plaintiff in error appeared and moved the court to vacate and dismiss the condemnation proceeding. This motion was overruled by the court, and its action is the second error assigned.

This assignment of error is based upon the same grounds as is the first assignment of error, and for the same reasons the action of the trial court must be sustained.

The third error assigned is to the action of the court in holding that the appearance of the plaintiff in error was general, and not special.

An appearance for any other purpose than questioning the jurisdiction of the court—because there was no service of process, or the process was defective, or the service thereof was defective, or the action was commenced in the wrong county, or the like—is general, and not special, although accompanied by the claim that the appearance is only special. 3 Cyc. 502; 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. Pl. & Pr. 620, 625, 626.

When the plaintiff in error appeared and moved the court to vacate the proceedings had in the cause, and to dismiss it, it did so upon grounds which went to the sufficiency of the petition of the receivers. A motion to vacate proceedings in a cause, or to dismiss or discontinue it, because the plaintiff's pleading does not state a cause of action, is equivalent to or analogous to a demurrer, and amounts to a general appearance. See 3 Cyc. 506, 507; 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. Pl. & Pr. 635, 636; Albert v. Clarendon, etc., Co., 53 N. J. Eq. 623, 23 Atl. 8.

We are of opinion that the plaintiff's appearance was general, and that the trial court properly so decided.

One of the grounds upon which the plaintiff in error sought to have the cause dismissed was that the report of the commissioners assessing the compensation, etc., for the property had been filed more than three months without the amount of damages ascertained thereby having been paid to the party entitled to or into court.

By subsection 27, § 1105f, Code Va. 1904, it is provided that, "if in any such proceeding [condemnation] the amount or amounts ascertained by the commissioners as aforesaid be not paid to the party entitled thereto, or into court, within three months from the date of the filing of the report of the commissioners, the proceedings shall ipso facto be vacated and dismissed."

More than three months—indeed, nearly three years—had elapsed between the filing of the report of the commissioners and the motion of the plaintiff in error to vacate and dismiss, and the amount ascertained by the report had not been paid to the party entitled to or into court. Subsec. 27, § 1105f, Code Va. 1904, had been amended by an act approved March 15, 1906 (Acts 1906, pp. 452, 455), and was in force when said report was filed, though not in effect when this proceeding was instituted or the commissioners appointed. The act as amended is as follows: "If in any such proceeding the amount or amounts ascertained by the commissioners as aforesaid be not paid either to the party entitled thereto or into court, within three months from the date of the filing of the report of the commissioners, the proceedings shall, on motion of the defendant, be vacated and dismissed as to him, but not otherwise."

Whether or not the amendment was retroactive, and applied to condemnation proceedings commenced before the amendment was made, it is unnecessary to decide in determining this question; for it is clear, we think, that the plaintiff in error is estopped from claiming that the condemnation proceeding was ipso facto vacated and dismissed because the amount ascertained by the commissioners' report was not paid to the party entitled thereto or into court within three months after the report of the commissioners was filed, after alleging the pendency of the condemnation proceeding long after the expiration of the said three months and obtaining an injunction upon the ground of its pendency, restraining the defendants in error from subjecting the property sought to be condemned to the satisfaction of the debts secured by the deed of trust. The reasons why the plaintiff in error is estopped from denying the pendency of the proceeding are the same as those given in disposing of the first assignment of error, and need not be repeated.

By the order appointing the commissioners, they were directed, among other things, to ascertain and report the present value of the land to be taken with the present improvements thereon, and also its present value without such improvements. Their report on these questions for the property to be taken is as follows:

"If valued as of the date of this report, without improvements, $6,200 will be a just compensation.

For the land with improvements...	$ 7,200 00
For the steel rails.....	15,000 00
For the railroad ties.....	1,250 00
For the overhead construction....	2,500 00
For the machinery in the power house	25,000 00
For the buildings on tract No. 2..	5,000 00

Making a total of..... $57,200 00

—will be a just compensation."

The defendants in error moved the court to confirm that portion of the report which ascertained that $57,200 would be a just compensation for the land to be taken, and the court sustained that motion and entered an order requiring the plaintiff in error to deposit within three months the said sum of $57,200, with interest from the date of the order, in some national bank in the city of Norfolk, to the credit of the court, subject to its future order.

To this action of the court there are two assignments of error: First, that the court erred in confirming that portion of the report which took into consideration the value of the improvements placed upon the property by the plaintiff in error or its predecessor in title, instead of that portion of the report which ascertained the value of the property to be taken without considering the value of the improvements; and, second, in requiring the sum ascertained as just compensation to be deposited in bank to the credit of the court.

It is insisted by the appellees that the question involved in the first of these grounds of error has been settled in their favor by the cases of Newport News, etc., Co. v. Lake, 106 Va. 311, 54 S. E. 328, and Flanary v. Kane, 102 Va. 547, 46 S. E. 312, 681.

Neither of those cases present precisely the same question involved in this case. In Newport News, etc., Co. v. Lake the premises had been sold under the deed of trust, and the purchaser, who was the defendant in the condemnation proceedings, had recovered the premises in an action of ejectment after the improvements had been placed upon the premises by the railway company under authority of the grantor in the deed of trust. It was held that, the purchaser having recovered in the action of ejectment the premises in fee upon which the railway was laid in its then condition, and all the improvements upon it as a part thereof, the improvements, as well as the land, being his property, his compensation was not limited to the value of the land as it was before the improvements were placed upon it. The other case relied on was not a condemnation proceeding, but a suit to subject the premises upon which the improvements had been placed to the payment of judgments docketed at the time the railway company purchased the land and placed its improvements thereon. But, while it was a case in equity, it was held that the principle invoked, that he who asks equity must do equity, did not apply, since the plaintiffs in that case, in coming into equity to enforce their liens, were not asserting an equitable right or seeking equitable relief, and could not be put upon terms. They were asserting legal rights, and under the well-settled rules of the common law it was held that they were entitled to subject to the payment of their liens the land with the improvements thereon of which they were a part.

question, says: "The question now to be considered is whether in proceedings [condemnation] for this purpose the owner of the land is entitled to the value of the improvements which have been put upon it by the condemning party. If the entry has been made by the consent of the owner, express or implied, it is clear that the owner should not have the value of what has been put upon the land. He has let the condemning party in for the very purpose of making these improvements, and with the expectation that the right permanently to enjoy the land with the improvements would be acquired by agreement or otherwise. The cases all concur upon this point without much discussion of principles. * * * Such consent may be given by the life tenant, so as to bind the reversioner, or the mortgagor in possession, so as to bind the mortgagee."

In discussing the question, where the entry has been without the consent of the owner, he asserts that the same rule as to compensation obtains in most jurisdictions, and where it is held otherwise the decisions are placed upon the strict rules of the common law, that a structure placed upon land by a trespasser becomes a "part" of the realty and cannot be removed. But, he says, "the proceeding to ascertain a just compensation to be paid for property taken for public use is not a common-law proceeding. The principles to be applied are broad and liberal, and such as are just to both parties. It is a just compensation, no more and no less, which the Constitution requires to be paid. In determining what is just, the courts are not hampered by any hard and fast rules of the common law. As we have already shown, just compensation to the owner is an indemnity for the loss he sustains, irrespective of the general advantages and disadvantages which affect the community at large. Indemnity in the case supposed does not include the value of works prematurely placed upon the property. The owner has not lost the value of such works; but, if their value is given to him, it is so much in excess of his loss, which is something never contemplated by the Constitution."

So far as this statement applies in condemnation cases to entries made with the consent of the owner, it is sustained by the overwhelming weight of authority. See cases cited in notes to section 507 of Lewis, and in notes to Village of St. Johnsville v. Smith, 6 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 379, 382-384 (184 N. Y. 341, 77 N. E. 617, 5 L. R. A. [N. S.] 922).

In quoting what Lewis said, we do not wish to be understood as approving his statement so far as it applies to entries upon land without authority express or implied. As was said by the Court of Appeals of New York in the case last cited above, where the entry was without authority: "So far as actual intent is concerned, a personal trespasser who annexes a structure to another's freehold does not mean that it shall become the property of the landowner any more than does a trespassing railway company or municipality, which does the same thing in contemplation of acquiring the land at some future time by the exercise of the right of eminent domain. The law affixes consequences to the act, and not to the intent. It says to those who invoke the power of eminent domain, as well as to all others: "If you invade land without legal right, and place structures thereon, those structures belong to the landowner. There is no more hardship in applying the rule to the one class of trespassers than to the other. In both cases the application tends to prevent a wrong. Its operation in this state has been and will doubtless continue to be most salutary in constraining those municipal and other corporations which the state has authorized to exercise the power of eminent domain not to assume the possession of lands in advance of any right so to do, and thus practically nullify, during the period of wrongful possession, that provision of the Constitution which guarantees the citizen against being deprived of his property for public use without just compensation."

Where the possession of the party seeking to condemn is lawful, Lewis' statement, that in ascertaining just compensation the improvements placed upon the premises by it are not to be included, is not only sustained by the great weight of authority, but by the better reason. In a controversy between the landowner and the condemning party, the former cannot in justice claim the value of the land in its improved condition when the improvements were made with his consent. Neither can a mortgagee or deed of trust creditor. In granting permission to the condemning party to enter upon the premises and place his improvements upon them, the landowner has not prejudiced the mortgagee or trust creditor. It is not pretended that such act has lessened the security, but it is admitted that it has increased the value, and the claim of the deed of trust creditor is that he is entitled to have the benefit of this increase, not because in justice and equity he is entitled to it, but because under the strict rules of the common law all structures placed upon the property subject to his lien inure to his benefit.

We are of opinion that where a corporation, clothed with the power of eminent domain, lawfully enters into the possession of land for its purposes, and places improvements thereon, and afterwards institutes condemnation proceedings to cure a defective title, or to extinguish the lien of a deed of trust, it is not proper, in ascertaining "just compensation" for such land, to take into consideration the value of such improvements.

The commissioners in their report ascertained the value of the land as of the date of their report, without considering the improvements, at $6,200. This sum, we think, should have been fixed as the just compensation for the land taken, and that the trial court erred in not so holding.

The other ground upon which this assignment of error is based is the action of the court in requiring the plaintiff in error within three months to pay the sum ascertained as just compensation into some national bank in the city of Norfolk.

The Code (section 1105f, subsecs. 9 to 13) provides how payment is to be made for lands taken in condemnation proceedings. If the condemning company is not in possession when the report ascertaining a just compensation is confirmed, it can only acquire title to or the right of possession of the land so condemned by paying such sum into court or to the party entitled. If such company is in possession of the land when the report of the commissioners is confirmed, as it may be where there has been a prior report which was not confirmed, and the confirmed report increases the compensation over that ascertained by the former report, the condemning company has thereafter no right to the possession until full payment has been made into court or to the party entitled.

Mr. Lewis, in his work on Eminent Domain, in discussing the character of the judgment to be entered in condemnation cases, says: "If the statute is so far silent upon the subject as to leave the matter open for judicial construction, then the proper judgment to be entered will depend upon the following considerations: If possession has already been taken of the property, either by consent or otherwise, or if the property has already been taken by virtue of an instrument of appropriation, as it may be in some states, before the compensation is paid, then a personal judgment, with all its incidents, may properly be entered."

Our statute does not expressly provide for such a case as we are now considering. In neither of the classes of cases provided for, whether the condemning party is in or out of possession, is there any authority conferred upon the court to enter a personal judgment. The reason for this may be in the fact that, in the absence of statutory provisions on the subject, it is generally held that the effect of condemnation proceedings is simply to fix the price at which the party condemning can take the property sought, and that, even after confirmation of the report fixing such price, the purpose of taking such property may be abandoned, without incurring any liability to pay the damages awarded. See Lewis, § 656, and cases cited. Whatever be the reason of our lawmaking power for not authorizing a personal judgment in the class of cases provided for, we find no authority in the statute for entering a personal judgment in this case, and to do so would seem to be contrary to the principle upon which our statute was framed. Whatever be the effect of the amendment of March 15, 1906, heretofore quoted, as to the right of a party to abandon or discontinue condemnation proceedings instituted by it, it cannot affect this case; for it is well settled "that, although the words of a statute are broad enough in their literal extent to comprehend existing cases, they must be construed as applicable to cases that may thereafter arise, unless a contrary intention is unequivocally expressed therein." Campbell, etc., v. Nonparell, 75 Va. 291, 298; Price v. Harrison, 31 Grat. 114. There is nothing in that amendment which shows that it was intended to have any retroactive effect.

As to the remaining assignment of error, that the report of the commissioners is not in accord with the order and direction of the court in appointing them, it is sufficient to say that no such objection was made to the report in the lower court.

We are of opinion to reverse the judgment or order complained of, and to enter such judgment as the trial court ought to have entered.

Reversed.

COMMONWEALTH ex rel. NORTON BOARD OF TRADE, Inc., v. NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 9, 1910.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 9*)—REGULATION—CORPORATION COMMISSION—POWERS.

Const. § 156b (Code 1904, p. cclii), provides that the Corporation Commission shall have power to supervise and control all transportation companies doing business in the state in all matters relating to their public duties, correct abuses therein, and prescribe and enforce rates and rules and regulations, and shall require the establishment and maintenance of all such public service and conveniences as may be reasonable and just, etc. Held, that the power imposed on the commission referred to matters relating to the performance of public duties, and had no application to particular acts not based on a duty imposed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 10*)—REGULATION—UNION DEPOT FACILITIES.

Code 1904, § 7294c (4), provides that transportation companies shall afford reasonable facilities for the interchange of traffic between their respective lines, and for the forwarding and delivery of passengers and property to and from their several lines without discrimination, but that the section shall not require any such company to give the use of its track or terminal facilities to another company engaged in like business. Section 1313a (16) provides that the Corporation Commission shall have authority to require all corporations doing business within the state to discharge any public duty imposed on such corporations by the Constitution or by law. Held, that section 1313a (16) did not define or create any public duty to be performed by transportation companies, and did not, therefore, modify or restrict the operation of section 1294c (4), under which the Corporation Commission had no authority to compel railroads owning and operating a joint depot in a town to permit the use of such depot and its terminal tracks by another railroad company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 14-20; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 15*)—TERMINAL FACILITIES—UNION DEPOT.

Const. § 166 (Code 1904, p. cclxi), declaring that all railroad companies whose lines connect shall receive and transfer each other's passengers, freight, and loaded or empty cars without delay or discrimination, does not require railroads maintaining and using a union depot to permit its use by another railroad.

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 47*)—USE OF UNION DEPOT—CONDEMNATION OF RIGHT.

Since the exercise of the power of eminent domain is against common right and cannot be implied or inferred, there being no provision in the Virginia law for the ascertainment of the compensation payable to railroad companies owning a union depot by another railroad company desiring to use the same, such right cannot be obtained by condemnation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 107, 111; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

Appeal from Corporation Commission.

Petition by the Commonwealth, on relation of the Norton Board of Trade, Incorporated, against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, to compel the Norfolk & Western Railway Company and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to permit the Interstate Railroad Company to use their common depot in the town of Norton. From an order of the Corporation Commission denying such relief, petitioner appeals. Affirmed, on the opinion of the chairman of the commission.

Irvine & Morrison, for appellant. L. H. Cocke, C. T. Duncan, H. L. Stone, and A. S. Brandeis, for appellees.

KEITH, P. The opinion of the chairman of the Corporation Commission, filed in this case, so fully and satisfactorily disposes of all the questions involved that we cannot do better than to adopt it as the opinion of this court, with slight verbal changes.

"The petitioner, suing on behalf of itself and all other citizens of the town of Norton, alleges: That Norton is the western terminus of the Clinch Valley Division of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, the eastern terminus of the Cumberland Valley Division of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, and the eastern terminus of the Interstate Railroad Company, and that Norton is also the terminus of two other local roads, namely, the Wise Terminal Company and Virginia & Kentucky Railway Company; that the only practicable means of connection between the eastern and western portions of the county of Wise is through the town of Norton, and that owing to the topography of the country all through travel and traffic must pass through the said town; that the Norfolk & Western Railway Company and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, jointly, have railroad yards and a passenger and freight depot in the town of Norton; that the Virginia & Kentucky Railroad Company and the Wise Terminal Company have, under some arrangement, the use for their purposes of said railroad yards and depot; that all of these railroads, except the Interstate, have been entering Norton and doing business there for a number of years; that the Interstate, on the other hand, is at this time completing the extension of its road from Appalachia to Norton; that it is about ready to begin a regular passenger and freight business; that it parallels the Louisville & Nashville Railroad from Appalachia to Norton, a distance of about 10 miles, and enters the town through a narrow valley at the west end of Norton at the same point at which the Louisville & Nashville Railroad enters; that the Interstate Railroad Company has acquired a location for its freight yard and for a freight and passenger station in the west end of the town, and will shortly establish its freight and passenger station at said point, unless otherwise directed by this commission; that the distance between the said points is somewhat less than a mile; that the present station of the Norfolk & Western Railway and Louisville & Nashville Railroad is nearly opposite the business center of the town, while the proposed location of the Interstate Railroad station is at the extreme western end of the town at a very inconvenient place; that such joint station is ample in size to accommodate the business of the Interstate Railroad Company, in addition to accommodating the business of the other railroads now using it; that it is highly important to the commercial interests and to the convenience of the people of Norton and of Wise county that there should be one station for all of the railroads at the town, and that the object of the petition is to require the Interstate Railroad Company to use the present freight and passenger depot of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company for its freight and passenger business, and to require the Norfolk & Western Railway and the Louisville & Nashville to permit the said Interstate Railroad Company to use their said freight and passenger depot, upon such terms as may be equitable. There are other allegations showing the desirability of a single station at the said town.

"The prayer of the petition is that this commission shall enter an order requiring the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and the Norfolk & Western Railway Company to grant to the Interstate Railroad Company the right, upon such fair and equitable terms as may be prescribed by the commission, to use in common with themselves their present Norton depot for passenger and freight business, and to require the said Interstate Railroad Company to adopt and use the said depot in common with the Norfolk & Western Railway Company and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, upon such just and equitable terms as may be prescribed by this commission.

"The Interstate Railroad Company has not answered the petition, and presumably is anxious that the prayer of the petition shall be granted. The Norfolk & Western Railway Company and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company have each demurred to the petition, claiming that it appears upon the face of the complaint that the Virginia Constitution and statutes give this commission no jurisdiction to grant the relief prayed for; that to grant such relief would be to deprive the defendants of their property without due process of law, and therefore be a violation of section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution of Virginia [Code 1904, p. ccx] and of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"Sections 156b and 166 of the Constitution of Virginia [Code 1904, pp. cclii, cclxi], and section 1313a (16), Pollard's Code of Virginia, are relied upon by the petitioner to give the commission authority to grant the relief asked for, and it is claimed that such action will not violate any provision either of the state or federal Constitution, and that to deny the relief will be to violate section 156b and section 166 of the Constitution of Virginia, requiring the commission to make and enforce such regulation as may be necessary to prevent injustice or unreasonable discrimination by any transportation company in favor of or against any person, locality, community, or any connecting line.

"These being the issues, it becomes necessary to examine the sections of the Constitution and the statutes applicable thereto.

"The portion of section 156b relied upon by the petitioner is in these words: 'The commission shall have the power, and be charged with the duty, of supervising, regulating and controlling all transportation and transmission companies doing business in this state, in all matters relating to the performance of their public duties and their charges therefor, and of correcting abuses therein by such companies; and to that end the commission shall, from time to time, prescribe and enforce against such companies, in the manner hereinafter authorized, such rates, charges, classifications of traffic, and rules and regulations, and shall require them to establish and maintain all such public service, facilities and conveniences as may be reasonable and just, which said rates, charges, classifications, rules, regulations, and requirements the commission may, from time to time, alter or amend.'

"The power given and the duty imposed upon the commission by this clause refer to all matters relating to the performance of the public duties of the transportation and transmission companies, and it is 'to that end,' to use the words of the Constitution, that the commission is given authority to require the establishment and maintenance of 'all such public service, and facilities and conveniences as may be reasonable and just.' Therefore, unless the Norfolk & Western Railway Company and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, as the owners of the joint station at Norton, are required in the performance of their public duties to allow the Interstate Railroad Company to enter and share in such use, then the first clause above quoted does not confer the authority claimed, because the power and duty of the commission are both limited to matters relating to the public duties of such companies. So, also, as to the discrimination which is forbidden. If there is no duty imposed as to the particular act, the carrier is free to make such contracts as its interests may require. First I. C. C. Act (Drinker) pp. 214-333; Consolidated Forwarding Co. v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 9 Interst. Com. R. 206e; Re Transportation of Fruit, 10 Interst. Com. R. 360; United States v. Delaware, L. & W. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 40 Fed. 101; Worcester Car Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 3 Interst. Com. R. 577; Kentucky R. Commission v. L. & N. R. Co., 10 Interst. Com. R. 173; Butchers', etc., Co. v. L. & N. R. Co., 67 Fed. 35, 14 C. C. A. 290; Central Stockyards Co. v. L. & N. R. Co., 118 Fed. 113, 55 C. C. A. 63, 63 L. R. A. 213; Id., 192 U. S. 568, 24 Sup. Ct. 339, 48 L. Ed. 565; Alex. Bay Co. v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. Co., 18 App. Div. 527, 45 N. Y. Supp. 1091.

"The Norfolk & Western Railway Company certainly owes to its patrons, the general public, desiring its services, all proper station facilities and conveniences. The same duty is incumbent upon the Interstate Railroad Company as to its patrons; but can it be said that the Norfolk & Western should supply station facilities for the patrons of the Interstate? If so, there must be a corresponding duty on the Interstate to furnish station facilities for the Norfolk & Western. We think that neither owes such a duty to the other, or to the patrons of the other. There are certain important duties, however, which railroad companies owe to each other, which in the interest of the general public are imposed by statute in Virginia.

"Section 4 of chapter 3 of the act concerning public service corporations (Pollard's Code, § 1294c (4)) reads thus: 'All transportation companies shall, according to their respective powers and with due regard to the exigencies of their other traffic, afford all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities for the interchange of traffic between their respective lines, and for receiving, forwarding and delivering of passengers and property to and from their several lines, and those connecting therewith, and shall not discriminate in their rates and charges between such connecting lines; but this shall not be construed as requiring any such company to establish or maintain unremunerative train service, or to give the use of its track or terminal facilities to another company engaged in a like business.'

"The commission's power to prescribe rates under section 156b of the Constitution is declared to be 'paramount,' but its authority to prescribe any other rules, regulations or requirements for corporations or other persons, shall be subject to the superior authority of the General Assembly to legislate thereon by general laws.' Unless, therefore, the Legislature has exceeded its constitutional authority, the proviso in the concluding clause of the statute above quoted—clause 4, § 1294c—that it shall not be construed as requiring a company 'to give the use of its track or terminal facilities to another company engaged in a like business,' is conclusive of this case. The superior authority of the General Assembly having been exercised by the enactment of this statute, this commission has no authority to require the Norfolk & Western Railway Company and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to grant to the Interstate Railroad Company the use of their track and terminal facilities at Norton. The decisive force and effect of this statute seems to have been fully realized, for in the brief of the learned counsel for the petitioner it is claimed that section 1294c (4) must be construed in connection with section 1313a (16), that when so construed it does not forbid the relief asked for, and that, even if these sections be repugnant, section 1294c (4) cannot operate, because it conflicts with section 166 of the Constitution.

"The language of section 1313a (16), which is thus relied upon, is as follows: 'The commission shall have power and authority to require, by its rules, regulations, and requirements, all corporations chartered under the laws of this state, and all foreign corporations doing business in this state, to perform and discharge any public duty or requirement imposed upon such corporations by the Constitution or by law.'

"It is manifest, however, that this language does not define or create any public duty to be performed by transportation companies, but simply affirms the constitutional power of the commission to require corporations doing business in this state to perform all public duties or requirements imposed upon such corporations by the Constitution or by law; so that we cannot agree that it aids in the construction of section 1294c (4), or illumines its meaning in any respect whatever.

"Section 166 of the Constitution is relied on to show that this commission has the power to require the Norfolk & Western Railway Company and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to grant the use of its track and terminal facilities to the Interstate Railroad Company, notwithstanding the provision contained in section 1294c (4).

"Section 166 is as follows: 'All railroad companies whose lines of railroad connect, shall receive and transfer each others passengers, freight and loaded or empty cars without delay or discrimination.'

"We think that a careful reading and comparison of the various clauses quoted demonstrates the fallacy of the contention that there is any such conflict as is contended for. We find it impossible to read into section 166 of the Constitution any requirement that a railroad company is bound to share its tracks and station buildings, acquired with its own means and to enable it to better discharge its own public duties, with a competing railroad, because bound under that section to receive and transfer passengers, freight, and cars, without delay or discrimination from connecting railroads.

"All the public duties of transportation companies must be performed, but when we inquire as to what is the public duty of one transportation company to another with reference to its tracks and terminal facilities, the answer is found in section 1294c (4), which, fairly construed, prohibits this commission from requiring such company to grant the use of its track or terminal facilities to another company engaged in a like business.

"Section 1294c (4) corresponds very closely with section 3, cl. 2, of the interstate commerce act (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 380 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3155]), and it is a well-settled principle of construction that, when one sovereignty enacts a statute similar to one previously in force in another jurisdiction, the latter enactment includes such construction as the courts have previously placed upon the statute thus copied, and this section 3, cl. 2, of the act to regulate commerce has already received in the courts of the United States the construction which is here put upon it. Little Rock Railroad v. St. L. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 59 Fed. 400; same case, 63 Fed. 775, 11 C. C. A. 417, 26 L. R. A. 192; Oregon Short Line v. Northern Pacific, 61 Fed. 158, 9 C. C. A. 409; same case (C. C.) 51 Fed. 465; Ky. & I. Bridge Co. v. L. & N. R. Co. (C. C.) 37 Fed. 567, 2 L. R. A. 239; L. & N. R. Co. v. Central Stock Yards Co., 212 U. S. 132, 29 Sup. Ct. 246, 53 L. Ed. 441.

"Another serious difficulty about requiring the Norfolk & Western Railway Company and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to grant to the Interstate Railroad Company the right to use its tracks and station, to use the language of the petition, 'upon such fair and equitable terms as may be prescribed by the commission,' is that the Virginia law has made no provision for the ascertainment of the compensation which would be due to the defendant companies by the Interstate Railroad Company for the joint use of its property. The exercise of the power of eminent domain being against common right, it cannot be implied or inferred, but must be given in express terms or by necessary implication, and the Legislature of Virginia has not granted the power to one transportation company to condemn the right to jointly use the tracks and terminal facilities of another transportation company. In the last case referred to, the Supreme Court of the United States declared that the lack in the section of the Kentucky Constitution of adequate provisions for compensation for property could not be supplied by inserting them in the judgments of the court or otherwise. 'The law itself,' said the court, 'must save the party's rights, and not leave them to the discretion of the court as such.'

"From the allegations of the petition there appear to be good reasons for supposing that the public at Norton would be greatly accommodated by allowing the Interstate Railroad Company to enter and share with the other railroads at Norton in the use of the ample station facilities alleged to be there; but, in order to allow it to do so, there should be a contract between the corporations involved, defining the terms and conditions upon which such joint use is to be enjoyed, and this commission is without authority to make such a contract for the parties, and the laws of Virginia have made no provision for the condemnation of such a joint use of station facilities.

"As we have concluded that under the Constitution and laws of Virginia we have no authority to grant the prayer of the petition, we deem it unnecessary to discuss or decide whether to grant such prayer would be to violate the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States."

For the foregoing reasons, we are of opinion that the final order of the Corporation Commission should be affirmed.

Affirmed.

PICKENS et al. v. STOUT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 3, 1910. Rehearing Denied
June 11, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PARTITION (§ 17*)—TITLE—OUSTER BETWEEN TENANTS IN COMMON.

The defense of an ouster between tenants in common, effected by the possession of a stranger under a contract of purchase from one of the co-tenants, does not present a question of title of which a court of equity cannot take cognizance on a bill for partition of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 53-59; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

2. ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 25*)—BY MARRIED WOMAN.

A married woman cannot divest herself of legal or equitable title to land, otherwise than by a deed or contract, acknowledged in the manner prescribed by the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Acknowledgment, Cent. Dig. § 133; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*)—PROCEEDINGS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

To sustain a demand in equity for specific performance of an oral contract of purchase of land, the evidence must be clear, full, and free from suspicion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 388; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

4. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 31*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—CONTRACT FOR PURCHASE OF LAND—COMPLETENESS.

To be enforceable in equity, a contract of purchase of land must be complete, fixing the price and terms as well as the identity of the land.

5. JOINT TENANCY (§ 9*)—TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 14*)—ADVERSE POSSESSION—OUSTER BETWEEN CO-TENANTS.

An ouster between joint tenants, tenants in common, or coparceners may be effected by open, notorious, and exclusive possession of the land by a stranger, under a deed or an executory contract of sale, executed by one of the co-tenants to such stranger, purporting to convey or sell the whole thereof to the latter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Joint Tenancy, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 9; * Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 30-41; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

6. JOINT TENANCY (§ 9*)—TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 14*)—ADVERSE POSSESSION—OUSTER BETWEEN CO-TENANTS.

Mere execution and delivery of such deed or contract is not of itself sufficient to work an ouster. To it there must be added express actual notice of the adverse claim and possession, or open, notorious, exclusive, and hostile possession of the land by the grantee or vendee of which the true owner in co-tenancy must take notice, and inquire by what right such dominion is exercised.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Joint Tenancy, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 9; * Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 30-41; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

7. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 43*)—POSSESSION OF TENANT.

If, when such vendee secures his deed or contract, a tenant is in possession of the land, holding under the true owners, and continues to remain thereon, under an agreement of attornment to the purchaser, of which any true owner has no notice, the possession of the vendee by such tenant is not adverse to such owner; but his possession becomes adverse from the date of the removal of such tenant from the land, if he himself openly uses it or substitutes new tenants thereon.

8. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 43*)—POSSESSION OF TENANT.

In such case, the ouster is effected by the combined action of the vendor and vendee; but, in law, the vendor may be regarded as the real actor and the title under which the estate was held in common as his color of title, of which the vendee may avail himself as a claimant under it.

9. PARTITION (§ 63*) — TITLE IN COMMON SOURCE—PRESUMPTION.

When all the parties to a suit for partition claim title from a common source, title in such common source is conclusively presumed for the purposes of the suit, though no deed or other muniment of such title has been introduced as evidence or is known to exist.

10. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 76*)—COMPUTATION OF PERIOD — DISABILITIES — INFANCY.

The running of the statute of limitations against a person is not interrupted by his death, and continues to run against his heirs, though they be infants, and, in such case, the heirs are not within the saving clause of said statute.

11. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 195*)—COMPUTATION OF PERIOD — DISABILITIES — INFANCY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The disability of infancy at the date of the accrual of a right of action must be shown by the party claiming the benefit thereof. To prevent the bar of the statute of limitations, an infant must show that the right of action accrued to him, while he was under such disability, and, therefore, that it did not begin to run against his ancestor, if he claims the property in controversy by inheritance.

12. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 70*)—COMPUTATION OF PERIOD — DISABILITIES — INFANCY—CO-TENANTS.

The disability of infancy on the part of one or more tenants in common or coparceners does not avail their co-tenants, who, though once under the like disability, have failed to sue for the recovery of their interests in the land within five years after the attainment of their respective majorities. Each is barred by the lapse of said period.

13. PARTITION (§ 32*)—DISCLAIMER OF CO-TENANT—EFFECT ON SUBSEQUENT PARTITION.

A disclaimer, filed by an heir to an estate, in a suit for partition of the real estate of the ancestor, acknowledging advancements to the extent of his full share of the estate in the lifetime of the latter, followed by a voluntary partition of a portion of the land in which those participating in it apportioned, assumed, and paid indebtedness of the estate, precludes such heir and his assigns from participation in a subsequent partition of the residue of the lands.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 83; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

14. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*) — ORAL CONTRACT FOR PURCHASE OF LAND—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held too uncertain and indefinite to warrant specific enforcement of an oral agreement for purchase of land.

15. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 1*)—COLOR OF TITLE—NATURE.

Color of title is always an element of defense and not a weapon of offense, and without possession or right of possession no person can invoke it, for of itself it confers no title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

Williams, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lewis County.

Bill by Celia T. Pickens and others against Benjamin B. Stout and others. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded.

Melvin G. Sperry, for appellants. W. E. Haymond, for appellees Krenn. W. W. Brannon, for appellee B. B. Stout. A. B. Fleming, Charles Powell, and Kemble White, for appellee South Penn Oil Co.

POFFENBARGER, J. A bill for partition filed in the circuit court of Lewis county, by Celia T. Pickens and others, heirs of Mary Martha Jarvis, deceased, to which Albert R. Bond and others, heirs of Chas. B. Bond, deceased, were defendants, likewise claiming right to partition, by proper pleadings, was dismissed, on final hearing, in so far as it seeks partition, and the heirs aforesaid have appealed.

The land involved had originally belonged to James M. Stout, the father of Mrs. Jarvis and Mrs. Bond, and consisted of about 400 acres. James M. Stout died in 1879, seised and possessed of other lands situated in Harrison county. His wife and seven children, Benjamin B. Stout, Elmer H. Stout, Mary Martha Jarvis, Sue J. Bond, Elizabeth C. Ward, and James F. Stout survived him. The widow has since died. Soon after the death of James M. Stout, a suit in equity was instituted in Harrison county for the partition of his lands; the bill setting forth, as belonging to the estate, the lands in Lewis county as well as those in Harrison. No decree of partition was made in that suit. The estate was liable to some indebtedness which the personal property was insufficient to pay, and in 1883 the Harrison county lands were partitioned by agreement, which agreement was executed by conveyances. The cause was, however, referred to a commissioner, who reported an indebtedness to the administrator, B. B. Stout, one of the heirs, and this indebtedness was apportioned among and assumed by the heirs in the partition; each portion being charged upon the lands conveyed. In that suit, Elmer H. Stout filed a paper in which he represented that he had received from his father, by way of advancement, his full share of the estate, and did not claim any interest therein. Accordingly, he took no part in the partition. The agreement was made among the other six heirs. This did not include the lands in Lewis county. Over these, B. B. Stout exercised control and oversight, with the consent of the other heirs, receiving the rents, issues, and profits and paying the taxes, in so far as they were paid, until 1886. In that year, he sold one portion of the land, containing 245.5 acres, to Joseph Krenn, and the residue thereof, containing 150 acres, to John Krenn, executing to each of them a title bond, which, though not acknowledged for record, was recorded in the clerk's office of the county court, April 19, 1896, the date on which they were executed. These lands were returned delinquent for nonpayment of the taxes thereon for the year 1884 and sold in the year 1885 for such delinquency, B. B. Stout becoming the purchaser, but he took no deed under this purchase until 1893.

Soon after their purchase, the Krenns took possession of the land. On the 25th day of May, 1893, Stout obtained a tax deed under his purchase. On the 3d day of May, 1894, he executed deeds to the Krenns. In 1898 the Krenns leased the land for oil and gas purposes to the South Penn Oil Company. That company has developed the property and found it to be productive of both oil and gas in large quantities. This bill was filed at January rules, 1901, and all interested persons were made parties.

B. B. Stout defends under his purchase at the sale for nonpayment of taxes. He has also procured deeds for all of the interests except that of the Jarvis heirs and a one-half interest, which was conveyed by Benton Stout, one of the heirs, to Chas. B. Bond and Taylor Ward. Ward conveyed his half of the Benton Stout interest to B. B. Stout. Said B. B. Stout claims also to have purchased from Mrs. Jarvis, in her lifetime, and C. B. Bond, in his lifetime, all of their interests, by verbal contracts. The Krenns and the South Penn Oil Company predicate their defense upon the theory of adverse possession, as well as title acquired from Stout.

Demurrers to the bill were properly overruled. Whatever the title of James M. Stout may have been, B. B. Stout claimed under him and along with his coheirs and could not allow the land to become delinquent and purchase it to their prejudice. He was under a duty to pay the taxes. This being true, it is immaterial whether the long delay in obtaining a deed under his purchase rendered it invalid or not. As all the parties must necessarily claim under the same title, all questions of title are cognizable in a suit for partition. There is no strange, adverse title involved, as color or otherwise, unless it be the deeds made in 1893 and 1894, and the period of limitation since their date has not elapsed. As to whether the title bonds, made in 1886, are color of title, or there has been sufficient possession under them, will be deferred for the present.

The decree does not expressly state the ground upon which relief was denied. It dismisses the bill, declaring the Krenns have perfect and indefeasible right and title to the land, setting forth the facts relating to the execution and recordation of said title bonds, but admitting that they were not entitled to be recorded. On the failure of the court to say in its decree whether or not the claims of purchase of the Jarvis and Bond interests, set up by B. B. Stout in his answer, praying specific performance of the alleged contract, by way of affirmative relief, and to dismiss said answers, counsel for the appellees base the contention that the court did not find adversely on these claims of purchase, but there is incorporated in one of the briefs for the appellants what purports to be an opinion, delivered by the trial court, in which these claims are overthrown. The whole decree is here for review, and, if it shall appear that the claim of title by adverse possession cannot be sustained, it will be necessary to inquire whether the decree can stand upon title by purchase. If title in the Krenns can be made out on either theory, the decree will be affirmed, and it cannot be reversed unless both theories fail.

As there is no claim of purchase from Mrs. Jarvis otherwise than by a verbal contract, it is impossible that she could thus have parted with title to her land prior to the 15th day of September, 1887, for, until that time, she was a married woman, and therefore incapable of divesting herself of title to real estate otherwise than by a written instrument, acknowledged in the manner prescribed by the statute. Simpson v. Belcher, 61 W. Va. 157, 56 S. E. 211; Amick v. Ellis, 53 W. Va. 421, 44 S. E. 257; Rosenour v. Rosenour, 47 W. Va. 554, 35 S. E. 918; Moore v. Ligon, 30 W. Va. 146, 3 S. E. 572; Moore v. Ligon, 22 W. Va. 292. On the 15th day of September, 1887, she procured an absolute divorce from her husband, and two months later, lacking one day, November 14, 1887, died of consumption, at her home in Harrison county, on the tract of land allotted to her in the partition of the Harrison county lands. There is much evidence tending to show that she was in a very feeble condition during the whole of this period and never away from her home, but once. Many witnesses say she made a trip on horseback to Randolph county in 1887, for the purpose of visiting relatives, and returned in about two weeks. Shortly after her return, the disease of which she was suffering had made such progress, and she had become so feeble, that she was soon confined to her home. Mrs. McDonald says she went about the middle of August, was gone about two weeks, and, in about a week afterwards, was confined to her bed. Much of the evidence of purchase consists of oral admissions and declarations, said to have been made by Mrs. Jarvis. The greater number of the witnesses who testified to these admissions are members of B. B. Stout's own family, his wife and children. Mrs. Stout and her children say Mrs. Jarvis came to their house after her return from the visit to Randolph county, and some of them say she came for money due her on account of her Fink creek lands, and that, on this occasion, she said she had procured her divorce. Mrs. Stout says she got $20, for which she gave a receipt, signing her name, Mary M. Stout, which receipt has been lost and cannot be found. Some of these witnesses place this visit to B. B. Stout as late as three weeks before her death. Mrs. Stout also thinks Mrs. Jarvis returned from her visit to Randolph county about the middle of October. Other witnesses whom she visited on that trip, as well as her daughters and neighbors, say it was made in August. W. F. Stout and Mrs. E. H. Stout not only say the visit was made in August, but that Mrs. Jarvis then said she had sold her Fink creek land. That Mrs. Jarvis even went to B. B. Stout's after her return from Randolph county is denied by her daughter, Mrs. Pickens, who says she never left her home but once after her return from Randolph county and, on that occasion, visited her sister, Mrs. Bond, and her uncle, Henry Bassel. This is confirmed by Mrs. Bond, who says Mrs. Jarvis was never away from home afterward, and she fixes the time as the first or second week in September. Corroboration of the testimony of Mrs. Stout and her children is sought in the evidence of one George Murphy, who says Mrs. Jarvis owed him for work, and, after her return from Randolph county, went to B. B. Stout to obtain the money with which to pay him. He is flatly contradicted by Mrs. Pickens and Mrs. Currence, who say he never did any work for their mother and was never on her place. He does not fix the exact date of this alleged transaction, and it may have occurred, if at all, before Mrs. Jarvis obtained her divorce. Confirmation of the claim of purchase and corroboration of the witnesses who testified to these admissions is sought in the will of Mrs. Jarvis, made just a few days before her death. By this instrument, she gave her farm in Harrison county to her daughters, Cella and Louise. It was then subject to the lien for the money, charged upon it in the partition. The will contained this provision, respecting the farm and her interest in other lands: "I direct that any money that may be payable to me from the sale of land belonging to the estate of my father be applied in payment of the amount charged upon my land on Brushy Fork creek whereon I now reside under the deed of partition between the heirs and my said father." No other reference to the Fink creek land is found in the will. There is no direction to sell the same. It is said this provision in the will impliedly admits a previous sale of it. We think this clause is susceptible of a different interpretation. It may as well be assumed that the testatrix referred to the future or contemplated sale as a past sale. The expression is, to say the least, equivocal and lacks clearness and positiveness. It does not necessarily say the lands had been sold. It may well be assumed that, if the sale had been made to B. B. Stout, the reference would not have been made to the land, but to money due her from Stout. There is no better foundation in the clause for the view that a sale had been made than for the opposite view that the land still belonged to her father's estate. We do not think this provision in the will is an admission of the sale of the land. If it be admitted that Mrs. Jarvis made demands upon her brother for money before her death, there are circumstances in evidence affording a basis for the view that he was indebted to her. Some years before her death, he had verbally purchased her Harrison county land, and, under that contract, had possession of it for more than a year. On account of the refusal of Mrs. Jarvis' husband to join in a deed conveying the land to him, Stout abandoned the purchase and yielded possession of the land. About this time, he received some cattle from her.

Taken all together, we think this evidence of purchase is too uncertain and indefinite to sustain the claim. It is uncertain and contradictory as to time and is altogether silent as to the price and terms. No doubt B. B. Stout expected to buy it, and likely Mrs. Jarvis looked upon him as a prospective purchaser. There may have been some loose conversation on the subject, as there seems to have been between B. B. Stout and some of the other heirs; but the evidence falls short of the establishment of a contract of sale, fixing the price and terms and the execution of a written contract or memorandum, and there was no change of possession within the lifetime of Mrs. Jarvis, of which she had any notice, disclosed by the evidence. To sustain a bill for specific performance of an oral contract of purchase, the evidence must be clear, full, and free from suspicion. Harris v. Elliott, 45 W. Va. 245, 32 S. E. 176; Gillaspie v. James, 48 W. Va. 284, 37 S. E. 598; Ensminger v. Peterson, 53 W. Va. 324, 44 S. E. 218; Westfall v. Cottrills, 24 W. Va. 763; Mathews v. Jarrett, 20 W. Va. 415; Blankenship v. Spencer, 31 W. Va. 510, 7 S. E. 423. It must also disclose the price to be paid; this being an essential element of the contract.

The evidence of the purchase of the Bond interest consists, for the most part, of a memorandum, made on a note for $140, executed by Bond to Stout, which memorandum A. J. Sullivan says accords with an agreement made in his presence, and the testimony of James F. Stout to the effect that a deed had been sent to him for joint execution by himself and Bond, bearing the signature of Bond, which transaction he thinks occurred about 1882 or 1884. The memorandum on the note reads as follows: "It is agreed the above note shall be payment on the Lewis county land on Fink's creek. September, 1885." This is not signed by Bond, and the note, with the memorandum on it, remains in the hands of B. B. Stout. Some other witnesses say Bond admitted to them his sale of the land to Stout. On the contrary, there is testimony to admissions on the part of B. B. Stout that he had not purchased of Bond, and James F. Stout is flatly contradicted in words and by evidence of inconsistent circumstances. That the note was never surrendered is another contradictory fact. Here, again, there is no evidence showing what price was to be paid. We do not think the evidence measures up to the requirement of the rule governing the proof of a parol contract for the sale of land.

A great deal of space in the briefs is devoted to discussion of the question whether the title bonds executed by B. B. Stout constitute color of title. On the one hand, they are regarded as having the same effect as deeds. On the other hand, they are denied such effect, and the Krenns in possession under them are treated as tenants in common with the heirs of Mrs. Jarvis and the heirs of C. B. Bond. If they could be treated as deeds, void as to the interests of the Jarvis and Bond heirs and constituting only color of title as to these interests, the mere execution and delivery thereof would not constitute an ouster and put the statute of limitations into operation. The statute does not begin to run until after possession has been taken under such a deed. Parker v. Brast, 45 W. Va. 399, 32 S. E. 269; McNeeley v. Oil Co., 52 W. Va. 618, 638, 44 S. E. 503, 62 L. R. A. 562; Hannon v. Hannah, 9 Grat. (Va.) 146; Freeman on Co-Ten. § 226.

Another important principle, the application of which must be tested by the evidence in the case, is that the statute of limitations did not run against the heirs of Mrs. Jarvis and C. B. Bond, unless there was an ouster before the respective deaths of these ancestors. In other words, if there was an ouster of C. B. Bond, in his lifetime, the statute began to run against him and continued to do so against the heirs after his death; and, if it was put into operation against Mrs. Jarvis, before she died, her death did not interrupt or stop it. On the contrary, if the act of ouster occurred after these parties died, the statute did not begin to run against such of their heirs as were infants, or, if it did, their right of action was not taken away or barred, until the lapse of five years after the attainment of their majorities. Their rights of action were saved by section 3 of chapter 104 of the Code. Rowan v. Chenoweth, 49 W. Va. 287, 33 S. E. 544, 87 Am. St. Rep. 796; Mynes v. Mynes, 47 W. Va. 681, 35 S. E. 935; Jones v. Lemon, 26 W. Va. 629, 635; Talbott v. Woodford, 48 W. Va. 449, 37 S. E. 580.

B. B. Stout never actually resided on the Lewis county land. Before the death of James M. Stout, it was occupied by M. C. Gum, his tenant, but he had left it before said Stout died. Afterwards, about the year 1888, as nearly as he can recollect, he went back on the land at the instance of one Shackelford, who claimed to act for B. B. Stout. Whether Shackelford had any authority or not is immaterial, since B. B. Stout afterward recognized Gum as his tenant, by accepting payment from him for the use of the land in labor, performed in cleaning up a portion of the land. Gum says: "I done the job of cleaning up for B. B. Stout as I told you a while ago. * * * I cleaned up for what I took off of it." In response to a question as to whether B. B. Stout exercised authority over him while on the premises, he said: "Well, he claimed that he had right to, but didn't bother anything about it until the last spring I was there. That was when he sold to Joseph Krenn." Gum staid on the land until February, 1888, some months after the death of Mrs. Jarvis. He says Krenn gave him charge of it under him after he purchased it in April, 1888. Neither Joseph Krenn nor John Krenn moved upon the land or put any other tenant upon it within the lifetime of Mrs. Jarvis, so far as the testimony shows. John Krenn says he put some cattle on the grass land and fixed up the fences within a few weeks after he bought, he thinks, but is unable to say just how long afterwards. He says Charles Shaner put part of the land in corn, as his tenant, the second summer after he bought it, and that said Shaner and his mother lived on the land for nearly two years. In response to a question as to whether he had had possession from the date of his purchase, he said: "This family that was living on it held possession for the summer of the part they had in wheat, and then after that no one had possession except when I let them under lease for rent." There may be doubt as to what family he refers to, but there can be none about the fact that the visible possession was not changed at the date of the purchase. If he refers to Shaner as the party living on it at the time, he still lived on it the second summer after the purchase, according to his own testimony, and no visible change is mentioned as having occurred, until after the death of Mrs. Jarvis. Joseph Krenn admits that M. C. Gum was on the land at the time of his purchase, but says he entered into possession immediately after the date of the title bond. In response to this question, "State if you can the names of the tenants besides yourself who occupied this land at the time of your possession," he said: "M. C. Gum, John Leseburg, and I let one field to a man William Buckhannon and another field to Jacob Starcher." He does not say in what year or years Leseburg, Buckhannon, and Starcher were tenants, and Gum said Leseburg succeeded him. This evidence fails to show that any new tenant was put on the land prior to the death of Mrs. Jarvis, and Krenn does not show that he himself resided upon it. He testifies to no acts done upon the land by himself except fencing, clearing, and putting in grass certain portions thereof and placing tenants on it.

Even if the title bonds could be regarded as color of title, the execution thereof would not, of itself, constitute an ouster. As we have shown, the ouster is not effected until possession is taken under the deed, and such possession must be open, notorious, hostile, and exclusive. It must have all the elements of adverse possession in any other case. The mere execution of the deed is not notice of an adverse claim. Something more must be done to apprise the co-tenant of intent to assert a hostile claim. He might never know of the execution of the deed, since that could be done in secret, and recordation thereof would not be notice to him. The recordation of a deed or other instrument is constructive notice only to such persons, and for such purposes, as are specified in the statute—subsequent purchasers and creditors. It was not the intent of the Legislature, in ordaining it, to make it the duty of an owner of land to keep his eye upon the registry books to see whether some other person is selling his land. In order to effect an ouster, actual, express notice of the hostile claim must be given to the co-tenant, or such acts must be done upon the land as he is bound to take notice of as being hostile. Every owner is deemed to be cognizant of what is done upon his land and of who is in possession of it. The law exacts this measure of diligence from him. He must know whether strangers are entering upon it, and, knowing that, must inquire by what right they do so. In every instance, such inquiry will presumptively lead to discovery of the hostile claim. Hence, the owner is bound to know, and is estopped from denying, all information to which such inquiry, prosecuted with reasonable diligence, would have led. By the great weight of authority, actual, open, notorious, and exclusive possession under a deed from one co-tenant amounts to notice. The decisions and text-writers may not all analyze the proposition and disclose all the reasons upon which it rests; but they do say the possession is referable to the title. This can mean nothing more than that the owner is under a duty to know who is in possession and then inquire by what right he claims to be entitled to it. Freeman on Co-Tenancy, § 230, says: "The question manifestly is not to be determined solely by taking evidence to show that the co-tenant against whom an adverse possession is claimed had actual notice thereof. As a property owner he ought to manifest some interest in, and regard for, his property. He cannot close his eyes and ears, nor by wilful inattention occupy an advantage over the defendant on his want of diligence. It is sufficient that the acts of adverse possession were such in their characters and attendant circumstances that a man reasonably attentive to his own interest would have known that an adverse right was being asserted." Our decisions enunciate the same general doctrine. Clark v. Beard, 59 W. Va. 669, 53 S. E. 597; Justice v. Lawson, 46 W. Va. 163, 33 S. E. 102; Cooley v. Porter, 22 W. Va. 123; Bogges v. Meredith, 18 W. Va. 1. It is also stated and fortified by a great volume of authority in 2 Enc. L. & P. 493, and 1 A. & E. Enc. Law, 806.

In order to work an ouster, the facts and circumstances must come up to these requirements. The possession must be unequivocal, else it is not sufficient to put the co-tenant upon inquiry. He must have notice in some form. If not actual notice, he must have the equivalent thereof. Newell on Eject. § 82. The doctrine of adverse possession is to be taken strictly in ordinary cases, and "the evidence to sustain an ouster by a co-tenant must be still stronger, because of the peculiar relation of the parties." Id. § 79.

In view of the evidence, relating to possession at the date to the death of Mrs. Jarvis, it is obvious that there was no visible change in it, nothing which could have apprised her of any possession hostile to her. If Gum, the tenant, had the right to attorn to Krenn, his agreement to hold under him was not an open, notorious act, evidenced by appearances upon the ground, and she could not be deemed to have had any knowledge of it, in the absence of proof thereof, and there is none. This view of that matter makes it unnecessary to inquire whether Gum, with the consent of B. B. Stout, who was possibly the only landlord he knew, rightfully agreed to hold under the purchaser. The attornment of a tenant, without the consent of his landlord, is void. Likely, Gum was as much the tenant of Mrs. Jarvis as of B. B. Stout, and his act was void as to her, but it is not necessary to decide this question.

We think it plain, therefore, that if the title bonds could be regarded as color of title under which an adverse possession could be held, as against a coparcener, there is no evidence of that open, notorious possession on the part of the vendee, necessary to the effectuation of an ouster and the starting of the statute of limitations in the lifetime of Mrs. Jarvis, and that her children, all of whom were then under age, were within the saving clause of said statute.

This does not dispose of the case, however. Some of her children had attained their majority more than five years before the institution of this suit, and it does not appear just when C. B. Bond died. It may be that the change of possession in 1888, when Gum left the land purchased by one of the Krenns, and the party occupying the other tract, at the time of the other Krenn purchase, left it, and these persons were succeeded by new tenants put on by the Krenns, their possession effected a change, sufficient to put the owners upon inquiry, and thus marked the point at which a right of action accrued, and started the statute of limitations against Bond, if he was then living, which seems probable, since his youngest child was only 10 years old in 1903. This necessitates an inquiry as to the office and function of the title bond under the circumstances of the case and in view of the relation of the parties to one another and to the land.

Whether a title bond or other executory contract for the sale of land is color of title, as against a stranger, was discussed, but not decided, in Lewis v. Yates, 62 W. Va. 575, 59 S. E. 1073. Decisions of other jurisdictions are sometimes invoked in favor of the view that such a writing constitutes color of title, but these should be cautiously received. In some states, the English statute of uses, executing all forms of trust, prevails. After payment of purchase money, a court of equity looks upon the vendor as holding the land in trust for the vendee unconditionally. That is a sort of trust which said statute may execute, but which ours does not execute. We have held uniformly and without exception that, as between vendor and vendee, the possession of the latter is subservient, subordinate, and not adverse to the former, until after a deed has been made. If the statute of uses executed such a trust in this state, these decisions would be erroneous and could not stand, for the legal title would pass by force of the statute on payment of the purchase money. The scope, operation, and effect of our statute of uses have been defined in Blake v. O'Neal, 63 W. Va. 483, 61 S. E. 410, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1147.

We do not think it necessary even here to hold that a title bond is color of title, and I am unable to conceive a case in which it would be necessary to do so. Color of title is always an element of defense and not a weapon of offense. Without possession or right of possession, no person can ever invoke it, for, of itself, it confers no title. A person in possession under a title bond may, so far as I can see at present, always avail himself of the title of his vendor, or his grantor, immediate or remote, for whatever it is worth, be it good or bad. It is not necessary to say the Krenns, by their acts alone, ousted the Jarvis heirs or Bond. Indeed, it cannot be said. B. B. Stout was the real actor. He executed title bonds and delivered them to the Krenns, and the Krenns entered under them. If they had merely taken possession under the order and direction of B. B. Stout, without more, there would have been no ouster. Having taken possession, not in that manner, but under a paper in which B. B. Stout declared the title to be in himself alone, and claiming right of possession under that paper, they are in a different situation. They are claiming the benefit of an act done by B. B. Stout, the co-tenant himself. He asserted a claim of title in himself, which, if brought home to his co-tenant, was enough to effect an ouster. The entry of the Krenns was, therefore, mere execution of the adverse claim set up by B. B. Stout against his co-tenants. Hence the Krenns may stand and, in reason, do stand, not upon their own act, but upon the act of B. B. Stout, who alone had power to effect an ouster. If there is any color of title in the case, it is that which B. B. Stout holds, and which, together with his conduct in the assertion of an adverse claim, affords protection to his vendees.

Apparently in anticipation of this view, counsel for the appellees advert to the fact that James M. Stout seems not to have had any deed for the land. The bill filed in the partition suit, instituted in Harrison county, says he was the owner of a tract of land, lying on Fink creek, containing about 300 acres, which he purchased at a judicial sale, made under a decree of the circuit court of Lewis county, by a special commissioner, but for which no deed was executed, though the sale to him was confirmed. B. B. Stout says he has never been able to find a deed for the land and sets that fact up as a reason for his having suffered or procured a sale thereof for nonpayment of taxes. I do not think this constitutes any ground for an exception to the rule I would apply. For the purposes of this case, title in James M. Stout, at the time of his death, is necessarily admitted by all parties, for all trace their claims back to him. Whether he actually had a deed or not, all admit that he had good title, for they claim under him, and his title, whatever it was, constituted, in B. B. Stout, color of title to the whole of the land as against all of his co-tenants, on the assertion of his adverse claim. Let us suppose the Krenns had not projected themselves into this controversy, and it were one simply between B. B. Stout and his co-tenants; he being in possession and claiming to have ousted them by actual notice of an adverse claim and subsequent dominion over, and exclusive control and enjoyment of, the property, for the statutory period, after such notice. Is it possible that his defense would fail because of his inability to produce a deed, as color of title; all of them claiming title from a common source? It seems to me that each and all of them would be estopped to deny title in their ancestor. It is well settled in the law of ejectment that parties claiming title from a common source need never go beyond that. Title in that common source is conclusively presumed for the purposes of the case, and the same principle logically applies here.

In the cases of ouster between co-tenants, the making of a deed or establishment of independent color of title is not necessary, and, as a rule, does not exist. The color of title, if any, in such a dissensor, is the deed or title under which both held prior to the act of ouster. We discussed this principle in Russell v. Tennant, 63 W. Va. 623, 631, 60 S. E. 609, 612, saying: "Up to the time of the ouster, the extent of his interest was not defined upon the ground. He was seized of an interest in every acre, foot, particle, and molecule of land within the limits of the ancestral deed. His right was coextensive with the boundaries thereof, but not exclusive. His possession, until that time, extended to the whole of the land, but, like his right, it was not exclusive. When he had effected the ouster, his possession was still coextensive with the boundaries in the deed, but exclusive, and, after the expiration of 20 years following the ouster, his title became perfect, not only in respect to area, but also as to the quantum of interest. By the act of ouster and subsequent possession, he changed not the limits of the territory in dispute, but the character of his possession and title. The ancestral deed conferred upon each heir the right of possession of all the land. Possession is evidence of title. Possession under such a deed is obviously possession under color of title, although the occupant is not the sole owner and his possession is that of his co-tenants; and if, being in possession, he exclude his co-tenant and make his possession hostile to him, his possession thereafter would logically and necessarily be adverse under color, as well as claim, of title."

On the question of adverse possession, the remaining inquiries are whether the execution of the title bonds and possession, taken under them, constitute a sufficient assertion of a hostile claim against the co-tenants out of possession and notice thereof to effect an ouster. All the principles and reasons advanced to sustain an ouster by possession under the deed by one co-tenant apply here with equal force. A co-tenant is not confined to any particular mode of ouster. Any act on his part, evincing an intent to set up a hostile and exclusive claim, brought to the knowledge of the other party, is sufficient. The notice need not be in writing nor be in any sense formal. This is so well settled as to require no citation of authority. The execution of a title bond is an unequivocal assertion of title in the vendor. By that act the vendor impliedly says he owns the land, and that is what he says in the same way by the execution of a deed. The paper itself is not of the dignity of a deed, but, as we have said, the form of the act done is immaterial. All that is required is a plain and unequivocal act of hostility and claim of exclusive ownership. If this be followed by exclusive possession and dominion, with knowledge, on the part of the tenant out of possession, of the hostile claim and possession under it, the ouster is effected. For an ouster effected by means of the execution of a title bond and possession under it, we have been unable to find a precedent; but the reasons upon which the like conclusion rests when a deed has been executed and possession taken under it are, so far as we can see, the same as those adopted here.

We are also of the opinion that after the tenants who were on the land, at the time of the execution of the title bond, were replaced by new ones, put on by the Krenns, the possession was adverse and the statute began to run, subject to the rights of infants, under the saving clause found in section 3 of chapter 104 of the Code. These new tenants undoubtedly held under the Krenns. With them, neither B. B. Stout nor any of the other heirs of James M. Stout had any relation whatever. They were not their tenants. Seeing them upon the land, or being under a duty to know they were there, it was their duty to inquire, and the inquiry, had it been made, would have led to full information. Under the principles above stated, this conclusion is inevitable.

As the statute has been put into operation, it remains to say who are barred by it. In the case of John Krenn, purchaser of the 150-acre tract, the evidence seems to show that Shaner and his mother, tenants on it at the time he purchased it, left it within two years after the purchase. He says they were living on the place for nearly two years, but he does not know just how long, and then a few years afterwards a Mr. Starcher was put on it. Just when this occurred does not appear, but Krenn's evidence leaves no doubt that Shaner left in about two years, nor that after he left some other person was in possession of it, for he says it has never been vacant. He pastured his cattle on it, and has cleared 15 or 18 acres. His own use of it in that way would suffice. In the case of Joseph Krenn, purchaser of the 245-acre tract, the tenant, Gum, left the place in February, 1888, and was soon succeeded by John Leseburg. More than 10 years' adverse possession has been shown by each of them. This gives them title subject to the saving in favor of infants.

It was incumbent upon the heirs of C. B. Bond to bring themselves within this saving. A case of adverse possession having been shown, they could only avoid its effect by proving their disability. In this they have wholly failed. Nothing in the record discloses the date of the death of C. B. Bond, their ancestor. As we have said, the age of his youngest child indicates that he must have died long after 1888. This interest in the land is therefore completely barred. Mrs. Jarvis died before the possession became adverse, wherefore her children were within the saving clause. They were born, respectively, on the following dates: Mrs. Celia T. Pickens, February 7, 1869; Mrs. Louise Jarvis Currence, April 10, 1871; Meigs J. Jarvis, September 5, 1874; Arnold B. Jarvis, September 25, 1877; and Benjamin B. Jarvis, February 17, 1883. The bill in this cause was filed at January rules, 1901. The process issued December 22, 1900, and was served December 28th. Tested by the date of the service of process, with an allowance of five years after attainment of majorities, Mrs. Pickens is barred by more than five years; Mrs. Currence by more than three years; and Meigs J. Jarvis by more than three months. The other two Jarvis heirs are safely within the limit of time. This state of the case makes it necessary to say whether the disability of some of these heirs saves the title of those as to whom the disability has ceased.

Our statute amplifying and defining the remedy by ejectment (chapter 90, Code 1906) provides, in section 4, that no person shall bring such action unless he has, at the time of commencing it, a subsisting interest in the premises claimed, and a right to recover the same, or to recover the possession thereof, or some share, interest, or portion thereof. Section 9 requires the plaintiff to state whether he claims in fee or for his life, or for the life of another, or for years, specifying such lives or the duration of such term; and, when he claims an undivided share or interest, he shall state the same. Section 18 allows the plaintiff to recover any specific or any undivided part or share of the premises, though it be less than he claimed in his declaration. These statutory provisions enable any person to sue for and recover any portion or undivided share of any tract of land in which he has any interest. After the removal of the disability of an infant by the attainment of his majority, there is no impediment to his suing and obtaining his share in a tract of land. His right of action is separate and not joint, or separate as well as joint. Therefore no reason is perceived, nor any legal principle recalled, upon which it can be asserted that the disability of one or more tenants in common can constitute any excuse for the failure of others, not under any disability, to sue for their interests or shares. In Redford v. Clarke, 100 Va. 115, 40 S. E. 680, it has been held that the statute of limitations is conclusive upon each tenant in common and joint tenant after the removal of his disability. To the same effect, see Kane County v. Herrington, 60 Ill. 232. In Shannon v. Dunn, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 182, the court held as follows: "It is no answer to a plea of the statute of limitations to a writ of error that, within five years next after one of the plaintiffs had arrived at full age, the writ was prosecuted." This means that both were barred by the removal of the disability of one. In Marsteller v. McLean, 7 Cranch, 156, 8 L. Ed. 300, it was held necessary to show that all the plaintiffs were under disability to sue, in order to avoid the plea of the statute of limitations. This was an action of trespass for mesne profits after a recovery in ejectment by the plaintiffs. In Wilkins v. Phillips, 3 Ohio, 49, 17 Am. Dec. 579, it was held that the disability of one of the plaintiffs saved the remedy for all. These decisions are diametrically opposite. In those cases, however, the demands were probably joint and not separable. Here, we have separable demands. Each plaintiff could sue for his own interest on the removal of the disability. We are of the opinion, therefore, that in cases of this class each infant is barred by the lapse of the period allowed to him within which to sue after the removal of the disability.

It results from these findings and conclusions that all of the plaintiffs, except Arnold B. Jarvis and Benjamin B. Jarvis, are precluded from right to share in the property by the statute of limitations. As these two are not barred, we must determine the shares to which they are entitled. Originally, there were seven shares. Elmer H. Stout, admitting advancements and refusing to bring them in, formally disclaimed in the Harrison county partition suit, and the other heirs assumed and paid the indebtedness against the estate, in consequence thereof. He filed a formal disclaimer in this suit also, but subsequently executed and delivered to B. B. Stout a deed for any interest he may have in the land. The first of these papers was more than a disclaimer. It was an admission in writing of the receipt by E. H. Stout of his entire share in his father's estate by way of advancements and a refusal to bring these advancements into hotchpot. That not only bars him, as a disclaimer, entered of record, would, but also passed his interest in the estate to his coheirs. Its effect was to leave the whole estate for division among the other six heirs, not merely as the result of a disclaimer, but of his acknowledgment of the advancements to him as and for his full share in the estate and his acceptance of the same as such. Squires v. Squires, 65 W. Va. 611, 64 S. E. 911; Coffman v. Coffman, 41 W. Va. 8, 23 S. E. 523; Roberts v. Coleman, 37 W. Va. 143, 16 S. E. 482.

Mrs. Jarvis was, therefore, entitled to one-sixth of the lands in question, which descended to her five children, each of whom inherited one-thirtieth of the tract. Hence Arnold B. Jarvis and Benjamin B. Jarvis are each entitled to an undivided one-thirtieth of each of said two tracts of land, aggregating one-fifteenth, and John Krenn to the remaining fourteen-fifteenths of the 150-acre tract, and Joseph Krenn to the remaining fourteen-fifteenths of the 245.5-acre tract.

In so far as the decree denies relief to said Arnold B. Jarvis and Benjamin B. Jarvis, adjudicates title against them, and dismisses the bill and amended bill as to them, and gives costs to certain defendants, it will be wholly reversed, with costs in this court to Arnold B. and Benjamin B. Jarvis; but in all other respects the same will be affirmed, and a decree entered here adjudicating title as aforesaid and to the extent aforesaid in said Arnold B. and Benjamin B. Jarvis, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the principles and conclusions herein stated and the rules and principles governing courts of equity, including the adjustment of costs in the court below.

BRANNON, J. (concurring). I concur in the decision. The great weight of authority is that when a co-tenant makes a deed purporting to pass legal title to a whole tract, and the grantee enters into actual possession, that ipso facto is an ouster or disseisin of the other tenants, and makes the grantee's possession adverse to other tenants, and the statute runs in his favor. 2 Enc. L. & P. 493; 2 Enc. L. & P. 521. The weight of authority will sustain the text of that very late great work, saying: "These cases rest on the ground that the conveyance in fee and entry under it and possession are notorious and unequivocal acts of ownership of such a nature as to give notice to other co-tenants that the entry and possession are hostile and adverse to their title." Freeman, Co-Tenancy, § 224, so finds the rule on many cases. Sudduth v. Sumeral, 61 S. C. 276, 39 S. E. 534, 85 Am. St. Rep. 883; Buchanan v. King, 22 Grat. (Va.) 414, 422. Our own cases so hold. Talbot v. Woodford, 48 W. Va. 449, 37 S. E. 580; Bennett v. Pierce, 50 W. Va. 604, 40 S. E. 395; Perkins v. Pfalzgraff, 60 W. Va. 142, 53 S. E. 913. As long as a co-tenant continues in possession, giving no notice of adverse claim, his possession is for all; but, where he conveys the whole to a stranger, this itself is a disloyal act, in itself repudiates his fellow's right; and added to this there is a stranger in physical possession, and the co-tenant must take notice that a stranger is in possession, and his co-tenant gone, and he has no right to presume that a stranger is holding in friendship to him. Possession is notice. The party must inquire as to his right. That surely is the law after deed. I go further and say that the same principle applies when one co-tenant assumes to sell the whole tract to a stranger by executory contract, and puts the stranger in possession. He has a writing passing right to the whole, just the same as a deed. What difference for this purpose? As Freeman says: "The entry of the grantee cannot be presumed to be that of a co-tenant nor in subordination to the rights of the co-tenancy. Acts of ownership by such a grantee must necessarily be adverse to any other part owner." If such is the presumption in case of a deed, why not in the case of an executory contract, as it purports to give right to the whole? But it is said that one holding under such agreement is not holding adversely to his vendor, and therefore not adversely to the co-tenant. But this vendee is a stranger. He is not bound to yield possession to his vendor, nor can the vendor force him out of possession, as he could have done before the statute. Code 1906, c. 90, § 20. The claim that the deed or contract is not itself notice, but there must be evidence of knowledge brought home to the ousted co-tenant, is not sound. The deed or contract, with possession, makes notice. I again assert that an executory contract is good color of title, as I did in Lewis v. Yates, 62 W. Va. 597, 59 S. E. 1073. I refer to my opinion there found, and will only add a few authorities. In Deffenback v. Hawke, 115 U. S. 392, 6 Sup. Ct. 95, 29 L. Ed. 423, it is held that a writing "purporting to transfer title or to give the right of possession" is good color of title. Does not a contract of sale give right to possession to one in occupancy? Even the vendor cannot turn him out, as our statute forbids. Judge Dent so asserted in Cecil v. Clark, 44 W. Va. 698, 30 S. E. 216. In Hale v. Marshall, 14 Grat. (Va.) on page 497, Judge Lee said: "And it never refuses to accept an equitable title as a sufficient basis for an adversary possession on which to make out a defense under the statute of limitations." Mullan v. Carper, 37 W. Va. 215, 16 S. E. 527, Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Grat. (Va.) 110, 50 Am. Dec. 108, and Kolner v. Rankin, 11 Grat. (Va.) 425, say that an equitable title is good for color. We asserted in Ketchum v. Spurlock, 34 W. Va. 597, 12 S. E. 832, that an executory contract is color. In Power v. Kitching, 10 N. D. 254, 86 N. W. 737, 88 Am. St. Rep. 691, and 1 Cyc. 1098, it is shown that possession under contract when purchase money had been paid is color. How is payment material? As said in McNeeley v. Oil Co., 52 W. Va., at page 633, 44 S. E. 508, 62 L. R. A. 562, discussing this matter, payment is not necessary, citing a Texas case. This is so especially under Code 1906, c. 90, § 20, dispensing with payment. See Avent v. Arrington, 105 N. C. 379, 10 S. E. 991, and Wood on Lim. 648, 649. In view of these many authorities, including our own, I cannot see why an executory contract is not color.

MILLER, J. I concur with BRANNON, J., in this note.

WILLIAMS, J. (dissenting in part). I concur in the views of the majority of the court in all the foregoing opinion except that portion of it which treats of the possession of the Krenns, prior to the time they received their deed for the land, as adversary to the plaintiffs, and which applies the statute of limitations in bar of the rights of such of them to have partition of the land who had attained their majority five years, or more, before the bringing of this suit. I do not think the Krenns' possession of the land was adverse until they received a deed of conveyance. They went into possession under a title bond, or contract of sale, under B. B. Stout. This title bond recognized title as still remaining in B. B. Stout, and provided for a future conveyance as well as future payments of the purchase money. Their deeds from B. B. Stout bear date May 3, 1894. Not until that time did their possession take on the nature of an adversary possession. To constitute adversary possession it must not only be actual and visible, but it must be accompanied with either good title, or with color, or claim, of title. Parkersburg Industrial Co. v. Schultz, 43 W. Va. 470, 27 S. E. 255; Creekmur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 430; Atkinson v. Smith, 24 S. E. 901, 2 Va. Dec. 373. The writing under which the Krenns took possession does not purport to convey title; it provides for the making of a deed at a future time. Their possession, therefore, until deeds were made, was under, and not adverse to, their vendor. Core v. Faupel, 24 W. Va. 238; Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Grat. (Va.) 137; Clarke v. McClure, 10 Grat. (Va.) 305; Alleghany County v. Parrish, 93 Va. 615, 25 S. E. 882; Hudson v. Putney, 14 W. Va. 561; Parkersburg National Bank v. Neal, 28 W. Va. 744. Hudson v. Putney, supra, holds that adversary possession depends upon the intention with which the possession was taken and held. In the present case the title bond expressly shows that the Krenns did not, and in fact could not, claim it as an evidence of title. It expressly recognizes the legal title as still outstanding.

I cannot see how it could be considered even as color of title. "Color of title for purpose of adverse possession under the statute of limitations as to land is that which has the semblance or appearance of title, legal or equitable, but which is in fact no title." 1 Cyc. 1082. To the same effect are the following decisions: Sharp v. Shenandoah Furnace Co., 100 Va. 27, 40 S. E. 103; Adams v. Alkire, 20 W. Va. 480; Oney v. Clendenin, 28 W. Va. 34. "A void deed is good color of title." Bennett v. Pierce, 50 W. Va. 604, 40 S. E. 395; Randolph v. Casey, 43 W. Va. 289, 27 S. E. 231. "A deed or writing which purports to convey title is good as color of title." Swann v. Thayer, 36 W. Va. 46, 14 S. E. 423; Mullans, Adm'r, v. Carper, 37 W. Va. 215, 16 S. E. 527. As long as the vendee is in possession of the land claiming under an executory contract of sale which provides for a future conveyance, there is a privity of relation between them, and the vendee can always rely on his vendor's title to protect his possession, and, on the other hand, the vendor can always rely upon his vendee's possession in order to protect his title. I think it logically and necessarily follows, from the numerous authorities above quoted, that the Krenns' possession was not an adversary possession until they got their deeds, and that, so far as possession affects title, their possession, until that time, was the possession of B. B. Stout, and his possession was the possession of all the co-tenants. Consequently, the statute of limitations did not begin to run in the Krenns' favor until the 4th of May, 1894, which was less than 10 years before the bringing of this suit. Even if a title bond could be regarded as constituting an equitable claim of title, it could not be so considered until all the purchase money had been paid, and the Krenns thus placed in a position to demand a conveyance of the legal title. By the terms of the title bond the last deferred payment was not due until the 1st of October, 1895. Consequently they did not have so much as an equitable title for as much as 10 years prior to this suit.

Possession of the Krenns under the title bond, not being adverse to B. B. Stout, could not be adverse to his co-tenants, until they had knowledge of his intention to oust them from the land, and the statute of limitations would begin to run only from the time of such knowledge.

Possession cannot be adversary as to one co-tenant without being adversary as to all. In the case of McNeeley v. Oil Co., 52 W. Va. 616, 44 S. E. 508, 82 L. R. A. 562, point 6 of the syllabus is: "Possession by a purchaser under an executory contract of sale made by the husband alone, of land owned in joint tenancy by husband and wife, is not adverse to the wife." In that case the wife's interest in the land was her separate estate. I think that case should control the decision in this one, unless it is the purpose of the court to overrule it, and the majority opinion does not expressly do so. The logic of Judge Brannon's opinion in that case is so potent that I here quote the following extract from it, found on page 645 of 52 W. Va., on page 519 of 44 S. E. (82 L. R. A. 562), viz.:

"I have stated above that it is impossible to say that, as the possession under the executory contract was not hostile to Nathan Higgins, it was nevertheless hostile to his wife, and I say again that there could not be a possession adverse to half the tract, half the acre, half the pebble, half the molecule.

"But reflect further that nobody will say that as to Nathan Higgins the possession as to the whole tract was adverse. Every one must admit that it was friendly. This being so, we then bring in the fact that between Higgins and his wife there was a relation of privity and unity, that of joint tenancy, and the same character the possession bore to Nathan Higgins it bore to his wife. The possession being by executory contract while the wife lived and not being adverse to him neither was it adverse to her. He was her tenant as well as his tenant. Dry law views them as such. A court of law views them as such, and adverse possession is governed by this view. Had Higgins made a deed, instead of a contract, the possession would have been adverse to him, and, being adverse to him, so it would have been as to her."

I may add that the facts in that case are much stronger to affect the wife with constructive notice of the husband's intention to oust her than they are in the present case to affect these plaintiffs, or their mother, with knowledge of such intention on the part of B. B. Stout. But it was there held that the statute of limitations did not begin to run as to either co-tenant until deed was made.

I cannot see that the Krenns have established title by adversary possession. The case must then turn upon the question of whether or not there was an actual ouster of these plaintiffs by B. B. Stout, more than 10 years before they sued. On account of the confidential relation and mutual rights of co-tenants, the law places the burden of proving an ouster upon the co-tenant asserting it, or upon his vendee who claims the benefit of it. Parker v. Brast, 45 W. Va. 399, 32 S. E. 269; Justice v. Lawson, 46 W. Va. 163, 33 S. E. 102.

The statute would not begin to run until plaintiffs, or their mother, Mary M. Jarvis, had knowledge of the intention of B. B. Stout to claim title adversary to them. Parker v. Brast, 45 W. Va. 399, 32 S. E. 269; Justice v. Lawson, 46 W. Va. 163, 33 S. E. 102; 23 Cyc. 492. There is no pretense that there was actual knowledge. I do not think the possession of the Krenns can properly be regarded as constructive notice to them. Their possession was the same as B. B. Stout's possession, while holding under the title bond. B. B. Stout had a right to the possession, as did every other one of the co-tenants, and the possession of one co-tenant is the possession of all. The land lay remote from plaintiffs, and in a different county from that in which they lived. B. B. Stout was administrator on his father's estate, and, as the evidence tends to show, was taking care of this land. His co-tenants had a right to rely upon his performing this service faithfully, and no doubt they trusted him to do so. I admit that, if B. B. Stout had been receiving all the rents and profits from the land, and making use of the same to the exclusion of the others, and they had had knowledge of this, it would be sufficient to constitute an ouster, and would have set the statute of limitations in operation from the time of such knowledge. But there is no evidence that there was any rent received from the place by him. Witness M. C. Gum states that he (witness) was living on the land at the time it was sold to the Krenns, that he went there as a tenant of James M. Stout, deceased, and that all the rent he paid was in the way of work done on the place, and that there was very little of the land cleared at the time B. B. Stout sold to the Krenns. Under all the facts and circumstances of this case, I do not think the possession of the Krenns could operate any more as constructive notice to the co-tenants of B. B. Stout's intention to oust them than if the possession had been held by B. B. Stout himself. It is against all authority to apply the same strict rule of law between co-tenants which applies between strangers claiming the same land by adverse title. I do not think it is law to hold that each co-tenant is bound to take notice, at his peril, by what right one claims title who happens to be in actual possession of the joint property, regardless of the question whether such person claims title under one of the other co-tenants or under a stranger. Yet this is the effect of the majority opinion. It would place the same obligation on a co-tenant to see that he is not ousted by his joint owner that the law places upon an individual owner of land to see that his land is not taken by the adverse possession of a stranger. It would change the rule of law which makes it the duty of the ousting co-tenant to prove an ouster. It would discharge the burden which the law places on him to prove it, by raising a presumption in his favor, of notice to his co-tenants, from facts of which they have no actual knowledge. Notwithstanding one tenant in common may be in the exclusive possession of the land, claiming it as his own in severalty, it will not constitute an ouster of his co-tenants until knowledge of his adverse claim is brought home to them. Bogges v. Meredith, 16 W. Va. 1; Cooley v. Porter, 22 W. Va. 120; Justice v. Lawson, 46 W. Va. 163, 33 S. E. 102.

"Laches or acquiescence cannot bar the right of entry of a co-tenant, until the actual disseisin has been effected by some notorious act of ouster brought home to his knowledge." Parker v. Brast, 45 W. Va. 399, 32 S. E. 269.

I do not think the statute of limitations began to run in favor of B. B. Stout against plaintiffs at any time because they had no notice of his intention to claim adversely to them, and I do not think it began to run in favor of the Krenns until they got their deed, because prior to that time their possession was under, and not adverse to, the common title of all the co-tenants.

For these reasons I would reverse the decree of the circuit court as to all of the appellants, regardless of the question of infancy. I do not think any of them are barred.

MITCHELL v. UNITED STATES COAL & COKE CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 10, 1910. Rehearing Denied June 11, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102, 103*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—SAFE APPLIANCES.

It is the duty of the master to furnish reasonably safe appliances in and about the working place of his servants. This duty is nonassignable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 175, 178; Dec. Dig. §§ 101, 102, 103.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 119*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DANGEROUS APPLIANCES.

An electric wire, used on a motor car to carry the electric current from the overhead trolley wire to the machinery of the motor car, on which the insulation is allowed to become so broken, or defective, as to permit the naked wire to come in contact, either with the metal top of the circuit breaker, or with the body of a servant, whose duties are such as to require him to work on, and about, such motor car, is not a reasonably safe appliance.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES.

The master is liable if a servant who has no knowledge of such defective appliance is injured, or killed, thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 171, 173, 178; Dec. Dig. §§ 101, 102.*]

4. NEW TRIAL (§ 70*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

When the plaintiff's evidence is such that the court should not sustain defendant's motion to exclude it, it is error to set aside a verdict found for plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 142, 143; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Action by G. C. Mitchell, administrator, against the United States Coal & Coke Company. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order setting it aside, he brings error. Reversed, and judgment for plaintiff.

Cook & Howard, for plaintiff in error.
Anderson, Strother & Hughes, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, J. Writ of error to an order of the circuit court of McDowell county setting aside a verdict rendered in favor of plaintiff.

Lawrence Mitchell, a boy 17 years of age, was employed as brakeman and trapper in defendant's coal mine in McDowell county. His duties were to brake the cars which were hauled in and out of the mine to the tippie by means of an electric motor, and to open and close the trapdoors across the entry. When the cars were going upgrade, and it was not necessary to apply the brakes, his duty required him to ride on the motor, in order to be in position to open the doors to permit the passage of the motor and cars. He was riding on the hind end of the motor by the side of the motorman on the 6th of May, 1907, when he received a severe electric shock, which caused him to fall backward off the motor and to be crushed to death by the passing cars. His administrator brought an action against defendant for damages for negligently causing the death, and on the 3d of March, 1908, recovered a verdict for $1,200. The court set it aside and granted the defendant a new trial, by order made October 1, 1908. To this order a writ of error was awarded by this court. Plaintiff insists that the court erred. This depends upon whether or not there is sufficient evidence to prove the negligence of defendant, as the proximate cause of the death. Defendant offered no evidence, and relies wholly upon the alleged failure of plaintiff's evidence to establish negligence. Ed Wolfe, the motorman, is the only eyewitness to the fatal accident who testified at the trial. Mr. C. Reedy, the mine foreman, was sitting on the front end of the motor at the time the accident happened, but his testimony was not taken.

The proof shows that the electric current used to operate the motor was conducted to the machinery of the motor car by means of an insulated wire on the trolley pole, which connected with the trolley wire overhead. Wolfe says the rubber insulation on this wire was broken on the top side, and also that "the rubber insulator that went over the circuit breaker was burnt from the circuit breaker"; that at a point near where the wire enters the circuit breaker on the motor it was not insulated; and that two days before the accident occurred he called the attention of Mr. Sharp, the defendant's electrician, to this defective insulation. Mr. Sharp was dead at the time of the trial. It, therefore, does not appear whether he considered the insulation to be safe, or not. Plaintiff's theory is that this defective insulation permitted the naked wire to come in contact with the metal, and thus to charge the whole motor car, so as to shock deceased and cause him to fall off the motor; or that his body, in some way, came in contact with the exposed wire, and thus caused him to receive the shock. That the electric shock caused him to fall is not denied. The defendant's theory is that the shock resulted from what is known by motormen and electricians as a "sand-ground." Sand is sometimes applied to the track, when going upgrade, to prevent the wheels of the motor from slipping. It is a nonconductor of electricity; and if there is a sufficient quantity applied to prevent the wheels of the motor from coming in contact with the rails, the circuit will be thereby broken. This causes what is called a sand-ground. If a sand-ground occurs, and the current is communicated to the motor car by means of some other connection with the rails than by its own wheels, the entire motor car will become charged, and is liable to produce a shock to any one who happens to be on it. The testimony of the motorman is, that young Mitchell was sitting on the circuit breaker with one hand resting on the front end of the metal car next to the motor, and the other upon the motorman's shoulder; that he had been sitting in this position for a minute, or such time, while they were drifting down an incline, and that when they reached the bottom of the swag, and started upgrade, he (Wolfe) opened the trolley, and immediately young Mitchell fell backward off the motor. It is insisted that, while the motor was sand-grounded, Mitchell's body formed a short circuit by means of his hand resting on the metal car behind the motor; that the wheels of the car on which his hand rested communicated the current to the rails. But this is only a theory. There is no evidence that a sand-ground actually did occur. The evidence only shows that the shock might have resulted in such manner. But we fail to see why a short circuit would not have been formed by the coupling device between the car and the motor as well as by Mitchell's hand being on the rear car. The evidence is that his hands were gloved. It would, therefore, seem that the car coupling would be a much better conductor of electricity than Mitchell's gloved hand. The jury were justified in concluding that his body may not have caused the short circuit which gave him the shock. The presentation of defendant's theory may have occasioned some doubt in the minds of the jury as to what actually caused the short circuit. They may have doubted whether it was the defective insulation of the wire at the circuit breaker, or a sand-ground, that caused the shock; still it was their province to resolve this doubt. It is clearly a jury question. It is both proven, and virtually admitted, that the shock caused the boy to fall off the motor, and there is evidence which tends strongly to prove that the shock was caused by the defendant's negligence in not keeping its wire and circuit breaker properly insulated. While the evidence does not amount to absolutely certain proof, it is sufficient, nevertheless, to warrant a verdict for plaintiff. Carrico v. Railroad Co., 35 W. Va. 389, 14 S. E. 12; Powell v. Love, 36 W. Va. 93, 14 S. E. 405. These cases were decided upon a motion to exclude evidence, but the same value is given to such evidence whether on motion to exclude, or on a motion to set aside a verdict. If there is sufficient evidence to permit a case to go to the jury, it is also sufficient to support a verdict, if one should be found on it, and the court will not be warranted in setting it aside, simply because it may not have found with the jury. This is a corollary to the rule recently reviewed and affirmed in the case of Butcher v. Sommerville (decided by this court) 66 W. Va. —, 67 S. E. 726, that the court is not bound to submit a case to the jury when the evidence is so slight that it would not support a verdict, if one should be found on it. They were clearly warranted, by the facts proven, to infer that the defective insulation of the wire and of the circuit breaker was the proximate cause of Mitchell's death. It is insisted that he was not riding in his proper place. But there is no evidence that he was forbidden, by any rule of the defendant company, to ride on the rear end of the motor, or that he was instructed by any one having authority over him not to ride there. Neither does it appear that, if there had been proper insulation, it would have been any more dangerous to ride on the rear end of the motor than it was to ride on the front end. It is true the motorman told him it was dangerous to ride on the rear end. But he did not tell him why it was so, nor point out to him any particular element of danger. It was very natural for the boy to suppose that he encountered no more danger there than the motorman himself was exposed to. He had only been employed in this capacity for about three weeks. He had ridden in this same position frequently, and no previous accident had occurred. The motorman had told him only once that the rear end was a dangerous place on which to ride. He may have thought the motorman meant, by this warning, that he would be more liable to fall off, if he occupied that position, and he may not have appreciated that he was in any danger from the electric wire; neither do we see how he could have been in any danger from the wire, provided it was insulated. If the defendant failed to keep the wire properly insulated at those places where its employes were liable to come in contact with it in the discharge of their duty, it was guilty of negligence, in that it did not provide reasonably safe appliances in, and about, the place where its servants were required to labor. The master's duty in this regard is not assignable. The defendant could not intrust the keeping of its electric appliances in proper condition to its electrician, or mining boss, so as to escape liability for injury to its servant. N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Ampey, 93 Va. 108, 25 S. E. 226; Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. 509; Lane Bros. & Co. v. Bauserman, 103 Va. 148, 48 S. E. 857, 106 Am. St. Rep. 872.

"If a master is guilty of negligence in failing to procure suitable appliances and machinery for carrying on his business, and injuries result therefrom to his servant, he must respond in damages." Humphreys v. Newport News & M. V. Co., 33 W. Va. 135, 10

S. E. 39; Giebell v. Collins Co., 54 W. Va. 518, 46 S. E. 569.

Young Mitchell was not guilty of contributory negligence in occupying a position on the circuit breaker, unless he knew of the uninsulated condition of the wire, and there is no evidence that he knew of it. Thomas v. Electrical Co., 54 W. Va. 395, and authorities cited on pages 405 and 406 of the opinion, 46 S. E. 217.

"It is manifest that a servant cannot be deemed to have been in fault for the reason that he failed to take precautions which he did not know to be necessary for his safety." 1 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 319. This doctrine applies as well to Mitchell's having his hand on the car next to the motor as it does to his sitting on the rear end of the motor.

It follows, from what we have said, that the circuit court erred in setting aside the verdict and in granting the defendant a new trial. Therefore the order made on the 1st of October, 1908, will be reversed, and this court will render judgment on the verdict for the plaintiff.

Poffenbarger, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Mason County.

Action by Herman A. Clark against Patrick Dower, and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. Dismissed.

Chas. E. Hogg, J. W. English, and John L. Whitten, for plaintiff in error. Wm. O. Parsons, Rankin Wiley, and Somerville & Somerville, for defendants in error.

WILLIAMS, J. Plaintiff brought an action of trespass on the case in the circuit court of Mason county to recover damages for injury to real estate. Defendants did not plead the general issue, but pleaded specially a right of way by prescription over plaintiff's land. To this special plea plaintiff replied generally, and issue was joined. The case was tried by jury on the 12th of December, 1906, resulting in a verdict and judgment for the defendants. To this judgment a writ of error was awarded plaintiff. A number of errors are assigned, but we are confronted at the outset with the question whether, or not, this court has jurisdiction. It is insisted that this court is without jurisdiction, because the action is concerning a matter that is only pecuniary, and the amount in controversy is less than $100. If this be true, we have no jurisdiction of the case. But counsel for plaintiff insist that the real controversy is concerning the right of way claimed by defendants over plaintiff's land, and that this confers jurisdiction without regard to the amount of damages claimed. It was agreed between counsel in the lower court, and before trial, "that if the plaintiff is entitled to anything at all in this case, the amount of damages shall be $25." This agreement unquestionably fixes the pecuniary amount of damages that plaintiff would have any right to demand, notwithstanding $500 was the amount alleged in his declaration, provided the attorneys had authority to bind their clients by such agreement, and we assume they had, as their authority is not questioned in the brief of counsel. Counsel for defendants insist that this agreement took away from the circuit court jurisdiction to try the case, because it fixes the amount in controversy at less than $50. Section 2, c. 112, Code 1906. But we have no right to decide this question unless this court has appellate jurisdiction to review the case.

If the right of plaintiff to sue out writ of error in this court depends alone on the amount of damages involved in the action, then on principle, and according to the decision of this court in Dickinson v. Mankin, 61 W. Va. 429, 56 S. E. 824, the agreement fixing the amount to be recovered, if any recovery at all, at $25, is conclusive, and precludes the right of appeal, notwithstanding the declaration states the damages to be more than the appealable amount.

Section 3, art. 8, of our Constitution provides that the Supreme Court of Appeals "shall have appellate jurisdiction in civil cases where the matter in controversy, exclusive of costs, is of greater value or amount than one hundred dollars; in controversies concerning the title or boundaries of land, the probate of wills, the appointment or qualification of a personal representative, guardian, committee or curator; or concerning a mill, road, way, ferry or landing; or the right of a corporation or county to levy tolls or taxes."

Counsel for plaintiff insist that defendants, by failing to plead the general issue, and by pleading specially the right of way claimed by them over plaintiff's land, have converted this action into one "concerning a way," and that this entitles plaintiff to have the matter reviewed by this court, notwithstanding the amount of damages claimed is less than $100. We do not think so. We do not think that the filing of the special plea has changed plaintiff's suit from an action of trespass, demanding pecuniary damages, into a controversy concerning a way, within the meaning of the constitutional provision defining the appellate jurisdiction of this court.

What is the real matter in controversy? How is this to be determined? Must we not look to the plaintiff's declaration to see what his complaint is—what his demand? Does this not determine the nature of his suit? What kind of a judgment could the court render in response to his declaration, if the verdict be for him; or what must be the judgment if perchance it should be against him? It would seem that an answer to these questions would go far toward determining the matter in issue, the controversy, because the judgment must respond to the issue. If plaintiff should prevail the judgment would be that he recover against the defendants $25; if the judgment should be against him it would be that he take nothing by his suit. These are the only kinds of judgment that could be rendered in the case, and they, as well as the declaration itself, show that the demand is purely pecuniary. The matter in controversy by which appellate jurisdiction is to be determined is "that which is the essence and substance of the judgment, and by which the party may discharge himself." Umberger v. Watts, 25 Grat. (Va.) 167. It is true that the right of way was brought in question and was involved in the suit but only indirectly and as matter of defense to the suit. The trespass complained of consisted in the cutting of a wire fence by the defendants which plaintiff had erected across the way claimed by defendants. It therefore followed, as a matter of course, that if defendants could establish their claim to the right of way they would not be guilty of the trespass, as no other trespass was alleged than the cutting of the fence, and the passing over plaintiff's land along the alleged right of way. Defendants therefore filed a special plea by way of confession and avoidance setting up their right of way over plaintiff's land by prescription. If they could succeed in proving their title to the easement, it would be as complete a defense to plaintiff's suit as it would be to prove that they had never committed any trespass under the plea of "not guilty." They had a right to plead specially and were not bound to plead the general issue, and inasmuch as the only trespass complained of was confined to the alleged right of way, a complete defense could be made to plaintiff's action by proving the right set up in the plea. True the plea alleges affirmative matter, but it does so only as a defense to plaintiff's action; it calls for no affirmative relief, neither could any be given a defendant in such an action. The same kind of judgment would have to be rendered in the case, whether the plea were special or general, or both special and general. The claim to the right of way is only defensive, and, therefore, collateral to the real matter in controversy which is whether, or not, plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for an alleged trespass to his land.

It is well established by repeated decisions, both by this court and by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, that in actions for damages on account of trespass to real estate, where the damage claimed is less than $100, this court is without jurisdiction to review the judgment of the circuit court, notwithstanding other matters may have been involved and necessarily decided in order to determine the main issue in the case, which, if they had been made the direct subject of a suit, or action, would have given the right of appeal. It is urged by counsel for plaintiff that the filing of the special plea, and the failure to plead the general issue, gives this case a status different from what it would have had if the general issue had been pleaded. We do not think so. It may be that the special plea was necessary in order to admit proof of the easement, it being by way of confession and avoidance, and not a traverse of the declaration. But it is not necessary for us to decide this point, as we do not think it determines the jurisdictional question. Whether the proof of a right of way could have been given under the general issue, if it alone had been pleaded, or whether a special plea was essential in order to admit such proof, does not change the nature of the controversy shown by plaintiff's declaration, or the character of the judgment that would have to be rendered by the court pursuant to the only kind of verdict that could have been found in the case, regardless of the plea, or pleas, filed, which must have been either "for the plaintiff for $25 damages," or for the defendant, "not guilty." It seems to be settled in this state that in actions of trespass quare clausum fregit defendant may, under the general issue, prove want of title or right to the possession in plaintiff. Dickinson v. Mankin, 61 W. Va. 429, and authorities cited in the opinion by Judge Brannon on page 434, 56 S. E. 824; Hogg's Pl. & Pr. § 229; and Rob. New Pr. 648.

In England and also in many of the states of the Union, the rule of practice is that in order to be allowed to prove a license, or prescriptive way over plaintiff's land in actions of trespass quare clausum fregit, it must be specially pleaded. 21 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 338, and cases cited in note 8. But it may be that, in Virginia and in this state, this rule is modified by statute (section 8, c. 103, Code 1900), which authorizes "trespass on the case" to be brought in any case where "trespass" lies; and in actions of trespass on the case the rules of practice were always liberal enough to admit, under the general issue, proof of anything that would bar plaintiff's action. 21 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 921, and Ridgeley v. West Fairmont, 46 W. Va. 445, 33 S. E. 235. May not this statute intend that, where an action of trespass on the case is brought for a wrong which prior to the statute could only have been redressed by an action of "trespass vi et armis," the rules of pleading and evidence which have always applied in actions of trespass on the case shall apply to it also? I am inclined to think so. But, as before stated, we do not decide whether defendants in the present case could have proven the alleged right of way by prescription over plaintiff's land under the general issue, if it had alone been pleaded, as a decision of this question is not necessary to a decision of the question of our jurisdiction to review the case.

If the question of our jurisdiction were one of first impression, we might feel inclined to give the language of the Constitution such a construction as would permit an appeal to this court in this and in similar cases, notwithstanding the right of way is collaterally drawn in question, and only as a defense to plaintiff's action. But we feel bound by the construction given to the statute by this court in a number of previous cases, and also by repeated decisions of the court of Virginia construing the same language used in the statute of that state prior to the formation of this state. The question is settled by decisions which we regard as binding on us.

Greathouse v. Sapp, 26 W. Va. 87, was a case where the plaintiff brought trespass quare clausum fregit for the cutting and carrying away trees from his land, claiming $250 damages. The defendant pleaded "not guilty," and the proof showed that he claimed title to the land on which the trespass was alleged to have been committed. Plaintiff recovered a verdict and judgment for $12. The court in that case held that a writ of error did not lie to this court, "though it appears from the record that the title or boundaries of the land are drawn in question." The same doctrine was again announced in Dickinson v. Mankin, 61 W. Va. 429, 56 S. E. 824. This was also a case of trespass quare clausum fregit for the cutting of timber. Here the plaintiff pleaded both "not guilty" and liberum tenementum. Trial was had, which resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff sought to have the case reviewed by this court, and it was held that, because plaintiff's own evidence showed that the amount, at most, to which he was entitled, if to anything at all, was less than $100, this court was without jurisdiction, notwithstanding the title to the land was drawn in question.

It will be observed that the same phraseology, used in the Constitution in defining the appellate jurisdiction of this court, applies in respect to cases involving title to land as applies to controversies concerning a mill, road, way, ferry or landing; hence the analogy of the two cases above referred to to the one under review. The language of the Constitution is: "In controversies concerning the title or boundaries of land; * * * or concerning a mill, road, way, ferry or landing." The title to the land in those two cases was brought in question collaterally, and for the purpose of defense to plaintiff's money demand, just as the defendants' right of way is brought in question in the present case for the purpose of defeating plaintiff's money demand. If it cannot be said that the title to the land in those cases was in controversy, so as to give right of appeal, how can it be said that the right of way in the present case is the matter in controversy, so as to give the plaintiff a writ of error to this court?

This question again received careful consideration by this court in the case of Miller v. Navigation Co., 32 W. Va. 46, 9 S. E. 57. That was an action by the Navigation Company to recover certain tolls from the defendant for floating rafts over its dams constructed across the Little Kanawha river under the rights given it by charter. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and under this plea set up the defense that the plaintiff had no right to charge toll. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $66. A portion of the syllabus in that case reads as follows: "Upon a writ of error by the defendant, held, this court has no jurisdiction to review the judgment of the circuit court, although the record shows that the real defense to the action was that the condition of the river was such that the plaintiff had no right to levy the toll, for which the judgment was recovered." In that case Judge Snyder, who delivered the opinion of the court, reviewed a number of Virginia cases which are authority for the general proposition that, in relation to those matters concerning which an appeal is given to this court, such matters must be the subject of direct proceeding, and not such as may be introduced into the case collaterally, and merely as defense to plaintiff's suit or action, viz.: Hutchinson v. Kellam, 3 Munf. (Va.) 206; Skipwith v. Young, 5 Munf. (Va.) 276; Hancock v. Railroad Co., 3 Grat. (Va.) 328; Clark v. Brown, 8 Grat. (Va.) 549; and Umbarger v. Watts, 25 Grat. (Va.) 167.

We hold that we have no jurisdiction to review this case, and therefore dismiss the writ of error as improvidently awarded.

POFFENBARGER, J. (dissenting). I am unable to concur in the views of my associates. The parties to this action have put into direct issue, by the special plea and traverse thereof, the private way claimed by the defendant, and the Constitution gives appellate jurisdiction in all controversies concerning roads and ways. None of the decisions of this court and the Virginia court, relied upon as denying such jurisdiction, save that of Dickinson v. Mankin, 61 W. Va. 429, 56 S. E. 824, passes upon the exact question, for in the latter only was the question of title put in issue by a plea, and that case is not exactly in point, because it related to title and boundaries of land and not a way. Besides, it is offset by Shaver v. Edgell, 48 W. Va. 502, 37 S. E. 664, in which a writ of error was entertained under almost the exact conditions presented here.

The interposition of the special plea, setting up right in the defendant, constitutes ground for distinction. Herman on Estoppel and Res Judicata, § 276, says: "Thus in trespass, upon not guilty pleaded, the title is not concluded, though, if the title is put in issue by a plea of soil or freehold, the verdict will be conclusive on the title in another action of trespass for an injury done to the same land. So, in actions on the case for interruptions of rights and other easements, on the general issue, the title is not settled, though if the defendant plead a title in bar, and issue is taken on it, the verdict will settle that point for future actions." This is fully sustained by decisions of reputable courts, cited in the notes. Upon principle, therefore, the judgment in favor of Dower is res judicata and gives him an unimpeachable right of way over Clark's land, for review of which this court denies the latter right of review, notwithstanding the Constitution says such right shall exist in all cases of controversy concerning roads and ways. Dickinson v. Mankin says the judgment in such case is not res judicata, but I think this proposition is not sustained by any other decision of this court or those of Virginia.

The doctrine of Hutchinson v. Kellam, 3 Munf. (Va.) 202, and Skipwith v. Young, 5 Munf. (Va.) 276, is consistent with the principle stated in Herman on Est. & Res Jud. as quoted, because there was no special plea in either of them. The same is true of Great-house v. Sapp, 26 W. Va. 87, and Miller v. Navigation Co., 32 W. Va. 46, 9 S. E. 57, and none of them is authority for the view expressed in Dickinson v. Mankin. The idea that this plea does not put the title to the road directly in issue and make the judgment res judicata is based upon mere argument against authority, founded in nothing more substantial than that the same evidence would have been admissible under the plea of not guilty. That might do, if it had not been repudiated by so many decisions. There are a few cases which say a judgment on such a plea in an action, involving right of possession only, will not bar one involving the superior right of title. McKnight v. Bell, 135 Pa. 358, 19 Atl. 1036, and Arnold v. Arnold, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 4. But these admit its binding force in actions of equal dignity, or involving the same right. On the other hand, the exception, made by these cases, is denied by the great weight of authority, holding the judgment final and binding as to every question, directly put in issue by the plea. Elson v. Comstock, 150 Ill. 303, 37 N. E. 207; White v. Chase, 128 Mass. 158; Standish v. Parker, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 20, 13 Am. Dec. 393; Smith v. Sherwood, 4 Conn. 282, 10 Am. Dec. 143; Church v. Leavenworth, 4 Day (Conn.) 277; Richmond v. Hays, 3 N. J. Law, 492; Richardson v. Boston, 19 How. 263, 15 L. Ed. 639; Shepherd v. Willis, 19 Ohio, 142; Dick v. Webster, 6 Wis. 481; Van Fleet's For. Adj. § 404, citing numerous authorities.

However, in view of the holding of this court, I shall now be compelled to say it is not res judicata. This decision denies right of review on the ground that the right of way is only collaterally involved, and Dickinson v. Mankin says the judgment is not final and conclusive as to it. Rather than deny any right of review at all, I yield to that conclusion, as a choice between evils, being unable to obtain a correction of what I consider an erroneous decision.

Note by BRANNON, J. I am entirely satisfied with the opinion prepared for the court by Judge WILLIAMS; but it being claimed that a judgment in trespass quare clausum fregit, when there is a plea of liberum tenementum, is final as to title even in an after action of ejectment, and that Dickinson v. Mankin, 61 W. Va. 429, 56 S. E. 824, is wrong, I have been led to re-examine the matter.

If we go to Hutchinson v. Kellam, a thoroughly considered case, 3 Munf. (Va.) 202, we find the court holding that an appeal does not lie in an action of trespass when the damage is less than $100, though the statute gave the writ of error where the title or bounds of land or a franchise is drawn in question. The pith of the reason for this is stated thus in the opinion: "The action of trespass is one in which damages only are recovered; and although the title or bounds of land may be incidentally and collaterally brought in question, yet the value of the matter in controversy is, from the very nature of the action, the value of the damages sustained by the trespass; and this, as well where the title or bounds of land may be drawn in question, as where they may in no manner be involved in the dispute." The court did not make this dependent on whether the plea was not guilty or liberum tenementum, but on the nature of the action. Morse v. Marshall, 97 Mass. 519, so holds. Johnson v. C. & M. Co., 86 Fed. 269, 30 C. C. A. 35, says title cannot be tried in trespass. In Warwick v. Underwood, 3 Head (Tenn.) 238, 75 Am. Dec. 767, held conclusive in second action of trespass. Court declined to say whether in ejectment. Our Code 1906, c. 185, demands certain "matters in controversy" to warrant appeal, and grants it "in controversies concerning the title or boundaries of land," meaning involving title or boundaries directly in issue and directly affected by the judgment. In Skipwith v. Young, 5 Munf. (Va.) 276, it is held that no appeal lies from an action of trespass where the damages are below $100, "notwithstanding it appears from the record that the right to erect the mill was drawn in question." In that case the court defined "the matter in controversy" as "that for which the suit is brought, not that which may or may not come in question." Trespass is only for money recovery. But it is said that where the plea of not guilty only is used there is no appeal, but where liberum tenementum is the plea title of land is involved. I answer that defense of superior title or right in the defendant may be given in evidence under not guilty. Citations in Dickinson v. Mankin on page 434 of 61 W. Va., 56 S. E. 824; 21 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 832. If title can be relied on under the general issue as well as under the plea of liberum tenementum, what difference that this plea is in? It does not change the nature of the action. It is still the fact that the action is only one for invasion of present possession, involving only right to present possession, not title. The theory of this difference of plea will not do. There was such a plea in Skipwith v. Young, yet the court held that title was not involved. And in Clark v. Brown, 8 Grat. (Va.) 549, the court, asserting that title is not involved so as to give appeal in trespass, said that "notwithstanding the imposing form in which the questions (right to land) were there presented, and although it was argued and authorities adduced to prove that a verdict and judgment in an action t. c. f. in which the pleadings put the freehold in issue were conclusive of the right and could be pleaded by way of estoppel, the court determined that as the damages were less than $100 the defendant could not appeal." Now, I say that this view of the question was taken in Greathouse v. Sepp, 26 W. Va. 87, and Miller v. Navigation Co., 32 W. Va. 49, 9 S. E. 57. Those cases give the prior Virginia cases that construction. So do the cases of Umbarger v. Watts, 25 Grat. (Va.) 177, and Buckner v. Metz, 77 Va. 125. The Hutchinson Case, supra, holds that to give appeal title to land must be directly in question. So we said in McClaugherty v. Morgan, 86 W. Va. 193, 14 S. E. 992. Judgment in trespass would bar a second action of trespass; but not a writ of right when it prevailed, or ejectment, now a real action, now substituted for the writ of right. Ejectment once did not settle title, but only present possession, and was no bar to a writ of right. Now ejectment is a real action in place of the abolished writ of right. And now judgment in trespass does not bar ejectment. Ejectment requires ouster; not so for trespass. "Trespass cannot be employed as a substitute for ejectment." Sedgwick & Walt, Trial of Land Titles, §§ 93, 178. Such is the law in the Virginias, whatever it is elsewhere.

TOTTEN v. POCAHONTAS COAL & COKE CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. May 17, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DEEDS (§ 124*)—CONSTRUCTION—NATURE OF ESTATE.

A deed whereby the grantor, for a small money consideration and "a good and peaceable life maintenance," bargains and conveys to his wife and infant children all his real and personal estate, but which contains no words of limitation, and which at common law would not have passed to the grantees a greater estate than one for the life of the grantor, will not now, by virtue of section 8, chapter 71, Code 1906, pass a fee simple estate if the contrary intention appears.

2. DEEDS (§ 134*)—RESERVATIONS—POWER TO CONVEY.

Where in such deed the grantor after the premises, and in express terms retains the legal title to the land granted, and in himself and wife, one of the said grantees, upon certain contingencies and conditions stipulated therein, the power to sell and convey said land, a subsequent deed by him and his wife to a third party, made in execution of the right and power so reserved, reciting the occurrence of said contingencies and conditions, will pass good title to the land to such third person, and operate as a defeasance of all right and title which vested immediately in the grantees in said former deed, or that on the death of the grantor but for the execution of such power might have vested in them by virtue of the grant or by virtue of the subsequent provision thereof that "the division of this deed, shall at the death of said T. K. Totten be made equal between his wife, and all of the children now surviving and those that may survive."

3. DEEDS (§ 134*)—CONSTRUCTION.

In the construction of such deeds the rules against repugnancy of terms and restraints upon alienations, applicable to deeds granting estates in fee simple have little, if any, application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 134.*]

Williams and Brannon, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Suit by Major Henry Totten against the Pocahontas Coal & Coke Company and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant Coke Company appeals. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

A. W. Reynolds, J. S. Clark, and Anderson, Strother & Hughes, for appellant. Chapman & Gillespie and A. S. Higginbotham, for appellees Totten and others. Bernard McLaugherty, for appellee Lambert.

MILLER, J. This is a suit for partition of four several tracts of land in Pocahontas county. Plaintiff alleges that he is the owner of an undivided one sixth thereof; Victoria Totten of another sixth; the defendants Effler and Belcher, jointly of a one twelfth, and George W. Lambert of another twelfth, together constituting the one sixth conveyed to W. L. Totten; and the Pocahontas Coal & Coke Company, of three sixths undivided interest therein, constituting, as the bill alleges, the one sixth originally conveyed to Matilda J. Totten, and the two sixths conveyed to Walter C. Totten and Boyd M. Totten, deceased, infant children of T. K. and Matilda J. Totten, who died subsequent to the conveyance thereof to them and inherited from them by their father, said T. K. Totten.

The Pocahontas Coal & Coke Company denies that plaintiff and its co-defendants, alleged to have such interests in said land, have in fact any interest therein. On the contrary it alleges that by deed from the said T. K. Totten and Matilda J. Totten, February 24, 1902, made in execution of the power of sale and rights reserved to them in a deed of September 5, 1889, and now calling for our construction, it acquired and now owns the entire and exclusive right and title to said land, and that plaintiff and others who would have the same partitioned in this suit have absolutely no interest therein entitling them to partition.

The decree appealed from granted partition as prayed for.

By deed of September 5, 1889, upon which the conflicting claims of the parties depend, the said T. K. Totten, in consideration of one hundred dollars, receipt of which is therein acknowledged, and "the further consideration of a good and peaceable life maintenance, * * * bargained and conveyed" unto the said "Matilda J. Totten, his wife, and Wm. L. Totten, Major H. Totten, Boyd M. Totten, Walter C. Totten and Victoria Totten" all of his estate real and personal, particularly described, including the land which the bill seeks to have partitioned. The deed recites that certain option contracts were outstanding for certain of the tracts conveyed, and provides that if the lands covered thereby should thereafter be sold and conveyed pursuant to said contracts, then the purchase money therefor should be thereby conveyed. The deed also contains a covenant on the part of the grantees binding them "to pay all debts made by the said T. K. Totten for the purchase of goods north or elsewhere, also a fee to D. E. Johnston." But the important provisions thereof calling for construction, and the one upon which the rights of the parties to the controversy mainly depend, are as follows:

"And the said T. K. Totten claim and retain the power in this deed, if the family ever wants to move from the premises or if the said T. K. Totten & wife think they can better their situation then they shall be vested with the right and power to sell and convey anything embraced in this deed, that is to say, as long as the said T. K. Totten is living, and the said T. K. Totten does vest in himself the legal title to sell or dispose of anything or any part of any land or lot mentioned in this deed by the consent of his wife, if the family ever become needy of anything, and it is his opinion that it is advisable to do so.

"The division of this deed, shall at the death of the said T. K. Totten be made equal between his wife, and all of the children now surviving and those that may survive."

The Pocahontas Coal & Coke Company, appellant, by its counsel, contends that taken by its four corners and applying the legal rules of construction, and having due regard to the rules of property, this deed invested in the grantees, not an absolute fee simple title, but an equitable estate or title for the life of the grantor, subject to a reserved power of alienation, and in case of failure to exercise this reserved power, the complete legal title to vest in the grantees and their survivors, and the survivors of them, upon the death of the grantor. The claim of appellees on the other hand is that the provisions of the deed reserving in the grantor legal title to sell and dispose of the land granted by the premises upon the several conditions named, and for the final disposition of the land at the death of the grantor, are repugnant to and inconsistent with the estate granted, or intended to be granted, and therefore void, and that an estate in fee simple absolute was thereby invested in the grantees in present. We have thus presented squarely the controlling issues in the case.

It is conceded on both sides that the polar star that should guide us in the construction of deeds as of all other contracts is, what was the intention of the party or parties making the instrument, and when this is determined, to give effect thereto, unless to do so would violate some rule of property. This rule has been often declared by this court. Gibney v. Fitzsimmons, 45 W. Va. 334, 82 S. E. 189; Uhl v. Railroad Co., 51 W. Va. 106, 41 S. E. 340, and cases cited. In the latter case Judge Brannon says: "As to wills the rule has ever been that regardless of form or orderly parts, we must look at the real intention; but this has not been the case in the construction of deeds. Deeds have orderly parts, technical words of precise legal signification, and in times gone by those parts and words, and the strict rule of construction of them, have been rigorously observed often defeating the manifest intention. Modern construction, however, has leaned towards the intention, overriding mere form and technical words, and nowadays it may be said that the intention must rule the construction in deeds as well as in wills. Humphrey v. Foster, 13 Grat. (Va.) 653; Mauzy v. Mauzy, 79 Va. 537; Lindsey v. Eckels (Va., 1901) 99 Va. 668, 40 S. E. 23, show this to be the rule in Virginia; and Hurst v. Hurst, 7 W. Va. 289; and Goldsmith v. Goldsmith, 46 W. Va. 426, 33 S. E. 266; McDougal v. Musgrave, 46 W. Va. 509, 33 S. E. 281, and Bank of Berkeley Springs v. Green, 45 W. Va. 171, 174, 31 S. E. 260, show this to be the rule in West Virginia."

On behalf of appellees it is said that one of the rules of property well established is that "stipulations, reservations, exceptions, or conditions, in a deed, which are inconsistent with, or tend to depreciate or destroy, the estate or interest granted, are void," and that repugnant words, clauses or conditions must be made to yield to the main purposes of the grant. Riddle v. Town of Charlestown, 43 W. Va. 796, 28 S. E. 831; Goldsmith v. Goldsmith, 46 W. Va. 426, 33 S. E. 266; Uhl v. Railroad Company, supra; Chapman v. Coal & Coke Co., 54 W. Va. 193, 46 S. E. 262. That another rule, of ancient origin, is that against restraints on the power of alienation. This rule is perhaps nowhere better stated than by the Supreme Court of the United States in Potter v. Couch, 141 U. S. 296, 11 Sup. Ct. 1005, 35 L. Ed. 721, as follows: "The right of alienation is an inherent and inseparable quality of an estate in fee simple. In a devise of land in fee simple, therefore, a condition against all alienation is void, because repugnant to the estate devised." Other cases relied on and stating and applying these rules are McClure v. Cook, 39 W. Va. 579, 20 S. E. 612; Steib v. Whitehead, 111 Ill. 247, 251; Pynchon v. Stearns, 11 Metc. (Mass.) 804, 45 Am. Dec. 210; De Peyster v. Michael, 6 N. Y. 407, 57 Am. Dec. 470; Mandlebaum v. McDonnell, 29 Mich. 78, 18 Am. Rep. 61; Anderson v. Cary, 36 Ohio St. 506, 38 Am. Rep. 602; Maker v. Lazell, 83 Me. 562, 22 Atl. 474, 23 Am. St. Rep. 795; Latimer v. Waddell, 119 N. C. 370, 26 S. E. 122, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 668; Bouldin v. Polhemus, 74 Cal. 141, 15 Pac. 451; Ray v. Spears, 64 S. W. 413, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 814; Hardy v. Galloway, 111 N. C. 519, 15 S. E. 890, 32 Am. St. Rep. 828; McDaniel v. Puckett (Tex. Civ. App.) 68 S. W. 1007; Blair v. Muse, 88 Va. 238, 2 S. E. 31; Durand v. Higgins, 67 Kan. 110, 72 Pac. 567; Hamilton v. Jones, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 598, 75 S. W. 554; Pritchett v. Jackson, 103 Md. 696, 63 Atl. 965; McDonald v. Jarvis, 64 W. Va. 62, 60 S. E. 990; Brady v. Fuller, 78 Kan. 448, 96 Pac. 854.

It would not be profitable, or within the limits of judicial opinion, to attempt to quote from or to analyze these cases, in order to show their applicability or inapplicability to the case we have here. This general observation, however, may be made with reference to all or substantially all of them, namely, that these rules which they declare and in some cases apply are applicable to deeds granting estates in fee simple absolute.

The proposition for which these cases are cited is not controverted by the appellant, but the application of them to the case in hand is controverted. We must return then to the pivotal question in the case, namely, what estate was and was intended to be granted by the deed of September 5, 1889? If a fee simple estate the plaintiff should prevail, and the decree below should be affirmed.

As we have seen the rules of construction not only permit, but require us to look to the whole instrument. See on this subject in addition to cases cited, 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 836; 1 Sheppard's Touch. 50 et seq. In the premises of the deed of September 5, 1889, the grantor "bargained and conveyed * * * all of his estate both personal and real," without any words of limitation, sufficient we may say, under section 8, chapter 71, Code 1906, if unaffected by its subsequent provisions, to pass the fee simple or the whole estate which the grantor had the power to dispose of. That section says such a deed shall have that effect "unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will, conveyance or grant." At common law, prior to the original enactment of this section, such a deed would have been construed to pass no greater estate than one for the life of the grantor or testator. Markells v. Markells, 32 Grat. (Va.) 544, 557, and cases cited; 2 Minor (4th Ed.) 915, 916. We have here then a deed, which but for the statute, would not pass a fee simple estate. This statute by its very terms is not to have the effect of passing such an estate if the contrary intention appears. Now when we look to the provisions of the deed of September 5, 1889, following the words of bargain and conveyance, we see that the grantor plainly did not intend to grant a fee simple estate, for in terms too plain to call for interpretation he specifically reserves or excepts the legal title, and the power of sale, and upon the conditions named therein, not a naked power, but one coupled with an interest, for there is the provision for his support and maintenance during life. The power of sale reserved was not without restrictions or limitations, for the grant was to Matilda J. Totten, wife, and the five children named, and the consent and joinder therein of Matilda J. Totten, one of the grantees, was by the provisions of the deed, necessarily required in any valid deed by the grantor. The plain purpose of this deed was to provide for the support and maintenance of the grantor and his family, by investing in his grantees during his life some equitable right or title, subject to his reserved power of sale and disposition of the property, with the consent of his wife. While the general rule applicable to grants of estates in fee simple is that conditions repugnant to a grant are void, nevertheless, according to the modern authorities, it may be necessary to look to the conditions in a deed to find out plainly what estate is or is intended to be granted. McDougal v. Musgrave, 46 W. Va. 509, 33 S. E. 231; Gay v. Walker, 36 Me. 54, 58 Am. Dec. 734; Bassett v. Budlong, 77 Mich. 338, 43 N. W. 984, 18 Am. St. Rep. 404; McClure v. Cook, 39 W. Va. 579, 20 S. E. 612; Triplett v. Williams, 149 N. C. 394, 63 S. E. 79; Varner v. Rice, 44 Ark. 236; Johnson v. Reeves, 48 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 505; Horn v. Broyles (Tenn. Ch. App.) 62 S. W. 297; Bouton v. Doty, 69 Conn. 531, 37 Atl. 1067; Sadler v. Taylor, 49 W. Va. 104, 38 S. E. 583. These authorities, and many others that might be cited, hold, that in determining what estate or interest is granted, the habendum of a deed, as well as other parts of the instrument, may be looked to, as enlarging, explaining, or qualifying the premises. This rule was applied in Gay v. Walker, in construing a deed requiring the land granted to remain common and unoccupied; and in McDougal v. Musgrave, in the construction of a deed reserving a life estate in the land granted; and in Triplett v. Williams, holding the granting clause of a deed to have been modified by the habendum, and that the grantee took a life estate, with remainder to her children, such being the intention of the parties; and in McClure v. Cook, where the grant provided for support and maintenance of the grantor, and restraining alienation without his consent, the court holding such restraint to be for the protection of the interests of the grantor, and good as against the creditors of the grantee; and in Bouton v. Doty, where the deed conveyed a fee estate subject to a life estate in the grantor, reserving to him the right to occupy and use the premises as fully and freely as he might do if the fee simple title remained in himself, with full power to mortgage the premises, and raise money for his own personal benefit at any time he might desire for and during his natural life, and in which case it was held, that the grantor thereby retained the right to mortgage the fee, and not merely his life estate, and that the reservation of the power was valid. The court in this case, referring to 2 Washb. on Real Property (2d Ed.) p. 314, says: "A power of this kind can be created by deed as well as by will, and in a deed it can be reserved to the grantor as well as granted to another."

The intention of the grantor in the deed involved here being plain, and not being competent for reasons given to pass a fee simple estate to the grantees, the rules against repugnancy and restraints upon alienation, applicable to grants of estates in fee simple, can have but little, if any, application. Totten had the absolute property in the land at the time of the conveyance. He placed no restraint upon his grantees in the alienation of such estate as was granted.

Two cases, which we regard pointedly applicable to the case here, are Blanchard v. Morey, 56 Vt. 170, and Hardy v. Clarkson, 87 Mo. 171. In the first case the conditions of the deed were: "That the said Wm. C. and John Morey, Jr., are not to have any right or title whatever to the above described premises as long as we or either of us live; and the above deed is not to be binding upon us or either of us if in any case we should want or need to sell a part or all of said real estate in order to maintain us, and the above deed is to be null and void in such case and we are to have the entire control of the above premises during our natural lives." The deed was in form a grant of an estate in fee simple. While commenting upon these apparently repugnant provisions of the deed the court says: "But a deed should be interpreted most favorably for its own validity and for the effectuation of the design of the grantors, where that is plainly expressed or can be collected, or ascertained from the deed, unless it is in conflict with some rule of law." "The intent is to be derived upon view and comparison of the whole instrument. We think the grantors' intent in this deed, though clumsily expressed, yet fairly collectible and ascertainable from it as a whole, was to convey the premises in fee, conditioned upon a right of possession and use in the grantors and the survivor of them during life, and of being supported, so far as needed in addition and suitable to their condition in life, by the grantees; with the further right to the grantors to sell and convey for their necessities in case of failure to receive support from the grantees. Sherman v. Dodge, 28 Vt. 28. The right to support and to sell for their necessities was a provision in the nature of a condition of absolute defeasance. If the grantees wished the conveyance to become absolute, they were bound to see that no occasion should arise for the grantors to sell for their necessities. But a court of equity will seek to avoid a forfeiture." In this case the grantor in place of making an absolute sale under the power executed a mortgage, which gave right of redemption to the grantees, but the court said at page 174: "If John, Sr., had sold absolutely instead of mortgaging, under a necessity for support, the grantees in this deed of 1857 would have had no remedy." Hardy v. Clarkson is a still stronger case. In that case Hardy conveyed the land to Feazel, as trustee of Mary Hardy, his wife, and to children named, the last two of which were survivors and plaintiffs in the suit. The consideration recited in the deed to the trustee was, money belonging to Mrs. Hardy and her said children, amounting to $4,991, which the deed recited Hardy had borrowed from the trustee, and to secure the payment of which he had executed the conveyance of the land involved, and certain personal property therein mentioned, which said property said trustee was "to have and to hold for the separate use of said Mary and her said children forever, free from all claims and demands of all and every nature whatever, subject to the covenants hereinafter contained, which, on the part of the grantor, was to warrant the title to the trustee and to hold him harmless from all damages arising from the execution of the trust, and which said covenants therein, on the part of said trustee, Wm. Feazel, were: (1) That he will permit the land conveyed, 'and personal property so bargained and sold,' to remain in the possession, and under the control of the grantor so long as he shall live. (2) And then in possession of his wife Mary Hardy, if she survive her husband, so long as she should live. (3) After her death to divide and deed the real estate, in equal proportions, to Margaret Jane, Virginia W., Joseph, Robert A., and Daniel Hardy, and the personal property and its increase to be divided in equal proportions among the above named beneficiaries. (4) That upon the written direction or command of the aforesaid Mary Hardy, at any time, the said party of the second part shall make and execute deeds, bills of sale, and other assurances, to her, the said Mary, or to any other person she may direct, for a part or all of said property, and the said party of the second part covenants faithfully to perform said trust." Hardy and wife entered into an agreement with Clarkson, as trustee for his wife, whereby they agreed to convey a part of said lands for the consideration named, to be paid to the said Mary Hardy, reciting there that "that this agreement is made by said Joseph Hardy and wife, in virtue of any and all interest they have, or may have, in said lands, and also in virtue of the powers invested in said Mary Hardy by the deed aforementioned from Joseph Hardy to Wm. N. Feazel; and the said Mary Hardy, in execution of said powers, hereby directs, requests and commands said William N. Feazel, and all persons claiming or holding any right, title, or interest, to said lands under or through said Feazel, to convey and release the same to said Charles Clarkson, trustee of his wife, Charlotte, as aforesaid, and the said Mary Hardy hereby appoints all title, uses, or interests under her control, by virtue of said powers or otherwise, to said Charles Clarkson in trust as aforesaid." The suit was ejectment, and one of the questions was whether said contract was a valid execution of the power of sale, and whether the decree of the St. Louis Land Court divesting the legal title out of Feazel, trustee, and investing it in Clarkson, as was adjudged by the lower court, vested the legal title in Clarkson. The Missouri court, affirming the lower court, said: "The execution and exercise of the power of sale by the wife, at any time, would defeat alike the right of use and enjoyment as conferred upon or reserved to the grantor, and prevent the estate from vesting, by way of remainder, in the children. It is only in the event of the death of the grantor and of his wife, Mary, without executing the power of sale, that the children were to take and to receive deeds from the trustee. These were the conditions and events upon which the remainder is contingent to the children, and upon the happening of which it was to spring up, to vest in them. The legal title being in said trustee, a deed from him, made under the written direction of the wife, would be a complete exercise and execution of the power, and would pass the fee to the purchaser, and be to him an adequate defence in the action of ejectment. Norcum v. D'Oench, 17 Mo. 98; Rubey v. Barnett, 12 Mo. 3 [49 Am. Dec. 112]."

The deed from T. K. Totten and Matilda J. Totten to the Pocahontas Coal & Coke Company, of February 24, 1902, which recites the occurrence of the contingencies and conditions upon which the grantors by the terms of the deed of September 5, 1889, reserved the right and title to convey said land, was we think a valid execution by them of the powers thereby lawfully conferred, and invested in the appellant company title to the land, and operated as a defeasance of any and all right and title immediately vested, or that might have become invested in the grantees, or the survivors of them, upon the death of the grantors, as provided therein.

The theory that the power of sale reserved in the deed of September 5, 1889, might be construed as a power of revocation, and the deed to appellant of February 24, 1902, as a valid execution of that power, has also been presented and elaborately argued by counsel. And the questions have also been presented and argued, whether there was ever a valid delivery to and acceptance by the grantees of the deed of September 5, 1889, and whether or not there could be an acceptance thereof by the infant children and grantees burdened with the obligations thereof to be performed on their part?

The conclusions already reached render it wholly unnecessary to consider these questions. The authorities cited and relied on, on the theory of a power of revocation, are Waldron v. Coal Co., 61 W. Va. 280, 56 S. E. 492; Ocheltree v. McClung, 7 W. Va. 232; Fitzgerald v. Fauconberge (1729) Fitz-Gibbon's King's Bench Reports, 207; Ricketts v. Louisville, etc., Ry. Co., 91 Ky. 221, 15 S. W. 182, 11 L. R. A. 422, 34 Am. St. Rep. 176; Stamper v. Venable, 117 Tenn. 557, 97 S. W. 812; Funkhouser v. Porter, 107 S. W. 202, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 676; Pollard v. Union National Bank, 4 Mo. App. 408; Nichols v. Emery, 109 Cal. 323, 41 Pac. 1089, 50 Am. St. Rep. 43. We would reach the same conclusion, whatever our answers to these questions might be, and it is therefore unnecessary to decide them.

Our conclusion is to reverse the decree below, and enter such decree here as the circuit court should have entered, dismissing the plaintiff's bill with costs to appellant in both courts. And it will be so ordered.

WILLIAMS and BRANNON, JJ. (dissenting). We shall not elaborate our dissent. We hold that the granting clause, using words of grant found in Code 1906, c. 72, §§ 1, 2, passed a full fee along with jus disponendi, that is, full right of alienation, and that the clause reserving to the grantor title and power of alienation is repugnant to the granting clause and void. By established rules of law, constituting through ages rules of property, a man cannot by deed grant and yet hold. It is a rule of law that, where in a deed clauses conflict, that first occurring shall prevail, especially shall the granting clause prevail over any inconsistent clause down lower in the deed. Principles touching the habendum and tenendum clause used in old common-law deeds apply to inconsistent clauses. In that late work, very valuable for its elaborate collection of cases and its annotations, 8 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 444, is a full collection of cases on this intricate, technical subject. Washburn on Real Prop. says: "If there is a clear repugnance between the nature of the estate granted and that limited in the habendum, the latter yields to the former; but if they can be construed so as to stand together by limiting the estate, without contradicting the grant, the court always gives that construction, in order to give effect to both." Just here we would ask how in the world these two clauses can live together in the deed involved in this case? Referring to 8 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 445: "If the habendum be found to be in conflict to the granting clause the habendum must give way upon the theory that the deed shall be construed most strongly against the grantor, in order to prevent a contradiction or retraction by a subsequent part of the deed, or a limitation being placed upon a right which had been granted and given in the premises." "This is a consequence of the rule already stated that deeds shall be construed most strongly against the grantor; therefore, that he shall not be allowed to contradict or retract by any subsequent part of the deed the gift made in the premises." 2 Lomax's Dig. 216. Justice Field says in Cowell v. Springs, 100 U. S. 57, 25 L. Ed. 547: "Repugnant conditions are those which tend to the utter subversion of the estate, such as prohibit entirely the alienation or use of property." Now, does not this second clause prohibit alienation? The power to alien cannot reside in the grantor and grantee both. If the grantor exercise the power of sale, does it not utterly subvert the estate granted by the granting clause? 2 Bacon's Abridgment, 303, says: "If a man make a feoffment in fee, provided that the feoffor shall have the profits, this condition is void, because repugnant to the grant." The deed in this case, for valuable consideration in money paid, in obligation to support, and the assumption by the grantee of the grantor's debts, grants a fee simple, and in its second clause reserves right to legal title in the grantor, and gives him power to sell and pocket the proceeds. We need not be told that the grantor intends to retain the power of sale. He did so intend; but can this be allowed consistently with law? Intent is to prevail, but not against rules of law. We cite Blair v. Muse, 83 Va. 238, 2 S. E. 31, holding: "Unlimited power of alienation is an essential incident of a fee-simple estate. A deed conveys land to four grantors in fee simple. Subsequent clause giving one of them power to dispose of the whole at her pleasure is invalid; the rule being that, where two clauses in a deed are repugnant, the first shall prevail."

1. CARRIERS (§ 247*) — RELATION BETWEEN PASSENGER AND CARRIER.

The relation of carrier and passenger does not terminate merely by the act of the passenger in alighting from the car at his destination. It continues until a reasonable time for the passenger to leave the railway premises has elapsed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 984-993; Dec. Dig. § 247.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 283*)—ASSAULT ON PASSENGERS—JUSTIFICATION.

Provocation by insulting words alone does not justify an assault upon a passenger by the conductor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 283.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 319*)—ASSAULT ON PASSENGER—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

Exemplary damages are allowable in an action against a railway company for willful injury inflicted by the conductor upon a passenger without lawful justification.

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Action by Allen P. McDade against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Wyndham Stokes and Graham Sale, for plaintiff in error. Strother, Taylor & Flanagan, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, P. McDade purchased a ticket at Bluefield which, according to his testimony, entitled him to transportation by the Norfolk and Western Railway Company from that place to Coaldale. The conductor says the ticket was one for Cooper. The train on which he took passage was not scheduled to stop at Coaldale. He was told by the conductor that for Coaldale he would have to get off at Elkhorn. That place was beyond Coaldale. The conductor collected fare for the additional distance. McDade says two additional fares were collected from him during the trip. After the train passed Coaldale and before it reached Elkhorn a stop was made because of an obstruction on the track. McDade naturally took advantage of the opportunity to leave the train there and save distance in returning to Coaldale. He alighted from the car and requested the conductor to return him the extra fare that he had paid. There are different stories in relation to the words that were spoken between McDade and the conductor at the time McDade was leaving the train. The conductor says that McDade called him a most insulting and provoking name after he alighted from the car. It is clear from the evidence—in fact it is conceded—that the only provocation that McDade gave the conductor, if any, was by the use of insulting words. While McDade was still near the train, on the premises of the railway, the conductor violently assaulted him and did him bodily injury. A jury found damages in favor of McDade against the railway company in the sum of $400. From a judgment upon the verdict, the railway company has prosecuted the writ of error now before us.

McDade was still a passenger at the time he was assaulted if reasonable time in which to leave the premises of the railway company had not elapsed. Baldwin on American Railroad Law, 327; 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1592; 2 Hutchinson on Carriers, § 1016; Moore on Carriers, 556. Whether such reasonable time had elapsed before the assault was a question for the jury which they have determined in the negative. An instruction properly submitted this question to them. The jury found from the facts and circumstances that the relation of carrier and passenger had not terminated. There is little conflict of evidence on this feature of the case, and that finding is undoubtedly warranted.

Since McDade had not ceased to be a passenger, the railway company was under an absolute contractual duty to protect him from wilful and unlawful injury at the hands of its servants. The railway company still owed him that duty at the time the injury was done to him. Insulting language alone did not justify the assault. The conductor made the carrier liable when he injured the passenger because of mere words spoken. "For wilful injury, inflicted upon a passenger of a common carrier by a servant of the latter, under provocation, by the exercise of force or violence, not justified under the principles of the law of self-defense, the carrier is liable." Teal v. Coal & Coke Railway Co., 66 S. E. 470.

The point is made that the damages found are excessive. The amount is indeed beyond the compensatory damages proved. But exemplary damages were allowable in this case. The assault was a breach by the carrier, through its conductor, of the duty which it owed to persons intrusting themselves to its care, at its solicitation and for compensation. Claiborne v. Railway Company, 46 W. Va. 363, 33 S. E. 262. The jury were told that they might mitigate the damages if they believed the provocation by the passenger's language warranted their doing so. There is conflict of oral evidence in reference to the use of insulting words. The jury saw the witnesses and were the judges as to the credibility of those witnesses. They were also the judges of the facts and circumstances given in evidence. The question of wantonness and wilfulness was within their province. There is no rule by which the amount of damages found can be said to be excessive.

The verdict is not contrary to the evidence. The trial court rightly applied the law to the case. There is no error in the judgment. It will be affirmed.

STATE ex rel. TULLY v. TAYLOR et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
June 11, 1910.)

INJUNCTION (§ 252*) — ACTION ON BOND — JUDGMENT—EVIDENCE.

When counsel fees and personal expenses are sought to be recovered as damages on an injunction bond, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show either that injunction was the sole relief to which the suit pertained, or that the fees and expenses were paid out solely for the purpose of procuring a dissolution of the injunction as distinguished from expenditures for the hearing of the principal issues involved in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 596, 597; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Braxton County.

Action by the State, for the Use of J. V. Tully, against A. T. Taylor and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded.

W. E. Haymond, for plaintiffs in error.
Alex Dulin and Linn & Byrne, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, P. This suit is one for the recovery of damages on an injunction bond. The damages claimed are based on counsel fees and personal expenses alleged to have been paid out and contracted in securing a dissolution of the injunction in the case of Taylor v. County Court, 57 W. Va. 165, 50 S. E. 720. From a judgment on the injunction bond, by the verdict of a jury, based wholly on counsel fees and expenses relating to that case, the principal and surety come with this writ of error.

It is settled law in this jurisdiction that counsel fees and personal expenses paid out in procuring the dissolution of an injunction are recoverable as damages in an action on the injunction bond. State v. Medford, 34 W. Va. 633, 12 S. E. 864; State v. Corvin, 51 W. Va. 19, 41 S. E. 211. Whatever may be said against the doctrine that such charges may be recovered as damages on an injunction bond, this court has approved that doctrine by the decisions in the cases cited.

When the sole relief sought is the injunction itself, of course the whole expenditure in defense of the suit relates to procuring the dissolution of the injunction awarded therein. The two decisions to which we have referred were in cases of that character. But where other matters are involved in the suit to which the injunction pertains, it is frequently impossible to reliably segregate counsel fees and personal expenses devoted to a dissolution of the injunction from the expenses of defending independent rights in the suit to which the injunction may be merely ancillary. When the injunction is only incidental to other relief sought, the general expenses of the case cannot properly be charged to the injunction. If, however, the expenditures in securing the dissolution of the injunction can be separated from those which would have been incurred on the suit in any event, they are recoverable as damages on the bond. When the right to an injunction is not the sole issue of the case, damages on the bond are limited to the expenses incurred in procuring the dissolution of the injunction as distinguished from the expenses incurred in the hearing of the principal issues involved. It is only when a hearing of the principal issues involved is absolutely necessary to dispose of the injunction that expenditures for the hearing of the case are proper to be allowed as damages caused by an injunction wrongfully issued. The clearest and soundest exposition in the premises is the following one: "Where the attorneys' fees and expenses are incurred in defeating the action, and the dissolution of the injunction is only incident to that result, they are not damages sustained by reason of the injunction. The reason is obvious: expenses for another purpose, and which would have to be incurred whether a preliminary injunction had been granted or not, cannot be set down to the account of the injunction. But where no other relief is asked for but an injunction, the expense to get rid of it on a final hearing, as well as on motion, may be recovered. If a temporary injunction is continued during the pendency of the trial, notwithstanding the objection of the defendant, thus obliging him to try the action in order to secure the dissolution of the injunction, counsel fees incurred for the trial may be recovered: but not for services rendered before the entry of an order continuing the injunction." 2 Sutherland on Damages, § 525. So we hold that when counsel fees and personal expenses are sought to be recovered as damages on an injunction bond, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show either that injunction was the sole relief to which the suit pertained, or that the fees and expenses were paid out solely for the purpose of procuring a dissolution of the injunction as distinguished from expenditures for the hearing of the principal issues involved in the case.

The case of Taylor v. County Court was not purely an injunction case. The injunction issued therein was only ancillary to the main relief sought by the suit. The principal object of that case was to establish the illegality of contracts made by the county court. The bill shows it to have been a suit to vacate those contracts. It struck directly at the invalidity. At any rate, the bill prayed for more relief than a mere injunction. It asked that the contracts be declared void. The injunction feature could have been wholly disregarded and a complete case would have remained. So it could not be called a pure injunction case. The bill made a case without injunction. The injunction prayed for and temporarily awarded was indeed ancillary to the main relief sought—the establishment of the invalidity of the contracts. The injunction was merely an ancillary feature of the case, the purpose of which was to effectuate more fully the main relief. The purpose of that injunction was to hold up payments under the contracts until it could be shown and decreed that those contracts were void. A decree declaring the contracts void would operate practically to end the necessity for the injunction. Thus we see that it was only incidental to the main purposes of the suit.

Though the injunction awarded in the case of Taylor v. County Court was only incidental to the principal issues therein, no distinction has been made in this action on the bond between the expenditures in relation to a dissolution of the injunction and those in relation to the general defense of the suit. Neither the declaration nor the proof introduced under it makes any distinction in this regard. As we have seen, it was incumbent on Tully, the relator plaintiff in this action, since the injunction was incidental to other issues, to show that the fees and expenses were paid out solely for the purpose of procuring a dissolution of the injunction as distinguished from expenditures for the hearing of the principal issues. Tully did not bring himself within this rule. The whole case makes no distinction as to particular expenses in regard to a dissolution and the general expenses of the suit to which the injunction was incidental. No direct effort was made by Tully to get rid of the injunction except by a hearing of the whole case. He set in solely to defeat a permanent injunction—to establish the validity of the contracts—and not to rid himself of the temporary restraint. He seems not to have minded the temporary restraint. Now, as far as is shown by the pleadings and proof, Tully spent no more than he would have spent if no temporary injunction had ever issued. The expense of a general hearing in the case cannot therefore be said to have been caused by the injunction. The principal and surety in the injunction bond are not liable for costs and charges which would have been incurred in any event—for charges which the injunction did not bring about. The case might have been different if Tully had made a direct effort to get rid of the injunction that issued against him. Instead of such effort he only sought to defeat the entry of a decree declaring the contracts void and pronouncing a permanent injunction. He made no effort to defeat the preliminary injunction except by a final hearing of the cause. It does not appear that such hearing was absolutely necessary to a dissolution, or that the expenses for which he sues were other than those that would have been spent if no temporary injunction had ever issued.

The judgment is erroneous. It will be reversed, and the verdict set aside as contrary to law and the evidence. The demurrer to the declaration will be sustained, with leave to amend if the plaintiff is advised so to do.

FULTON v. RAMSEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 29, 1910. Rehearing Denied
June 11, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEARANCE (§ 24*)—SERVICE OF PROCESS—WAIVER OF DEFECTS—APPEARANCE.

Though an appearance in a cause, for any purpose other than to take advantage of defective execution or nonexecution of process, constitutes a waiver of defects in the service of process, the purpose of such appearance must bear some substantial relation to the cause. In other words, it must be a purpose within the cause, not merely collateral thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. §§ 118-143; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

2. APPEARANCE (§ 9*)—GENERAL APPEARANCE.

A mere inquiry, as to whether a continuance can be taken, without waiver of service, or offer to move for a continuance, provided it can be done without such waiver, does not amount to a general appearance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-52; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

3. APPEARANCE (§ 9*)—"GENERAL APPEARANCE."

A "general appearance" must be express or arise by implication from the defendant's seeking, taking, or agreeing to some step or proceeding in the cause beneficial to himself or detrimental to the plaintiff, other than one contesting the jurisdiction only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-52; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3051, 3052.]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. JUDGMENT (§ 299*)—CORRECTION—JUDGMENT BY CONFESSION.

Where no plea, demurrer, or answer is filed, and no resistance made by defendants to entry of the decree, nor any facts introduced by them not alleged in the bill, the decree is upon the bill taken for confessed, if there was an appearance, and the court could correct any error in it upon motion, under the express provisions of Code 1906, § 4036, notwithstanding the expiration of the term at which it was entered.

Brannon and Williams, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Braxton County.

Action by Elwood D. Fulton against Joseph Ramsey, Jr., and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Haymond, for appellant. Morrison & Rider, Lawrence Greer, Appleton D. Palmer, Benj. A. Richmond, and F. C. Nicodemus, Jr., for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. The sole question in this cause, namely, whether Joseph Ramsey, Jr., George J. Gould, and William E. Guy, nonresident defendants, proceeded against by order of publication, appeared herein, in the court below, by attorneys, so as to enable that court to render a personal decree against them, grows out of the operations of what is styled in an agreement, and popularly known, as "the Little Kanawha Syndicate," which agreement is dated December 2, 1901, and was signed by said Ramsey, Gould, Guy, and others. That syndicate seems to have been formed for the purpose of purchasing the Little Kanawha Railroad, large areas of coal lands and other properties in this state, and extending said railroad eastward to Elkins, for connection with the West Virginia Central Railroad, owned by Mr. Gould and his associates, and westward so as to connect with the Wabash Railroad, also owned by them; all with the view of giving said last-mentioned road an outlet to the Atlantic seaboard, developing the coal and timber lands along the connecting lines, and securing traffic for said railroad properties. By the terms of that contract, Ramsey, Gould, and Guy were made syndicate managers, with power to take the title to all syndicate property in their names and make binding contracts concerning the same, all other parties thereto being mere subscribers, without power of management or control. In anticipation of the launching of this enterprise, Mr. Edward D. Fulton had acquired an option on the Little Kanawha Railroad as well as the title to, and options upon, large areas of coal and coal lands and other property in the counties of Braxton, Gilmer, and Lewis. Under certain agreements, and with intent to dispose of the same to the syndicate, he assigned the option on the railroad, at the option price, and assigned his coal and coal land options, and conveyed his coal and coal lands, at certain prices named in the assignments and deeds, to the St. Louis Union Trust Company, to hold as trustee for the syndicate. For some reason, the syndicate concluded to abandon its plan and sell all its property. Accordingly, it failed to carry out its contemplated arrangements with Fulton, and he brought this suit, in the circuit court of Braxton county, to compel specific performance of his alleged contract with the syndicate, claiming the right to compel its managers to accept a conveyance of 17,256.19 acres of land and a large purchase-money liability in his favor. An attachment was sued out on the ground of nonresidence of the defendants and levied on the land, so conveyed to the St. Louis Union Trust Company.

On the 1st day of December, 1908, the following order, relied upon by Fulton as showing a general appearance, was entered: "This day R. W. McMichael and John B. Morrison, attorneys practicing in this court, appeared and asked the court to permit them to appear specially for Joseph Ramsey, Jr., George J. Gould, and William E. Guy, as managers of the Little Kanawha Syndicate, and ask a continuance of this cause for thirty or sixty days to enable them to prepare their defense, or to determine whether they would desire to appear generally, and stating that they did not desire to appear generally for said parties at this time, but that they desired to move the court to continue the cause without appearance other than specially for the purposes of the continuance. The plaintiff, by his counsel, resisted the said motion to continue the hearing, and thereupon said counsel for said defendants Ramsey, Gould, and Guy announced that it was their desire to withdraw and not appear to the case, and thereupon counsel for plaintiff, and while said counsel for defendants were present, asked that the cause be submitted for hearing and accordingly the said cause was submitted for hearing." On the next day, a decree was entered, reciting service of process upon certain defendants and orders of publication as to Ramsey, Gould, Guy, and others, non-residents, and the order of attachment and orders of publication thereon. By it, the amount of the plaintiff's claim and the lands and other property were ascertained, and it was ordered that unless Ramsey, Gould, and Guy, or some one for them, should pay the plaintiff the sum ($367,266.18) within 60 days, a special commissioner, appointed for the purpose, should sell all of the attached coal and coal lands, or enough thereof to pay said debt, interest, and cost. This was not a personal decree. On the 18th day of March, 1909, the plaintiff again appeared and filed a deed, executed by himself and his wife, conveying the lands in question to the St. Louis Union Trust Company, as and for a tender of conveyance to the Little Kanawha Syndicate and its managers, and, deeming the order entered on the 1st day of December, 1908, sufficient to establish submission of Ramsey, Gould, and Guy to the jurisdiction of the court, by appearance, he asked a personal decree against them for the sum of $371,922.83, the amount formerly ascertained and interest thereon, and the court entered it. On the 18th day of May, 1909, said defendants filed a petition, praying vacation of this decree, as one entered upon a bill taken for confessed, which petition was accompanied by affidavits, showing that McMichael and Morrison had never been authorized to enter a general appearance for them, and that said attorneys had had no intention of doing so. On reconsideration of the order of December 1, 1908, the court set aside said decree of March 18, 1909, and, from this decree, Fulton has appealed.

No plea, demurrer or answer having been filed, nor any resistance made by the defendants to the entry of the decree, nor any facts introduced by them, not alleged in the bill, the decree of March 18, 1909, was, in fact and law, as well as by profession, a decree upon the bill taken for confessed, if there was an appearance; and the court could correct any error in it, upon motion, under section 5 of chapter 134 of the Code of 1906, notwithstanding the expiration of the term at which it had been entered. Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 533; Steenrod v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 133; Bock v. Bock, 24 W. Va. 586; Hunter v. Kenedy, 20 W. Va. 343.

This being true, the inquiries are whether there was an appearance in the cause, not merely in the court, for any purpose, and, if so, a general appearance, or one that must be deemed and regarded as a general appearance, notwithstanding the expressed desire that it be treated and held to be special, or one for a certain limited purpose and no other, and, if an appearance in the cause, whether it bound the defendants. The petition sought vacation of the decree upon the following grounds: (1) That the order entered on December 1, 1908, does not show a general appearance; and (2) that the attorneys McMichael and Morrison had no authority to enter such an appearance. It is accompanied by affidavits, showing not only want of authority in the attorneys to enter the appearance, but also the details of the transaction of December 1, 1908, substantially recorded in the order. Counteraffidavits were filed by the plaintiff, somewhat variant as to these details, from the statements in the affidavits, filed by the defendant.

Under the impression that a false recital of appearance can be reached only by bill in equity or a similar proceeding, the court below disregarded the affidavits and dealt only with interpretation of the order, reaching the conclusion that it did not show an appearance in the cause. As we concur in that conclusion, we deem it unnecessary to enter upon any inquiry as to whether the affidavits, in so far as they show details of the transaction of December 1, 1908, not entered upon the record, might have been considered. If the recitals of the order can be contradicted or added to, we suggest, but do not decide, that a motion, under section 1 of chapter 134 of the Code of 1906, might be as available as a bill in equity. If such an error is one of fact, correction thereof is within the letter and spirit of said section, and the remedy there given has been successfully invoked and suggested, under somewhat similar circumstances. Carlton's Adm'r v. Ruffner, 12 W. Va. 297; Watt v. Brookover, 35 W. Va. 323, 13 S. E. 1007, 29 Am. St. Rep. 811; Lumber Co. v. Lance & Co., 50 W. Va. 636, 41 S. E. 128; Gunn v. Turner's Adm'r, 21 Grat. (Va.) 382; 4 Min. Ins. 848; 2 Tuck. Comm. 328; Powell, App. Pro. § 116.

We think the order was nothing more than an inquiry, addressed to the court, for information as to what could be done by way of obtaining a postponement of action in the cause, without submitting to the jurisdiction of the court for all purposes, or a conditional, not an absolute and unqualified, motion for a continuance. The motion, as recorded, if it can be regarded as a motion, signified a desire for a continuance, if it could be had without a waiver of service of process upon the defendants, but distinctly declared unwillingness to ask or take a continuance, if it involved such a waiver. It does not say in express terms that a motion to continue was made. On the contrary, it says McMichael and Morrison asked the court to permit them to appear specially for their clients and ask a continuance, to enable them to determine whether they would desire to appear generally, and stated that they did not desire to appear generally at that time. It then says counsel for plaintiff resisted "said motion to continue." That means the motion or request made. It was not in terms a motion, and, read in the light of the protest, submitted along with it, it cannot be regarded as anything more, in substance and effect, than an offer to move for a continuance, if it could be done without waiving process, accompanied by a declaration of intent not to move at all, if such action involved waiver, and an immediate declaration of determination not to say or do anything more, after having been informed that a motion for a continuance, so made and described upon the record, would be in law a submission to the jurisdiction of the court.

We apprehend no dissent from the proposition that the establishment of the jurisdiction of a court, whether over the person or the subject-matter, must be affirmatively shown by the record. Groves v. Grant County Court, 42 W. Va. 587, 600, 26 S. E. 460. Something must be done to confer it. Jurisdiction of the person may be acquired by implication, arising out of some act done, or by direct and positive acknowledgment thereof; but in either event, it should clearly appear. It ought to be reasonably free from uncertainty and doubt. A favorite statement of the rule, respecting the acquisition of jurisdiction by implication or waiver, is this: "By appearance to the action in any case, for any other purpose than to take advantage of the defective execution, or non-execution, of process, a defendant places himself precisely in the situation in which he would be if process were executed upon him, and he thereby waives all objection to the defective execution or nonexecution of process upon him." State v. Coal Co., 49 W. Va. 143, 38 S. E. 539; Lumber Co. v. Lance, 50 W. Va. 640, 41 S. E. 128; Layne v. Railroad Co., 35 W. Va. 438, 14 S. E. 123; Blankenship v. Railway Co., 43 W. Va. 135, 27 S. E. 355; Mahany v. Kephert, 15 W. Va. 609; Bank v. Bank, 3 W. Va. 386. This is a declaration of a general principle, to be read in the light of the facts and circumstances under which it is applied, in seeking its true meaning. Some attention must also be paid to its terms. It must be an appearance for a purpose in the cause, not one merely collateral to it. In this state, litigants have put themselves within this rule, for the most part, by asking or accepting some sort of relief in the cause, consistent with the hypothesis of a submission and inconsistent with any other view, such as a continuance. No instance can be found in which a party has been held to have impliedly bound himself to submission, without having asked or received some relief in the cause or participated in some step taken therein. Mere presence in the courtroom when the case is called, or examination of the papers in it filed in the clerk's office, is not enough. Nor could a conversation with plaintiff's counsel or the judge of the court, about the case, be regarded as an appearance. No decision goes that far. Under this text in 3 Cyc. 504, "Any action on the part of defendant, except to object to the jurisdiction, which recognizes the case as in court, will amount to a general appearance," a long list of decisions is cited, but, in every one of them, something was done in the cause—some affirmative act was done to delay, speed, or defend the cause. In every instance the conduct, deemed a waiver, amounted to more than a mere inquiry or conversation about it. The test, according to a late decision of the federal Supreme Court (Merchant's Heat & Light Co. v. Clow & Sons, 204 U. S. 286, 27 Sup. Ct. 285, 51 L. Ed. 488), is whether the defendant became an actor in the cause. The instances of the assumption of the rôle of actor in a suit disclosed by the federal decisions, are such as the taking of a continuance; filing a demurrer to plaintiff's pleadings, without limiting it to the question of jurisdiction; filing a plea of intervention; pleading to issue or to the merits in the first instance; or filing sets-off, counter-claims, or notices of recoupment. Broad as is this doctrine of waiver, it does not cover all acts done by a defendant. He may talk even to the court about the merits of the cause without subjecting himself to it. In Citizens' Saving & Trust Co. v. Railroad Co., 205 U. S. 46, 27 Sup. Ct. 425, 51 L. Ed. 703, argument upon the merits of the cause was indulged in, at the hearing upon the sufficiency of the pleas to the jurisdiction, and this was relied upon as constituting a general appearance; but Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the court, said: "This is too harsh an interpretation of what occurred in the court below. There was no motion for the dismissal of the bill for want of equity. The discussion of the merits was permitted or invited by the court in order that it might be informed on that question in the event it concluded to consider the merits along with the question of the sufficiency of the pleas to the jurisdiction. We are satisfied that the defendants did not intend to waive the benefit of their qualified appearance at the time of filing the pleas to the jurisdiction." In Pendleton v. Russell, 144 U. S. 640, 12 Sup. Ct. 743, 36 L. Ed. 574, a receiver of a dissolved life insurance company appeared in the Supreme Court of the United States and prosecuted a writ of error to obtain a release of property, pledged to indemnify the sureties in a supersedeas bond, given upon a writ of error to a judgment against the company. That judgment was reversed and the case remanded to the circuit court, where, without summoning the receiver and without any appearance by him, another judgment was recovered in the action, which was filed as a claim against the assets of the company in the hands of the receiver and disallowed, on the ground that the court which rendered it had no jurisdiction of the receiver. From this judgment of disallowance, an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and it was there held that the prosecution of the writ of error by the receiver and the remanding of the case, at his instance, did not give the court below jurisdiction over him, and that the judgment did not bind the assets in his hands. In Fairbank & Co. v. Cincinnati, etc., Ry. Co., 54 Fed. 420, 4 C. C. A. 403, 38 L. R. A. 271, the court held as follows: "Where a defendant appears specially for the purpose of moving to quash the return on the summons, the fact that, in such motion, it also prays judgment whether it should be compelled to plead, for the reason that it is a nonresident corporation, does not constitute a waiver of the objection to the service." These precedents amply sustain the view that something substantially beneficial to the defendant or detrimental to the plaintiff, relating to or affecting the progress of the cause, asked, done, or accepted by the former, is essential to the establishment of a waiver of process or service thereof.

There must be something more than a mere pretext for the claim of jurisdiction over him. He must either enter an appearance, ask some relief in the cause, accept some benefit as a step therein or do something from which the necessary implication of submission to the jurisdiction of the court over his person arises. "The principle to be extracted from the decisions on the subject as to when a special appearance is converted into a general one is that, where the defendant appears and asks some relief which can only be granted on the hypothesis that the court has jurisdiction of the cause and the person, it is a submission to the jurisdiction of the court as completely as if he had been regularly served with process, whether such an appearance, by its terms, be limited to a special purpose or not." 2 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 625. "The expression 'for any purpose connected with the cause,' however, is not to be taken as wholly unrestricted in meaning. The appearance must have some relation to the merits of the controversy, and the purpose must be to invoke some action on the part of the court having direct bearing in some way upon the question of the judgment or decree proper to be entered." Bank v. Knox, 133 Iowa, 443, 446, 109 N. W. 201. The general principle, upon which we rely, was applied by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Lowrie v. Castle, 198 Mass. 82, 83 N. E. 1118, under circumstances even more unfavorable to the defendant than those presented here. The nonresident defendant in that case, within 10 days after the return day of the writ, applied to the court for an extension of the time within which he could appear, in order that he might decide whether to waive the lack of proper service and voluntarily appear, or to insist upon his rights as a nonresident, and the court allowed such extension. After the expiration of the 10 days, but within the period of the extension allowed, he moved to dismiss the action, stating in his motion that he appeared only for the purpose of moving a dismissal, and the motion was sustained. The appellate court held it to be within the inherent power of the trial court to grant such an extension, without prejudice to the right to except to the jurisdiction, and affirmed the judgment of dismissal. In delivering the opinion of the court, Hammond, Judge, said: "It is to be borne in mind that this is not a case where a defendant, upon whom process has been duly served, and who, therefore, is within the jurisdiction of the court and liable to default if he does not seasonably appear, asks for delay. It is a case where a nonresident defendant who, for lack of service upon him, is not within the jurisdiction and cannot be brought within it, fearing lest the court may regard the service sufficient and default him, comes into court, and says, in substance, that he is in doubt whether to waive proper service and voluntarily appear, or to insist upon his rights as a nonresident, and ask for time to decide. Certainly it is a part of the inherent power in a court to set a time within which the nonresident must make up his mind and act accordingly. And that was all the court did. The motions for dismissal were properly before the court." Against this express decision of a reputable and able court, under a state of facts less favorable to the defendant than those presented here, and other decisions, showing that something substantial must be asked or done by the defendant, relating to or affecting the merits of the cause, we have nothing but a generalization, founded upon, and, therefore, to be interpreted by, facts falling far short of those disclosed here, for the proposition that a mere offer by defendant to move for a continuance provided it can be done without a waiver of service, accompanied by his declaration of intention not to appear generally nor to ask or take such continuance, if it involved such waiver, and signification of his desire and determination to withdraw the request, for nothing but a request had been made, on being informed that such a motion would be a general appearance, is bound thereby. We feel amply justified, upon authority as well as upon reason and principle, in withholding our assent to it, and saying such action did not constitute a general appearance. If we could notice the fact, shown by the affidavits, but not by the order, that the court, with the assent of counsel for the plaintiff, agreed to take the request under advisement until the next morning, it would not alter our conclusion. That did not make it a motion for a continuance, nor constitute a continuance. It was only an agreement to further consider the conditional offer to move for a continuance.

In view of this conclusion, power to inquire whether McMichael and Morrison had authority to enter a general appearance, and whether the decree could be avoided for lack thereof, by motion or otherwise, becomes an immaterial question, and we refrain from discussion thereof.

Perceiving no error in the decree appealed from, we affirm it.

BRANNON, J. (dissenting.) The plain, real construction of the record is that Ramsey, Gould, and Guy asked a continuance, and thus appeared; but say that this is going too far. Then, we can say by the very letter of the record that they "appeared and asked the court to permit them to appear specially, and ask a continuance of this cause for thirty or sixty days to enable them to prepare their defense, or to determine whether they would desire to appear generally, and stating that they did not desire to appear generally for said parties at this time, but that they desired to move the court to continue the cause without appearance other than specially for the purposes of the continuance." Another part of the record says that one of their counsel "proceeded to argue at some length the right to such continuance and appearance, and did move the court for leave to so appear specially and continue the case." When counsel for those parties argued for right to make such special appearance, the plaintiff resisted any continuance and asked that the case be submitted for decree, and counsel for Ramsey, Gould, and Guy then asked time "until next morning to determine what course they would pursue, the court not having acted upon the motion aforesaid; and counsel for plaintiff assented to said request, the court saying nothing, but tacitly assenting thereto; and later on the same day, within about half an hour, and before the court had taken any action, said Morrison, of counsel for said defendants, returned into court, and stated that they desired to withdraw and not appear in the case," and in the presence of Morrison the plaintiff submitted the case for decree. What is this in plain intent but a motion to continue? It was either an appearance or not one; and if any appearance, what but a motion for continuance? But say that is going too far. Then it was a motion, not denying jurisdiction, but recognizing a case in court, and asking relief; that is, asking from the court an order in the case giving leave to appear specially; and if such order be made, then to ask actual continuance. If leave had been granted, and a continuance had for 60 days, it would have been a general appearance. What difference that leave was not given? They moved for an order in the case, not denying the presence of a case or the jurisdiction or its power to make orders and decrees, but admitting that power. I will not argue in my own language that this is an appearance justifying a decree, but will cite authorities to sustain this position.

"If a party appear in a suit for any purpose other than to object to the legality of process or its service, it is a general, not a special, appearance, and dispenses with service of process." Frank v. Zeigler, 46 W. Va. 614, 33 S. E. 761.

"Procuring or Consenting to a Continuance.—Procuring a continuance of a cause operates a general appearance; and, likewise, an application by motion or otherwise for a continuance is a general appearance." 2 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 633. Layne v. Railroad Co., 35 W. Va. 438, 14 S. E. 123.

"An appearance by attorney, so as to secure an extension of the time to plead or answer, is a general appearance, and defendants cannot thereafter have their appearance taken as special to plead to the jurisdiction." Briggs v. Stroud (C. C.) 58 Fed. 717.

"A defendant is also considered to have made a general appearance when he applies for or obtains leave to answer, or when he applies for or obtains an extension of time to answer." 3 Cyc. 507.

"The appearance by a party who asks a postponement until his attorney could arrive is a general appearance, although the attorney, when he arrives, moves to quash the service as insufficient." Epps v. Sasby, 43 Ark. 545.

Justice Brewer said that the mere fact that a party proclaims or declares that his appearance is special does not make it so or convert what in law is a general appearance into a special appearance. Burdett v. Corgan, 28 Kan. 102. Also Kaw Life Ass'n v. Lemke, 40 Kan. 142, 19 Pac. 337. So Grantier v. Rosecrance, 27 Wis. 488. The nature of the appearance of this case makes it a general appearance.

"It is imperative that a party must occupy no ambiguous position. A party must either appear at a trial and abide the consequences, or not appear. He cannot occupy an uncertain status, partly appearing and partly not appearing." 2 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 593.

In the same volume on page 625 we find this: "The principle to be extracted from the decisions on the subject as to when a special appearance is converted into a general one, is that, where the defendant appears and asks some relief which can only be granted on the hypothesis that the court has jurisdiction of the cause and the person, it is a submission to the jurisdiction of the court as completely as if he had been regularly served with process, whether such an appearance, by its terms, be limited to a special purpose or not. Where a party appears in court and objects by motion to the jurisdiction of the court over his person, he must state specially the grounds of objection; by not so stating them his appearance will be construed a general one, although he moves to dismiss on that ground." Supported by Belknap v. Charlton, 25 Or. 41, 34 Pac. 758, and Blackburn v. Sweet, 38 Wis. 578. Here, I ask, how could the court make the order asked by the defendant if it had no jurisdiction, if there was no case? How could it do so except upon the hypothesis that the court had jurisdiction of the cause and person?

"I think a defendant may appear specially to object to the jurisdiction of the court, either over his person or the subject-matter of the suit, without waiving his right to be heard on the question in bank. But if, by motion or by other form of application to the court, he seeks to bring its power into action, except on the question of jurisdiction, he will be deemed to have appeared generally. Such application concedes a cause over which the court has power to act." Porter v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 1 Neb. 15.

"The rule is this: If the defendant does anything, or takes any step in the case which can be fairly construed into an admission that the case is properly in court, he will be held to have waived not only defects in the process, but the process itself." Cropsey v. Wiggenhorn, 3 Neb. 108. So in McKillop v. Harvey, 80 Neb. 264, 114 N. W. 155.

"Acts Recognizing Case as in Court. In General.—Any action on the part of defendant, except to object to the jurisdiction, which recognizes the case as in court, will amount to a general appearance." 3 Cyc. 504.

Any action recognizing case in court is a general appearance. Lampley v. Beaver, 25 Ala. 534.

Appearance for any other purpose than to question jurisdiction. 2 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 632 and 621; Zobel v. Zobel, 151 Cal. 98, 90 Pac. 191.

"If jurisdiction is essential to the granting of the relief sought, the appearance is general, regardless of the purpose or character of the appearance." Winter v. Union P. Co., 51 Or. 97, 93 Pac. 931.

"In order to object to the jurisdiction of the court, either over the person or the subject-matter, a special appearance may be made, but if the appearance is for any other purpose, it will be considered general. An application for a continuance is an appearance, and waives defects in the service of process." Ulmer v. Haitt, 4 G. Greene (Iowa) 439.

An apt rule is this given in Lowe v. Stringham, 14 Wis. 225: "If a party wishes to insist upon the objection that he is not in court, he must keep out for all purposes except to make that objection. Caughy v. Vance, 3 Chand. [Wis.] 315, 316; Thayer v. Dove, 8 Blackf. [Ind.] 567." Likewise Security Co. v. Boston, 126 Cal. 418, 58 Pac. 942.

The parties withdrew their appearance. How could they, if there had been none? But they had no consent of the court to withdraw. This is necessary. U. S. v. Curry, 6 How. 106, 12 L. Ed. 363. After such withdrawal, the appearance is not destroyed, but is still good for judgment. Eldred v. Bank, 17 Wall. 546, 21 L. Ed. 685; Rio Grande Irr. Co. v. Gildersleeve, 174 U. S. 603, 19 Sup. Ct. 761, 43 L. Ed. 1103; Creighton v. Kerr, 20 Wall. 13, 22 L. Ed. 309.

WILLIAMS, J., dissents, and concurs in this opinion.

Note by BRANNON, J. By chance I meet two cases bearing on the subject. In Yale v. Edgerton, 11 Minn. 271 (Gil. 184), the defendant, appearing specially, made a motion to set aside the summons, and later the amended summons, etc. These motions were both submitted to the court, and while under advisement, the time to answer being about to expire, the defendant obtained an order extending the time to answer, stating that he appeared specially. The court said: "To extend the time to answer is a favor which can only be granted in an action. And to ask a favor, an extension of time to answer on the merits, is a submission to the jurisdiction of the court. There is no protest in the act itself against the jurisdiction, as in a special appearance to vacate the summons."

In Mulhearn v. Press Pub. Co., 53 N. J. Law, 150, 20 Atl. 790, was a motion to dismiss for want of service of process, and later time was given to demur or plead. The court held this grant of time to plead or demur was not a general appearance; and said that, if the motion for extension of time had been first made, it would have been an appearance. Remember that in our case there was no exception in any form to jurisdiction or denial that there was a suit in court.

TENNANT'S HEIRS v. FRETTS et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
June 11, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. QUIETING TITLE (§ 7)—REMOVAL OF CLOUD ON TITLE—RIGHT TO EQUITABLE REMEDY.

Equity has jurisdiction, at the suit of an owner of land who is in possession thereof under a good legal title, to remove a cloud from his title by a decree canceling and expunging from the records of the county in which the land is situate a void deed, or writing, constituting a cloud upon, or menace to, his title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. QUIETING TITLE (§ 7*)—REMOVAL OF CLOUD ON TITLE—JURISDICTION OF EQUITY.

The power of a court of equity to grant relief, in such case, is independent of any statute conferring jurisdiction, and rests on general equity principles and practice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. COURTS (§ 7*)—LOCAL ACTION—VENUE.

A suit to remove cloud and quiet title is local in its nature, and the jurisdiction of the court is determined by the situs of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 14-31; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

4. QUIETING TITLE (§ 52*)—DECREE—OPERATION.

The decree for relief in such suit operates generally, if not always, in rem, and need not be in personam.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. § 102; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

5. JUDGMENT (§ 17*)—PROCESS TO SUSTAIN JUDGMENT—NONRESIDENTS—SUBSTITUTED SERVICE—JUDGMENT IN REM.

The statute (sections 11, 12, 13, c. 124, Code 1906) providing for service of process on a nonresident by publication, or by personal service out of the state, cannot authorize the rendition of a personal judgment or decree against a nonresident so served; but it does authorize any court, whether of law or of equity, to pronounce a judgment or decree binding in rem, in any case in which such court would otherwise be competent to do so, if the defendant were personally served within the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 26; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

6. JUDGMENT (§ 17*)—PROCESS TO SUSTAIN JUDGMENT—SERVICE ON NONRESIDENT BY PUBLICATION—DECREE IN REM.

Equity may, upon service of process on a nonresident by publication, remove cloud from title to land within its jurisdiction by a decree binding only in rem.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Bill by the heirs of Peter Tennant against A. E. Fretts and others. Decree for complainants, and the mentioned defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. G. Bennett and Goodwin & Reay, for appellant. Terence D. Stewart and Charles E. Hogg, for appellees.

WILLIAMS, J. This is an appeal by A. E. Fretts from a decree of the circuit court of Monongalia county, made on the 19th of May, 1908, granting relief to plaintiffs upon a bill to remove cloud from title to land.

The following are the facts: On May 2, 1900, Peter Tennant executed to A. E. Fretts a writing under seal, which plaintiffs call an option, but which defendants insist is a contract of sale, agreeing to sell to him the "Pittsburg or River vein of coal" underlying 163 acres of land in Monongalia county at $25 per acre. This writing was signed by both Tennant and Fretts, but was not acknowledged by Tennant. On the 4th of May, 1900, Fretts acknowledged it before a notary public in Pennsylvania, and on the same day, by writing indorsed on the back of the instrument, assigned his interest therein to Wm. Allison of Uniontown, Pa. He acknowledged this assignment also before a notary public in Pennsylvania. On the 22d of May, 1900, both the original contract and the assignment were recorded in Monongalia county, W. Va. Nothing was ever paid to Tennant on the contract, except the $1 consideration recited in it. Peter Tennant died in August, 1904. On the 3d of November, 1905, his heirs sold the same vein of coal to Smith Hood, Jr., and Homer C. Price, for $95 per acre, to be paid, one-third upon approval of title and acceptance of deed, and the balance in one and two years from acceptance of deed. Hood and Price discovered the Fretts contract on record, and refused to make payment until the rights of Fretts and Allison in the coal were determined. Thereupon the heirs of Peter Tennant brought this suit, praying to have the Fretts contract canceled as constituting a cloud upon their title. Fretts and Allison are both residents of Pennsylvania, and were both personally served with original process in that state. Allison did not appear; but Fretts appeared by counsel and demurred, answered, and filed a cross-bill praying for specific execution of the contract.

The first question presented is one of jurisdiction. Counsel for Fretts insist that the court is without jurisdiction to grant relief upon personal service of process upon defendants in Pennsylvania, which has no more effect than an order of publication, published in a newspaper. This question has never before been presented to this court for adjudication. If relief in such case cannot be decreed, it might often happen that a party would be without remedy. It is not within the sovereign power of a state to give extraterritorial effect to the decrees and processes of its courts, nor is there any means by which a resident of one state can be compelled to submit himself to the civil jurisdiction of the courts of another. Consequently, it follows that, unless the circuit court of Monongalia county had jurisdiction to grant relief by means of an in rem decree, plaintiffs are practically remediless. The courts of Pennsylvania cannot give them relief, because a decree of the court of that state could not affect title to land in this state. Wilson v. Braden, 48 W. Va. 196, 36 S. E. 367; Polindexter v. Burnwell, 82 Va. 507; Gibson v. Burgess, 82 Va. 650; Vaught v. Meador, 99 Va. 569, 39 S. E. 225, 86 Am. St. Rep. 908; Cooley v. Scarlett, 38 Ill. 316, 87 Am. Dec. 298; Fall v. Eastin, 215 U. S. 1, 30 Sup. Ct. 3, 54 L. Ed. —, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 924. The relief in this case must come through the direct operation of the decree upon the subject-matter, or not at all. It is not a case where the relief depends upon an act which a court of equity may compel a defendant to perform, such, for instance, as the execution of a deed in completion of a contract, or the surrender of title to land acquired in violation of trust or by some species of mala fides. In cases of that character the court having jurisdiction of the person of defendant, may grant relief by compelling the defendant to perform the act essential to accomplish it. The decree in such cases would be purely in personam, and while they could not directly affect real estate in another state, yet the relief could be obtained through the act of the party, even to the extent of conveying land in another state. In such case it is the act of the party that affects the land, not the court's decree. Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 143, 3 L. Ed. 181; Guerrant v. Fowler, 1 Hen. & M. (Va.) 6; Farley v. Shippen, Wythe (Va.) 254; Dickinson v. Hoomes, 8 Grat. (Va.) 353; Wilson v. Braden, 48 W. Va. 196, 36 S. E. 367; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Western & Atl. R. R. Co., 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 54; Mullen v. Dows, 94 U. S. 444, 24 L. Ed. 207; Wood v. Warner, 15 N. J. Eq. 81. But in the present case the suit is to cancel, and expunge from the records of Monongalia county, a writing which constitutes a cloud upon plaintiffs' title to land in this state, and unless the decree of the West Virginia court can operate directly upon the subject-matter, in other words, unless the court can pronounce an in rem decree, plaintiffs are without means of relief. They are in possession of the land and have the legal title; there is nothing that a Pennsylvania court can compel defendants to do that will afford them relief. But counsel for appellant insist that a court of equity cannot pronounce an in rem decree in the absence of a statute authorizing it to do so, and that we have no such statute. We must admit that there is no statute conferring jurisdiction on courts of equity to make an in rem decree in suits to quiet title, and the action of the lower court must be sustained, if sustained at all, upon principles of general equity practice.

But can it be possible that a court of equity is powerless to grant relief by way of canceling a recorded writing which affects title to land within its jurisdiction, without it can obtain jurisdiction of the defendant also? Is this the state of our law? Does equity never act except upon the person? Is a statute necessary to give equity jurisdiction to quiet title where it cannot get jurisdiction of the person of defendant? We do not think so. Equity has exercised jurisdiction to grant such relief, independent of statute, both in England and in this country, for more than a century. Hayward v. Dimsdale, 17 Vez. 111; Grover v. Hugell, 3 Russ. (Eng. Ch.) 428; Ward v. Ward, 3 N. C. 226; Pettit v. Shepherd, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 493, 28 Am. Dec. 437; Apthorp v. Comstock, 2 Paige (N. Y.) 482; Shattuck v. Carson, 2 Cal. 588; Norton v. Beaver, 5 Ohio, 178; Groves v. Webber, 72 Ill. 606; O'Hare v. Downing, 180 Mass. 16; Ambler v. Leach, 15 W. Va. 677; Waldron v. Harvey, 54 W. Va. 608, 46 S. E. 603, 102 Am. St. Rep. 959; Smith v. O'Keefe, 43 W. Va. 172, 27 S. E. 353. This power is inherent in courts of equity. It needs no statute to confer jurisdiction on courts of equity to quiet title, any more than to set aside a fraudulent conveyance or specifically enforce a contract for sale of land. It was the rigid rules of the common law, and strict adherence to former decisions, simply as precedents, that made courts of equity necessary, and ever since their formation it has been the boast of the chancellor that there is no right which has not a corresponding remedy. 1 Pom. Eq. § 108. One of the principal grounds of original equity jurisdiction rests on the fact that courts of law are not always adequate to afford the relief, and in any case where, according to the principles of natural justice, there is a right to be protected, or enforced, and the law has not provided an adequate remedy, equity takes jurisdiction. Bowyer v. Creigh, 3 Rand. (Va.) 25. We cannot say that equity is impotent in the present case to grant relief, simply because defendants are beyond the jurisdiction of the court and cannot be compelled to obey its process. Equity can remove a cloud from title to land within the court's jurisdiction without having before it the person of defendant. It has power to make a decree which may operate upon the subject-matter of the suit, notwithstanding such a decree is, in its nature, in rem. It would indeed be a deplorable condition if our law afforded no relief to a landowner who is in possession of his land under good and sufficient title, but which happens to be incumbered by some adverse claim, or lien of record, which had been discharged but not released. Such claims might never disturb his possession, but they are a menace to his title, and may greatly affect the selling value of his land. No citizen whose lands are thus affected can enjoy his rights of property to the full extent, so long as the jus disponendi is thus interfered with. Every state owes to its citizens the duty to protect the rights of property, as well as the persons, of its citisens, and we think the laws of this state are ample to authorize the court to give relief in the present case.

The land is situate in Monongalia county, and this gave the court of that county jurisdiction. The subject-matter of the suit is local. Cooley v. Scarlett, 38 Ill. 316, 87 Am. Dec. 298. The suit could not have been brought in any other court. It is local in its nature, like the abating of a nuisance (Miss. & Mo. R. R. Co. v. Ward, 2 Black, 485, 17 L. Ed. 381) or the enjoining of an act which affects real estate (Northern Ind. R. R. Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. R. Co., 15 How. 233, 14 L. Ed. 674).

The next question is, is the court authorized to grant relief in this case upon an order of publication against a nonresident? We think it is. Of course a court cannot pronounce a judgment or decree that will be binding on the person of the nonresident defendant, or that can have any force or effect whatever beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the court, upon other than personal service of process. The leading case of Pennoyer v. Neff, 96 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565, settles this principle. But where the proceeding is in rem, as upon attachment of property, or where the judgment or decree is to settle and determine the title to real estate within the court's jurisdiction, it is competent for the Legislature to provide for service of process by publication against a nonresident defendant. Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 308, 19 L. Ed. 931; Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 316, 10 Sup. Ct. 557, 33 L. Ed. 918; Witten v. St. Clair, 27 W. Va. 762. But counsel for defendant insists that the Legislature of West Virginia has not made any provision for an order of publication to be had in a suit in equity to remove cloud from title. This depends upon the construction to be given to sections 11, 12 and 13 of chapter 124, Code 1906. This chapter deals with process of the court, and the manner of service thereof; its scope is not confined to processes to be issued by any particular courts, or in any special suits, or actions. Section 2 of this chapter begins by saying, "Process from any court," etc. This applies to courts in chancery as well as courts of law. Sections 11, 12 and 13 provide for order of publication against nonresident defendants, and how the same shall be published. Section 13 provides that personal service on a defendant outside of the state shall have the same effect as an order of publication duly posted and published against him. These provisions must be considered as applying to a nonresident defendant in any action at law, or suit in equity, where the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action or suit, and can render a judgment, or decree, in rem. Section 13 closes as follows: "Upon any trial or hearing under this section, such judgment, decree, or order shall be entered as may appear just." While these provisions are not intended to confer equity jurisdiction in cases not otherwise cognizable in equity, it clearly warrants the service of process by publication in any case where equity has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and is not obliged to have the defendant personally in court in order to give the proper relief. If it be true that a statute is necessary to give equity jurisdiction to quiet title to land, or if it be true that equity can grant relief only by means of a personal decree, except when it is otherwise expressly authorized by statute, the above provisions for service of process by publication can have no application in the present suit. But we do not understand that equity jurisdiction, to pronounce a decree in rem, is dependent upon statute. Pomeroy in his work (Eq. Juris.) says: "The decrees in a court of equity may be made to operate in rem to the same extent and in the same manner as judgments at law." Vol. 1, § 135. It depends upon the character of the wrong, and the nature of the relief which the court is asked to grant, whether or not the decree must be in rem, or in personam. The most usual method of procedure in equity is by decrees which directly affect the person. But it seems to be an established rule, that if the subject-matter of the suit is local, and the relief sought is such that it requires the performance of no act by the defendant to give effect to the court's decree, it can make a decree which will operate directly upon the subject-matter.

The case of Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 316, 10 Sup. Ct. 557, 33 L. Ed. 918, bears on this subject, and is cited in the briefs of counsel for both plaintiffs and defendant, as authority for their respective contentions. That was an action in the Circuit Court for the District of Nebraska to recover possession of land and quiet title. The plaintiff obtained judgment, and the defendant carried the case to the Supreme Court of the United States. As we understand the decision in that case, it settles no other principle than that a state has authority to provide, by statute, for the settlement of title to real estate within the state, in which a nonresident defendant may claim title or interest, and that such nonresident may be served by publication. It does not decide that a nonresident may not also be brought in, by publication, to answer a suit brought to quiet title to land, where the court has jurisdiction of such suit on principles of general equity practice, independent of a statute conferring such jurisdiction. There had been a decree or judgment in favor of Charles L. Flint against Michael Hurley and another, in the state court of Nebraska, adjudicating title to land as against the defendants who had been proceeded against by publication as nonresidents. The question was whether the judgment of the state court was res judicata upon privies to the original parties, in the ejectment suit subsequently brought to recover the same land in the United States court, and the Supreme Court held that the judgment of the state court was binding on the nonresident. It is true that there was a statute of Nebraska authorizing suits to try title to land, upon publication, but that fact does not make that case decisive of the point in the present case. A number of cases are cited by Mr. Justice Brewer, who delivered the opinion of the court, both from the state courts and from the Supreme Court of the United States, all of which go no farther than to support the general doctrine that the states have power to provide for the settlement of title to lands within their territorial limits, and that the title, or interest, of a nonresident therein may be settled, and determined against him upon publication. The most of the cases on this point are from states which have, by statute, greatly enlarged the jurisdiction of equity, which was originally exercised only for the purpose of quieting title in favor of the owner of the legal title who was in possession. In many states the statutes have so enlarged the original equity jurisdiction as to enable the court to determine any question of title, whether legal or equitable, between conflicting claimants, and whether the plaintiff be in or out of possession. These statutes have been uniformly upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. But we find no decision which denies the doctrine that equity has original jurisdiction to remove a cloud and quiet title to land, in a suit brought by the legal owner who is in possession. Equity, unless aided by statute, will not entertain such a suit under any other conditions, and when such conditions do exist, no statute is needed to confer jurisdiction.

It is true that in the case of Hart v. Sansom, 110 U. S. 151, 154, 3 Sup. Ct. 586, 588 (28 L. Ed. 101) it was held that a judgment of the state court of Texas, rendered upon a petition to recover land, and quiet title, wherein Hart had been proceeded against by publication, was not binding on him. But the court did not so hold because the state court was not authorized to render a binding judgment in such case upon publication, but because the allegations of the petition did not sufficiently set forth and describe the claim or interest of Hart in the land. The court in its opinion by Justice Gray, says: "The petition alleged that Wilkerson was in possession; and that the other defendants, except Hart, held recorded deeds, which were fraudulent and void, and cast a cloud upon the plaintiffs' title. But as to Hart, it did not allege that he was in possession, or was in privity with the other defendants, or that he held any deed, but only that he set up some pretended claim and title. And the verdict finds that he claimed the land, but had no title of record or otherwise therein. The judgment is that the plaintiffs recover the land of the defendants, and that the deeds mentioned in the petition be and are annulled and canceled, and the cloud thereby removed, and for costs; and execution is awarded for costs only, and not for any writ or process in the nature of a writ of possession or habere facias.

It is difficult to see how any part of that judgment (except for costs) is applicable to Hart; for that part which is for recovery of possession certainly cannot apply to Hart, who was not in possession; and that part which removed the cloud upon plaintiffs' title appears to be limited to the cloud created by the deeds mentioned in the petition, and the petition does not allege, and the verdict negatives, that Hart held any deed."

The court did not even intimate that Hart would not have been bound, if the claim which he afterwards asserted in another suit had been sufficiently pleaded in the first suit, involving the same land.

The case of Roller v. Holly, 176 U. S. 398, 20 Sup. Ct. 410, 44 L. Ed. 520, is more directly in point than either of the other cases above cited. In that case two points arose: (1) Whether or not process from a court of Texas served upon a defendant residing in Virginia on December 30, 1890, to appear in Limestone county, Tex., on January 5, 1891, "was due process" of law under the fourteenth amendment, such service being given the effect of publication; (2) whether or not the court of Texas had jurisdiction to proceed against a nonresident to enforce a lien on land for purchase money, there being no statute of that state authorizing such proceeding, and there having been no seizure in rem of the lands, nor any notice to the vendees in possession claiming under the nonresident. In regard to the first point, the court did not undertake to say what length of time would be reasonable notice, so as to constitute due process of law, but held that on account of the long distance between the place of service and the place of return, five days was not sufficient time, and that judgment on such short notice was not binding. Concerning the second point, after discussing the questions decided in the two cases of Hart v. Sansom, and Arndt v. Griggs, supra, the court, in its opinion by Justice Brown, says: "It is true there is no statute of Texas specially authorizing a suit against a nonresident to enforce an equitable lien for purchase money, but article 1230 of the Code of Texas, hereinafter cited, contains a general provision for the institution of suits against absent and nonresident defendants, and lays down a method of procedure applicable to all such cases. Obviously this article has no application to suits in personam, as was held by the Supreme Court of Texas in York v. State, 73 Tex. 651, 11 S. W. 869; Kimmarie v. Houston & Cent. Tex. Ry. Co., 76 Tex. 686, 12 S. W. 698; Maddox v. Craig, 80 Tex. 600, 16 S. W. 328; and by this court in Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 723, 24 L. Ed. 585. The article must then be restricted to actions in rem; but to what class of actions, since none is mentioned specially in the article? We are bound to give it some effect. We cannot treat it as wholly nugatory, and as it is impossible to say that it contemplates a procedure in one class of cases and not in another, we think the only reasonable construction is to hold that it applies to all cases where, under recognized principles of law, suits may be instituted against nonresident defendants."

The statute in West Virginia, authorizing service of process upon a nonresident by publication, does not specify in what particular class of cases such service is authorized. In this respect the statutes of the two states are similar. There was no statute in Texas expressly authorizing a court to proceed by publication to enforce a vendor's lien against a nonresident, yet the United States court held that the right to proceed by publication applied to such a suit, because, under the recognized principles of law obtaining in that state, the court had jurisdiction of such a suit. There is no statute in this state expressly authorizing a suit to remove a cloud from title, but under the well-recognized principles of law which obtain in this state, a court of equity has jurisdiction of such a suit brought by one who has both the legal title and possession of the land. Therefore, the analogy between the two cases is perfect, and the same principle may be properly applied to both. We do not understand any decision, state or federal, to hold that equity is dependent upon statute for jurisdiction to remove a cloud from title in a case where the plaintiff is in possession, claiming under a valid legal title. These are the requisites for original equity jurisdiction in suits to quiet title, and equity has always exercised it, for the reason that the law, in such a case, afforded no remedy. But many of the states have, by statutes, provided that suits in equity may be brought to settle and determine title to, and interest in, land, whether the title or claim be legal or equitable, and without regard to possession. And it is upon the construction of these statutes that nearly all of the cases involving the question of the right of a court to make a binding decree upon service by publication have been reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States. We have no statute in West Virginia enlarging the jurisdiction of equity in such matters, nor do we assert that equity has authority in this state to give relief in a proceeding to quiet title, otherwise than is derived from the general equity practice. But inasmuch as it has jurisdiction to grant relief in the present case, and could under the principles of original equity practice do so, without the aid of statute, provided the defendant was before the court, by a decree operating directly upon the subject-matter, the statute above cited (sections 11, 12 and 13 of chapter 124) steps in, and empowers it to pronounce such a decree upon process served by publication against a nonresident, which will be as conclusive of his right in the land as if he had been personally before the court. 4 Pom. Eq. §§ 1396-1399.

The next question relates to the merits of the case. Is the writing a contract of sale, or is it only an option? This depends upon its proper construction. The writing is under seal, and after describing the land, under which the vein of coal lies, it proceeds as follows, viz.: "The coal to be paid for as follows, at the rate of twenty-five ($25) dollars per acre; one dollar on the signing of this agreement and the balance on payment as the party of the first part elects. The deed to be made for the above-described tract of coal by the party of the first part, their heirs or assigns, on 15 days notice in writing by the party of the second part, his heirs or assigns. A good deed with general warranty to be made whenever the unpaid purchase money is secured by bond with mortgage on the premises. A failure of the party of the second part to make the first payment within 30 days from the above date shall render this agreement null and void. The full amount for the above-described coal is to be paid when deed is made as above stated. It is further agreed that the second party has the right to enter in and under the above-described tract of land to mine and convey away the coal in this as well as other coal that he now owns or may hereafter secure with the undisputed right of roadways and not be responsible for any damage to the surface nor anything therein nor thereon by the removal of said coal. The first party has the right to drill, mine, or bore for oil, gas, and water. The second party agrees to pay for surveying and abstract of title when same is accepted. First party agrees to sell the Pittsburg vein of coal in and under the Kings Run Farm bounded on the north by H. & J. Brock, east by Devine, south by R. E. Stephens, west by lands of Ruth E. Stephens, containing 63 acres more or less, at the same rate, terms and conditions as set forth in this agreement for the purchase of coal."

It is impossible to construe the agreement so as to give effect to all of its provisions. Some of them irreconcilably conflict with others. It first says, after reciting that $1 is to be paid at the signing of the agreement, that the balance is to be paid as Tennant may elect. Relying on this clause, counsel for appellant insist that Fretts was not bound to make any payment, or tender of payment, until Tennant should elect how much, and when it should be paid. But it also contains the further provision that Tennant was to make deed upon 15 days' notice in writing by Fretts, or his assignee, and that deed was to be made whenever the unpaid purchase money was secured by bond with mortgage on the premises. A mortgage, of course, could not be executed until Fretts, who was to become the mortgagor, had obtained title, and title was not to be conveyed until after Fretts had given 15 days' notice to Tennant. No notice was ever given, and nothing was ever paid, except the $1. The foregoing provisions contradict each other, and both cannot be given effect. But the clause providing for a forfeiture of the com-tract in the event Fretts did not make the cash payment within 30 days from its date, we think, clearly indicates that the writing was considered by the parties as an option, and not as a sale, and that Fretts had 30 days in which to elect whether or not he would accept. It is true the writing does not specify the amount of the cash payment to be made in 30 days. The cash payment cannot refer to the $1, because that was expressly provided to be paid at the signing of the agreement. It must, therefore, necessarily refer either to a certain portion of the purchase money, the amount of which was agreed on by the parties but not expressed in writing; or it must refer to, and include, the whole purchase price. It is unnecessary, for the purposes of this case, for us to decide whether it referred to the whole, or only to a part of the price. Because it follows, that the failure of Fretts to make a tender of it, whether it was all or a part, within the 30 days, rendered the contract void. If no certain amount in fact was agreed on to be paid within 30 days, Fretts should have elected to pay the whole purchase price, if he would avoid the effect of this forfeiture clause; and not having done so, all his rights under the agreement ended. Courts of equity do not, as a rule, enforce a forfeiture, where there has been a vested right. But this rule does not apply to a case where the contract itself, under which the parties claim, contains an express provision forfeiting a right upon the happening of a certain contingency. Carney v. Barnes, 56 W. Va. 581, 49 S. E. 423.

After this suit was brought, Allison assigned back to Fretts a one-half interest in the aforesaid agreement. Fretts appeared to the suit by counsel and demurred to the bill; Allison made no appearance. The demurrer was overruled and Fretts filed an answer in the nature of a cross-bill praying for specific execution of the contract. Plaintiff demurred to the cross-bill, and the court sustained it. This is right. It is evident that Fretts could not obtain relief without making Allison a party, even assuming that his cross-bill was meritorious. The cross-bill, on its face, showed that Fretts and Allison were jointly interested in whatever rights were conferred by the contract, and Allison should have joined in the application to the court for specific execution, or, if he refused to join, he should have been made party defendant. In a suit to enforce a contract all persons interested in it should generally be made parties. Waterman on Specif. Perf. § 55; Wilcox v. Pratt, 125 N. Y. 688, 25 N. E. 1091; Woodward v. Clark, 15 Mich. 104. It was also proper to sustain the demurrer to the cross-bill, because its averments did not entitle defendant to any relief.

The decree of the lower court holds the writing to be an option which expired at the end of 30 days from its date, and canceled it as constituting a cloud upon plaintiffs' title. This was a quasi in rem decree, and one which the court had jurisdiction to pronounce. Fretts having appeared in the cause by counsel, the court could render a personal decree against him for costs. His appearance, not having been limited to the one special purpose of objecting to the process, or to the manner of its service, was a general appearance. Frank v. Zeigler, 46 W. Va. 614, 33 S. E. 761; State v. Thacker Coal & Coke Co., 49 W. Va. 140, 38 S. E. 539.

Fretts, having voluntarily appeared by counsel, and demurred to, and answered plaintiffs' bill, is estopped from denying the court's jurisdiction of his person. Hunter v. Stewart, 23 W. Va. 549; State v. Rawson, 25 W. Va. 23; Giboney v. Cooper & Cooper, 57 W. Va. 74, 49 S. E. 939.

There is no error in the decree, and it will be affirmed.

COPPERTHITE v. LOUDOUN NAT. BANK et al.

1. EVIDENCE (§ 76*)—FAILURE TO TESTIFY—PRESUMPTIONS.

When defendant can by his own testimony throw light upon matters necessary to his defense and peculiarly within his own knowledge if the fact exists and he fails to testify, the presumption is raised that the facts do not exist.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 96; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 105*)—FAILURE OF DEFENDANT TO TESTIFY—WRITTEN STATEMENT—PROBATIVE EFFECT.

Where a defendant had failed to testify, but voluntarily furnished counsel for plaintiffs with a signed statement of his version of the transaction, which was filed in the case, it was entitled to its natural probative effect.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 158*)—NOTICE OF FRAUD—ACTUAL NOTICE—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

One purchasing with a knowledge of facts sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry, or to lead one of ordinary perception to infer fraud, has notice, equivalent to actual knowledge in contemplation of law, and cannot be deemed a bona fide purchaser.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Loudoun County.

Suit by the Loudoun National Bank and others against Henry Copperthite and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant Copperthite appeals. Affirmed.

Moore, Barbour & Keith, for appellant. Cecil Connor and E. E. Garrett, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. On September 19, 1906, the appellees, who are creditors of Charles W. Jenkins, filed a bill in equity in the circuit court of Loudoun county against him and his son, Henry G. Jenkins, and Henry Copperthite, the appellant, and certain trustees, to set aside a deed of bargain and sale from Charles W. Jenkins to his son, by which deed, for the alleged consideration of $2,500, he conveyed away practically the whole of his personal property, consisting of live stock, farming implements, and an undivided interest in the wheat, corn, hay, and other crops then growing on the farm of which he was tenant—property proved to be of the value of $5,000. The bill also sought to set aside a contemporaneous deed of trust by which Henry G. Jenkins conveyed the identical property to trustees to secure to Copperthite an alleged debt of $2,000, evidenced by note payable 12 months after date, with interest at 6 per cent., payable quarterly at the Farmers' & Mechanics' National Bank of Georgetown, D. C.

The bill alleges that Charles W. Jenkins was the lessee of a farm containing about 800 acres in Loudoun county, Va.; that he was a man advanced in life, with a wife and large family of children, who resided with him on the rented farm, dependent upon him for support; that Henry G. Jenkins, the eldest child, was 22 years of age, and worked with and under the direction and control of his father; that he had accumulated nothing, and owned no estate of any description; that the deed from the father to the son was without consideration, and made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of the grantor, and that the son participated in the transaction with full knowledge of its purpose; that if it should appear that the check of Copperthite for $2,000 was drawn payable to Henry G. Jenkins, and indorsed by him to his father, who got the money from the bank, the transaction was colorable merely, and that Charles W. Jenkins immediately placed the money, either directly or indirectly, under the control of Copperthite, his agent or trustee; that he paid no debts with the money, and, if Copperthite parted with his cash, it was done to enable Charles W. Jenkins to convert his property into money, to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors; that the execution of the bill of sale and deed of trust were parts of the general scheme to enable Charles W. Jenkins to put his property beyond the reach of his creditors; that $2,500 was a grossly inadequate price for the property, and, even if Copperthite actually paid the $2,000, the remaining $500 were never paid.

The bill prayed for an injunction and a receiver, and that the bill of sale and deed of trust be set aside as fraudulent, and the property sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of plaintiffs' debts.

An injunction was granted accordingly and rules awarded against the defendants, returnable to the first day of the October term of the court, to show cause why a receiver should not be appointed as prayed for. At that term the two Jenkinses and Copperthite answered the bill, and the court appointed a receiver to take possession of the property. It transpired, however, that in the meantime Charles W. Jenkins and Henry G. Jenkins, in utter disregard of the injunction order, had succeeded in carrying off, to Washington City and elsewhere, and disposing of, about four-fifths of the entire property. They also evaded process, and escaped beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and are still fugitives from justice. When these facts became known to the court, it expunged their answers from the record, and the bill as to them was taken for confessed.

After the case had been argued and submitted, the trustees filed a joint answer, containing a general denial of any fraudulent purpose on their part, or to their knowledge, in connection with the execution of the deeds in question. Copperthite's answer likewise contains a negation of the charges of fraud; but the answer embodies no specific responsive averment that he is a bona fide purchaser, for value and without notice. He states that he has no means of knowing of the correctness of the allegations of the bill in regard to the indebtedness of Charles W. Jenkins, or as to his farming operations, or the property owned by him, his business antecedents, his relations with his son and other members of the family, or the value of the personal property conveyed to the son, except that he considered it ample security for his debt. He further states that Henry G. Jenkins applied to him for a loan of $2,000, which he made, being satisfied with the security offered, and the trust deed was accordingly executed. He admits that Henry G. Jenkins paid him $1,000 on his indebtedness, which he represented as having been derived from the sale of some of the trust property.

In a subsequent written statement filed in the case by counsel for the appellees, he explains his connection with the transaction as follows: That he made the loan of $2,000 to Henry G. Jenkins on July 13, 1906, by check on the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, D. C.; that his object in making the loan was to get 6 per cent. on his money, and the loan was made on the faith of the property; that he had several times been up to Charles W. Jenkins' place hunting, and knew Henry G. Jenkins, and had seen the property; that young Jenkins applied to him for the loan about three days before it was effected, and he requested his Washington attorney, Miller, to prepare the papers to secure it.

Charles W. Jenkins was present when the mortgage was executed, and Copperthite knew at that time that the father was conveying his property to his son, and thought that he had the right to do so. He did not know until the date this statement was prepared that Jenkins and his son were residing in the city of Washington; nor did he know that any part of the farming implements had been sold by either of the parties, though his attorney, Miller, had informed him that the property was advertised for sale. On September 20, 1906, Henry G. Jenkins paid him $1,000 on his indebtedness in a single note of that denomination, which at his request was, by Copperthite's direction, indorsed by his attorney, Miller, as a credit on the note. At the date of this payment he had no occasion to employ counsel, and had not given the matter of the loan any consideration, as he thought it was safe at the time he made it. Neither Charles W. Jenkins nor his son had applied to him for leave to sell the property, and it was not his intention to force a sale. He did not deposit the $1,000 bill in bank, but had it changed into fractional currency for use.

It was proved that Copperthite was a man of considerable means, and that he gave his check for $2,000 to Henry G. Jenkins on the Farmers' & Mechanics' National Bank of Georgetown, D. C., which was indorsed by the latter to Charles W. Jenkins and paid to him over the counter of the bank in two notes for $1,000 each.

The circuit court held that the deed from Charles W. Jenkins to Henry G. Jenkins was not made for a bona fide and adequate consideration, and was fraudulent and void as to the plaintiffs' debts, and that Copperthite before and at the time of the execution of the deed of trust for his benefit was chargeable with notice and had knowledge of the fraud of both Charles W. Jenkins and Henry G. Jenkins, and participated therein, and that neither he nor his trustees were purchasers for value without notice. It was, therefore, decreed that both deeds were null and void as to the debts of the plaintiffs.

The fraud in this transaction, so far as Charles W. Jenkins and Henry G. Jenkins are concerned, is so flagrant that it is not and cannot be denied, and it is only necessary to consider that branch of the case as tending to affect Copperthite with notice of the fraud which invalidated the title of his immediate grantor.

Generally, "when a defendant can, by his own testimony, throw light upon matters at issue necessary to his defense, and peculiarly within his own knowledge if the fact exists, and fails to go upon the witness stand, the presumption is raised, and will be given effect to, that the facts do not exist." Bastrop St. Bank v. Levy, 106 La. 586, 31 South. 164; Aragon Coffee Co. v. Rogers, 105 Va. 51, 52 S. E. 843.

It is true the force of this implication, with respect to the failure of Copperthite to testify is to some extent weakened by the circumstance that he voluntarily furnished counsel for the appellees with a signed statement of his version of the transaction, which was filed by them in the case, and was thus entitled to its natural probative effect. Wilkinson v. Jett, 7 Leigh, 115, 30 Am. Dec. 493; Hubbard v. Allyn, 200 Mass. 166, 86 N. E.

356; Damon v. Carrol, 163 Mass. 404, 40 N. E. 185. Nevertheless the fact remains that the record contains no denial under oath by Copperthite of any of the grave charges affecting his character and the bona fides of his conduct in this regard. Nor has any effort been made to relieve the situation by proving his general character and standing in the community in which he lives, or that of his attorney, Miller, or of the trustees of his own selection, one of whom was so illiterate that he made his mark in lieu of signature to the deed of trust. It was by the instrumentality of these parties alone that the perpetration of this fraud was made possible, and it was incumbent upon them to repel the unfavorable inferences to be drawn from the incriminating circumstances surrounding the transaction by showing their good faith and ignorance of the misconduct of Charles W. Jenkins and his son.

There is no direct evidence that Copperthite had positive knowledge of the intent of the elder Jenkins to delay, hinder, or defraud his creditors, or of the fraud rendering void the title of his grantor, nor is such actual knowledge necessary. In law, means of knowledge and the duty of using such means is tantamount to actual knowledge. The rule in this state is well settled that "a knowledge of facts sufficient to excite the suspicions of a prudent man and put him on the inquiry, or to lead a person of ordinary perception to infer fraud, or the means of knowing by the use of ordinary diligence, amounts to notice, and is equivalent to actual knowledge in contemplation of law. The nature and circumstances of the transaction may sometimes be such as must apprise the grantee of its character and object. * * * Res ipsa loquitur. * * * If he has notice sufficient to put him on the inquiry, he cannot be deemed a bona fide purchaser.

This statement of the principle in Bump on Fraud. Con. (4th Ed.) § 184, is quoted with approval by Riely, J., in delivering the opinion of this court in Ferguson v. Daughtrey, 94 Va. 308, 312, 26 S. E. 822. See, also, Hickman v. Trout, 83 Va. 478, 3 S. E. 131; American v. Mayo, 97 Va. 182, 33 S. E. 523; Fischer v. Lee, 98 Va. 159, 35 S. E. 441; Newberry v. Bank, 98 Va. 471, 36 S. E. 515; Anderson v. Mossy Creek, etc., Co., 100 Va. 420, 41 S. E. 854; University v. Snyder, 100 Va. 567, 42 S. E. 337; Flook v. Armentrout, 100 Va. 638, 42 S. E. 686. For other Virginia cases on the subject of fraudulent conveyances, see monographic note to Cochran v. Paris, 11 Grat. 348, Va. R. Ann. 149.

The following are some of the significant circumstances tending to arouse suspicion in a man of ordinary prudence and to put him on inquiry as to the bona fides of the transaction between Jenkins and his son, to which we invite attention: The father was a man advanced in life, with a large family dependent upon him for support; and, without explanation sought or given, in the midst of the crop year, he deprives himself of the means of fulfilling his contract with his landlord by an absolute sale of nearly all his property, including his interest in the growing crops, to an inexperienced and impecunious son, who had but recently attained his majority, for about one-half its value. Jenkins and his family, including his son, Henry, lived in Loudoun county, Va. Copperthite, his attorney, Miller, and the two trustees, were residents of the city of Washington. The business was transacted in that city, the deed of bargain and sale and the deed of trust were both prepared by Copperthite's counsel, and he was fully apprised of the source of the son's title, the perfection of which, even between the parties, depended wholly upon him. The property, which was perishable in its nature, was not present for inspection, but was in a foreign jurisdiction, many miles distant. There was no delivery of the possession of the property by the father to the son—indeed, the latter had no use for the property, no provision for the sustenance of the live stock, and no place in which to bestow it. Copperthite was acting under the advice of counsel, and knew that property on leased premises was liable to the landlord for rent. Yet he made no inquiry of the landlord concerning the rent, or as to what share of the growing crops the tenant was entitled. He knew that the property was liable to be incumbered by other liens, which the records in the clerk's office of Loudoun county would disclose, but made no examination of that office, though dealing with a comparative stranger, who lived in a foreign jurisdiction. He made no specific denial in his answer of the allegation that the $2,000 gotten on his check was placed under the control of himself, his agent, or trustees, and, as before observed, that sum was paid by the bank in two bills, of the denomination of $1,000 each. It was shown that the day after the bill was filed the son paid Copperthite a $1,000 note, which was claimed to be the proceeds of sale of part of the property included in the trust deed. It is probably not an unusual circumstance that a city bank should have paid Copperthite's check in notes of the denomination of $1,000; but it is highly improbable that Henry G. Jenkins should have received a $1,000 bill from the indiscriminate sale of personalty of the character included in the trust deed. In this connection, also, it may be remarked that Copperthite's explanation of his motive in becoming a party to the transaction was to effect a 12 months loan of $2,000 at 6 per cent. Yet we find him collecting one-half of the debt, ten months before it was due and one day after the bill was filed, in a single note of $1,000.

In view of all the circumstances, we are of opinion that the circuit court was warranted in reaching the conclusion that the appellant,

Henry Copperthite, was not a purchaser of the property in controversy for value and without notice of the fraud, rendering void the title of his immediate grantor.

The decree appealed from must therefore be affirmed.

Affirmed.

CHESAPEAKE & O. RY. CO. v. WILLS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 9, 1910.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 56*)—"PROXIMATE CAUSE."

The "proximate cause" of an injury is that act which directly produced, or concurred directly in producing, the injury in a natural and continuous sequence unbroken by any new cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 69, 70; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 339*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

The act of a passenger who boarded the wrong train through the actionable negligence of the carrier failing to inform passengers of the movements and destination of trains, in alighting while the train was in motion, without being directed, advised, or encouraged so to do, by the trainmen, was the act of a responsible agent intervening between the negligence of the carrier and the injury sustained while alighting, precluding a recovery therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1353; Dec. Dig. § 339.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1175*)—DISPOSITION OF CASE ON APPEAL.

Where plaintiff filed on his own motion an amended declaration after the court had improperly overruled a demurrer to the original declaration, and therein restated his cause of action in the light of the objections urged to the original declaration, the court will presume that plaintiff has made the strongest presentation of his case which the facts permit, and that it could not be bettered if leave were given to amend, and, entering the judgment which the trial court should have entered, will sustain the demurrer and enter judgment for defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4587; Dec. Dig. § 1175.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Orange County.

Action by J. Reid Wills against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and rendered.

Williams & Browning, for plaintiff in error. F. W. Simms, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. The defendant in error brought suit against the plaintiff in error to recover for an injury sustained in alighting from one of its trains. There was a demurrer to the declaration and to each of its three counts, which the court overruled, and upon a trial before a jury there was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, to which a writ of error was awarded.

The only error assigned which we shall find it necessary to consider is to the ruling of the court upon the demurrer to the declaration.

The first declaration filed was demurred to, grounds of demurrer were assigned and argued, and the judge of the court entered an order overruling the demurrer. Thereupon the plaintiff, upon his own motion, was permitted to amend the declaration, and the defendant demurred to the amended declaration and each count, which demurrer was also overruled by the court.

The first count states that the plaintiff, on the 13th of July, 1907, was a passenger on the defendant's railway, to be carried from its station at Gordonsville to Louisa, in this state, for a certain fare which was paid; that it was the duty of the defendant, with due and proper care and reasonable diligence, to carry the plaintiff safely; but that it so carelessly and negligently managed its passenger trains that it misled the plaintiff and caused him to get upon a train that was not bound in the direction that he wished to go, but in an opposite and contrary direction; and that immediately upon getting on board said train the defendant then and there started it and wrongfully carried the plaintiff away from his true destination on a journey different from that upon which it was the duty of the defendant to carry him; whereupon, immediately upon the starting of the train, the plaintiff perceived that he was being carried by defendant away from his destination, and he ran at once to the exit of the passenger coach in which he was, and when the train had not attained any speed, but was moving very slowly, the plaintiff then and there attempted to alight therefrom, and did not apprehend, nor would any ordinary, careful, and prudent man have apprehended, under like circumstances, any danger from alighting; and while thus attempting to alight the plaintiff was thrown under the train by the careless and negligent conduct and management of the defendant in carrying him away from his destination, by reason whereof one of the legs of the plaintiff was crushed and broken so that amputation became necessary.

The second and third counts state the same cause of action, and enter into details setting out the manner in which the plaintiff had been misled into taking a train going in the opposite direction to that in which he desired to go, carrying him, in fact, to the west, when his point of destination was directly to the east. When it comes, however, to narrate what occurred when he discovered that he was being taken away from his true destination, his own conduct is described in the second and third counts substantially as was done in the first count.

It may be conceded, in the view that we take of this case, that the railroad company was guilty of actionable negligence in permitting such confusion in the movement of its trains to exist at Gordonsville as misled the plaintiff, acting with reasonable prudence and caution, into entering the wrong train.

It may be conceded that it was the duty of the defendant to exercise reasonable care and caution so to inform passengers as to the movement and destination of its trains as to enable those wishing to entrain to enter the train which would take them to the point they wished to reach. It may be further conceded that for the failure to perform that duty the railroad company was responsible for whatever loss or damage the passenger sustained, which could be reasonably expected to result from such negligent act. When, therefore, the plaintiff found himself moving in a direction the opposite of that in which he wished to go, he had, in the case supposed, a complete right of action against the defendant company to recover the damages flowing from the breach of the duty owed to him by the railroad company.

But that is not the injury for which this suit was brought. The plaintiff, finding himself moving from instead of toward his home, went at once to the door of the car and undertook to alight from the train while in motion, and suffered the injury which resulted in the amputation of his leg. It does not appear from the declaration that the defendant directed, requested, encouraged, or suggested that the plaintiff should step from the car while in motion. It does not appear from the declaration that the defendant was advised in any manner of the situation in which the plaintiff found himself. He acted solely upon his own responsibility in alighting from the train, and that act was the proximate cause of the injury which he received, and the negligent conduct of the railroad company in causing him to enter the wrong train, conceding that it was guilty of negligence, was the remote cause.

In Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 26, it is said: "The proximate cause of an event must be understood to be that which in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new, independent cause, produces that event, and without which that event would not have occurred. Proximity in point of time or space, however, is no part of the definition. That is of no importance, except as it may afford evidence for or against proximity of causation; that is, the proximate cause which is nearest in the order of responsible causation."

At section 28, the same author says: "Very great difficulty has been found in determining what damages should be considered as flowing, in a 'natural and continuous sequence,' from an act of negligence, especially when it is not a matter of contract liability. On the one hand, it has been maintained that, in cases of tortious negligence, the defendant should be held responsible for all damages which do in fact result from his wrongful acts, whether they could have been anticipated or not. On the other hand, it has been maintained that he should not be held responsible for any damages except such as he could, in the exercise of reasonable foresight, have foreseen as the probable consequence of his act. As a middle ground, it has been asserted that he should be made responsible for such damage as is known by common-experience to usually follow such a wrongful act. The weight of authority seems to be decidedly against holding the defendant liable for all the actual consequences of his wrongful acts, when they are such as no human being, even with the fullest knowledge of the circumstances, would have considered likely to occur; and, on the other hand, the best authorities seem to be quite opposed to the theory that he should be held liable only for such consequences as he ought himself to have foreseen. So much difficulty, indeed, has been felt in attempting to lay down a rule to cover all possible cases, that some of the ablest judges have declined to state any fixed rule, and have indicated a disposition to leave all doubtful cases to the jury. The practical solution of this question appears to us to be that a person guilty of negligence should be held responsible for all the consequences which a prudent and experienced man, fully acquainted with all the circumstances which in fact existed (whether they could have been ascertained by reasonable diligence or not), would, at the time of the negligent act, have thought reasonably possible to follow, if they had occurred to his mind."

In 32 Cyc. p. 745, several definitions of "proximate cause" are given, among them as follows: "An act which directly produced or concurred directly in producing the injury; that from which the effect might be expected to follow without the concurrence of any unusual circumstances; that which immediately precedes and produces the effect, as distinguished from a remote, mediate, or predisposing cause; that which in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new cause, produced that event, and without which that event would not have occurred."

In 8 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. p. 571, it is said:

"In the law of damages the proximate cause of an injury may in general be stated to be that act or omission which immediately causes or fails to prevent the injury; an act or omission occurring or concurring with another, where, had it not happened, the injury would not have been inflicted, notwithstanding the latter. Where an efficient producing cause for injuries is found, it will be considered the proximate cause, unless another cause or causes, not incident to but independent of it, are shown to have intervened and produced the injury. The question must always be, therefore, whether there was any intermediate cause disconnected from the primary act and self-operating, which produced the injury; an inquiry to be answered in accordance with common understanding. Where this question can be answered in the affirmative, the independent and intervening cause will be regarded as the proximate cause, and the author of the original act discharged. * * *

"The primary cause may be the proximate cause of a disaster, though it may operate through successive instruments. It is not essential, therefore, for a plaintiff to show that an act, claimed to have been the proximate cause of a certain result, was the only cause. It is sufficient if it be established that the defendant's act produced or set in motion other agencies, which in turn produced or contributed to the final result. Where, however, the connection is not immediate between the injurious act complained of and the consequence, such nearness in the order of events and closeness in the relation of cause and effect must subsist that the influence of the injurious act predominates over that of other causes and concurs to produce the consequence."

These principles are in accordance with the decisions of this court.

In Fowlkes v. Southern R. Co., 96 Va. 742, 32 S. E. 464, it was said: "That the defendant was guilty of negligence is conceded, and that it is liable in damages for the direct consequences of that negligence is also conceded. * * * It is not only requisite that damages, actual or inferential, should be suffered, but this damage must be the legitimate sequence of the thing amiss. The maxim of the law here applicable is that in law the immediate, and not the remote, cause of any event is regarded. In other words, the law always refers the injury to the proximate, not to the remote, cause. If an injury has resulted in consequence of a certain wrongful act or omission, but only through or by means of some intervening cause, from which last cause the injury followed as a direct and immediate consequence, the law will refer the damage to the last or proximate cause, and refuse to trace it to that which was more remote. To the proximate cause we may usually trace consequences with some degree of assurance, but beyond that we enter a field of conjecture where the uncertainty renders the attempt at exact conclusions futile. If the wrong and the resulting damage are not known by common experience to be naturally and usually in sequence, and the damage does not, according to the ordinary course of events, follow from the wrong, then the wrong and the damage are not sufficiently conjoined or concatenated as cause and effect to support an action."

And in Scheffer v. Railroad Co., 105 U. S. 249, 26 L. Ed. 1070, Mr. Justice Miller said: "To warrant the finding of negligence, or an act not amounting to wanton wrong, as the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances."

In Jammison v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 92 Va. 327, 23 S. E. 753, 53 Am. St. Rep. 813, it was held that, if a passenger train fails to stop at a station to which a passenger has purchased a ticket, it is the duty of the passenger to retain his seat until he arrives at the next station at which the train stops; and, if he feels aggrieved, to institute his action against the company for any loss or injury he may have sustained by reason of the failure to stop the train at the proper station. But if he fails to do this, and, in passing from one coach to another in search of the conductor to get him to stop the train, he is thrown from the train and injured, his negligence is the proximate cause of the injury, and he cannot recover damages of the company therefor.

In this case the negligence of the railroad company consisted in such acts of omission and commission alleged in the declaration as resulted in the plaintiff getting upon the wrong train, and upon the authority of the case just cited there was an ample remedy for whatever wrong he had sustained by reason of the defendant's negligence. The direct and efficient cause of the injury for which this suit was brought was the alighting from the train while in motion. In that act the railroad company had no part. As we have seen, the declaration does not aver that any agent of the company directed, advised, encouraged, or even had knowledge of the plaintiff's intention to alight from the train; so that, between the negligent act of the railroad company and the injury suffered by the plaintiff, there was the intervening act of a responsible agent, that responsible agent being the plaintiff himself. While the plaintiff as a result of the defendant's negligence had taken the wrong train, but was in a place of safety and of his own accord alighted from the train, it cannot be said that the injury which he then received was the natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new or independent cause, of the negligence of the defendant which caused him to enter the wrong train.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the demurrer to the declaration and each count thereof should have been sustained; and, in view of the fact that the plaintiff filed a declaration to which the defendant demurred and the court overruled the demurrer, and that the plaintiff then, of his own motion, filed an amended declaration, in which he restated his cause of action, in the light of the objections which had been urged to his original declaration, it is to be presumed that he has made the strongest presentation of his case which the facts permit, and that it could not be bettered if leave were given to amend; and this court, entering such judgment as the circuit court ought to have rendered, will sustain the demurrer and enter a final judgment for the plaintiff in error.

Reversed.

WHITTLE, J. I concur in the result reached by the President in this case. But I am of opinion that neither the original nor amended declaration states a case of actionable negligence against the defendant.

1. CARRIERS (§ 304*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—CARE AS TO PERSONS ACCOMPANYING PASSENGER.

One who, according to a custom, goes to a railway station to assist a passenger in entering or leaving a train, is an invitee to whom the carrier owes the duty of ordinary care and, if he enters the train and his purpose is known, the carrier must give him a reasonable time within which to leave the train; but if his purpose is not known, and there are no circumstances to put the carrier upon notice, the carrier is not bound to hold the train until he has had time to alight, nor to notify him before the train starts.

Buchanan and Whittle, JJ., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Augusta County.

Action by James R. Paris' administrator against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. L. Parrish and J. M. Perry, for plaintiff in error. Charles & Duncan Curry and Harry St. Geo. Tucker, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. This is the second time this case has been before this court. In the opinion upon the former writ of error, the circumstances under which the death of the plaintiff's decedent occurred, as they then appeared from the record, are stated, and upon the case then made it was held that the verdict of the jury against the railway company could not be sustained, and the cause was remanded for a new trial. See 107 Va. 408-411, 59 S. E. 398. Upon the next trial there was a demurrer to the evidence and judgment for the plaintiff again. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The duty of a railway company to a person who, in conformity to a custom acquiesced in by the carrier, goes to a railway station to assist a passenger in entering or leaving the train, is declared. It was held that such a person is an invitee to whom the carrier owes the duty of ordinary care to see that he is not injured, and that, if he enters the train and his purpose is known, it is the duty of the carrier to give him a reasonable time within which to leave it; but if his purpose is not known, and there are no circumstances to put the carrier upon notice, then the carrier is not bound to hold the train till he has had time to alight, or to notify him before the train starts.

Upon the former writ it was not shown that the railway company had notice that the deceased was merely assisting his daughter on the train when he entered the car. The want of such notice, direct or circumstantial, was held on the former writ to relieve the railway company from the charge of negligence in starting its train before the plaintiff's decedent had gotten off. Upon the last trial, on this point the case was different. Two witnesses testified that the plaintiff's decedent, when he entered the car, inquired of a brakeman if he would have time to take his daughter's dress suit case into the car, set it down, and get off before the train started, and was told that he would, to "go ahead." That it had such notice, or that there was any such inquiry made, is denied by the railway company, and the preponderance of evidence, direct and circumstantial, is in favor of its contention; but on a demurrer to evidence the testimony of the two witnesses to the contrary must be taken as true. The evidence of the plaintiff tended further to prove that the deceased, when he assisted his daughter upon the train, found her a seat about the middle of the car, placed the dress suit case on the seat with her, told her good-bye, and started to leave the train, but was delayed in getting off because of the crowded condition of the car and the narrow passage through which he had to or did pass in making his way to the platform of the car; that when he reached the platform it was crowded, and persons were still getting on the train with bundles; that he asked the brakeman not to start the train until he could get off; that he was diligent in his effort to get off; that the day of the accident was Saturday before Christmas, which came on Monday; that the train was a local train, crowded when it reached Staunton, many of whose passengers were getting off; that a large crowd there boarded the train; that the train's usual stop at that station was five minutes; that it only stopped the usual time that day; that, although the train was moving slowly when the deceased got on the steps to alight, he could have done so successfully but for the interference of a brakeman, who grabbed him and then let him go, unbalancing him, and thus preventing him from alighting safely.

Upon all material points the evidence of the railway company is directly in conflict with that of the plaintiff, and upon most of them preponderates. While upon the whole evidence the jury, as it seems to us, ought to have found a verdict for the defendant, yet, as the evidence was conflicting, the verdict of the jury cannot be interfered with, if there was sufficient evidence to sustain it.

We do not think the act of the brakeman, as testified to by the plaintiff's witnesses, makes out a case of negligence against the railway company. As was said in the opinion of the court on the former writ of error, it was the brakeman's duty to have attempted to protect the plaintiff's intestate from damage incident to his stepping off a moving train, and, if perchance disaster attended his efforts in that regard, the master cannot be held answerable in damages for the fortuitous result.

The case made by the evidence, it may be conceded, shows that the railway company was negligent in failing to give Paris a reasonable time within which to leave the train. The fact remains, however, that in attempting to alight from a moving train he was the author of his own wrong.

Negligence, whether contributory or otherwise, is a mixed question of law and fact. If the facts be doubtful, or about which reasonable men may differ, their determination becomes a question for the jury; but, where the facts are undisputed, the law applicable to them is a question for the court.

The decided cases with reference to alighting from moving trains are almost without number. Many of them deal with passengers alighting from street cars, and it is almost universally held that to alight from a slowing moving street car is not negligence per se. Where a passenger is invited to alight by an officer of the train, or is told that he may do so in safety, the cases hold that circumstance to justify his action, provided the train has not attained such a speed that the danger would be obvious; if he is induced to leap from the train by a well-founded apprehension of peril to life or limb, induced by occurrences which might have been guarded against by the utmost care of the carrier, he is entitled to recover for any injury he may have sustained thereby, although no injury would have occurred if he had remained quiet; and we admit that there are cases which have held the carrier responsible where there was no invitation extended, no assurance given, and no peril apprehended. But we are of opinion that the just and proper rule of decision is that which we understand to prevail in this state.

In Richmond & Danville R. Co. v. Morris, 31 Grat. 200, it appears that it was night when the train arrived at the station B.; that Morris had fallen asleep, and when approaching the station the conductor awakened him, telling him that they were at B. The train went a short distance beyond the freighthouse and reception room without stopping, and when the engine reached the frog on the west side of the freighthouse and reception room it stopped, and the conductor, seeing Morris still in the caboose asleep, again aroused him. The train stopped about a minute, and Morris could then have gotten off whilst the train was not in motion. The conductor then went to the other end of the car, and, looking back, saw that Morris did not get up. He returned, shook Morris, and told him to get up, or get off; he was at B. Immediately after waking Morris the last time, the conductor went out at the end of the caboose with his lantern in his hand and stood on the stationary platform about two and a half feet from the platform of the car. The train commenced backing, and Morris got up and walked out to the end of the car and jumped off, not knowing, as he said, which way the car was going, and the caboose car and several others passed over him, injuring him severely. The point where Morris jumped off was opposite the platform, which extended 35 steps west and a much greater distance east of the pump-house, and was that part of the platform at which passengers going east got off, and was in good condition. It was a dark, drizzly night, and the only lights at the station were two lanterns, one in the hands of the conductor and the other in the hands of a servant of the company at the station. Upon these facts this court held that: "The company was guilty of culpable negligence, and this negligence was the proximate cause of Morris' injury; that the conductor should not have put the train in motion until Morris could leave the car, or, if put in motion, he should have cautioned him not to attempt to get off until the train was stopped. Instead of this he told him to get off, and the train immediately commenced backing. The company was also in fault in not having stationary lights at the place, and this made it all the more incumbent on the conductor to exercise more than usual care and caution in letting off passengers. But whilst the injury sustained by M. is directly traceable to the culpable negligence of the company, the negligence or absence of ordinary prudence and caution on the part of M. contributed to his injury; and he is not entitled to recover of the company damages for the injury he sustained. One who by his negligence has brought an injury upon himself cannot recover damages for it. Such is the rule of the civil and common law. A plaintiff in such cases is entitled to no relief."

It is obvious, we think, that the case just cited was a far stronger one in behalf of the passenger than the one under consideration. The court rightly characterized the conduct of the conductor as culpable negligence, and held that this negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to Morris; but Morris was in a place of safety, and in attempting to alight from a moving car was held to have brought the injury upon himself, and was therefore not entitled to relief. Judge Burks, who delivered the opinion of a unanimous court, cites the case of Railroad Co. v. Aspell, 23 Pa. 147, 62 Am. Dec. 323, and quotes with approval the following language of Chief Justice Black: "It has been a rule of law from time immemorial, and is not likely to be changed in all time to come, that there can be no recovery for an injury caused by the mutual fault of both parties. When it can be shown that it would not have happened except for the culpable negligence of the party injured concurring with that of the other party, no action can be maintained. A railroad company is not liable for an accident which the passenger might have prevented by ordinary attention to his safety, even though the agents in the train are also remiss in their duty. * * * From these principles it follows very clearly that, if a passenger is negligently carried beyond the station where he intended to stop and where he had a right to be let off, he can recover compensation for the inconvenience, the loss of time, and the labor of traveling back, because these are the direct consequences of the wrong done to him. But if he is foolhardy enough to jump off without waiting for the train to stop, he does it at his own risk, because this is gross negligence, for which he can blame nobody but himself. If there be any man who does not know that such leaps are dangerous, especially when taken in the dark, his friends should see that he does not travel on a railroad."

Continuing, Judge Burks says further: "It is to be borne in mind, however, that if a passenger is induced to leap from the carriage, whether by coach or railway, by a well-founded apprehension of peril to life or limb, induced by occurrences which might have been guarded against by the utmost care of the carriers, he is entitled to recover for any injury he may sustain thereby, although no injury would have occurred if he had remained quiet."

In Jammison v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 92 Va. 327, 23 S. E. 758, 53 Am. St. Rep. 813, it was held that, if a passenger train fails to stop at a station to which a passenger has purchased a ticket, it is the duty of the passenger to retain his seat until he arrives at the next station at which the train stops; and, if he feels aggrieved, to institute his action against the company for any loss or injury he may have sustained by reason of the failure to stop the train at the proper station. But if he fails to do this, and, in passing from one coach to another in search of the conductor to get him to stop the train, he is thrown from the train and injured, his negligence is the proximate cause of the injury, and he cannot recover damages of the company therefor.

The person injured in this case was upon the train where he had the right to be as an invitee. He was in a place of safety. Had he elected to remain upon the train, his right of action was complete for whatever inconvenience he had suffered, or might suffer, as the direct consequence of the railroad company's negligence. But when he undertook to alight from the train, the negligence of the railroad company had ceased to operate, and it was the voluntary act of Paris which became the proximate cause of his injury.

As was said by this court in C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Wills, 111 Va. —, 68 S. E. 395: "The direct and efficient cause of the injury for which this suit was brought was the alighting from the train while in motion. In that act the railroad company had no part."

If it were conceded that Paris was not guilty of negligence in alighting from the train, we do not perceive that his case would be strengthened, for his act of alighting was the proximate cause of the injury. In order to recover, he must show negligence upon the part of the railroad company as the proximate cause of the injury for which he sues. He cannot recover merely because he was not guilty of a negligent act; and in this case the negligence of the railroad company had ceased to operate—was exhausted—and his alighting from the train, whether under conditions that convict him of negligence or not, is immaterial. If the act of the railroad was a mere condition and not the proximate and efficient cause of the injury, and if Paris in alighting from the train, under the circumstances disclosed in this record, was free from fault and guilty of no negligence, then the occurrence must be classed as an accident for which there can be no recovery.

It has often been held that the act of a responsible agent, intervening between the negligence of the railway company and the injury sued for, relieves the railway company of responsibility. If the intervening act of a third person has that effect, how much more where the person injured was himself the author of his own wrong.

But it is said that if this view prevail, and a person injured while leaving a moving train under circumstances similar to those under consideration is denied the right to recover for such injury, and is left to compensation for damages for the inconvenience, loss of time, and the labor of traveling back, which are the direct consequences of the act of the railroad company, the recovery in many instances would not adequately redress the wrong suffered. To this we reply that experience does not warrant the apprehension that courts and juries may not safely be trusted to do full justice to the citizen in such controversies; and that, even if this were not so, the difficulty or the inability to obtain full compensation for an admitted wrong cannot be made the basis for a recovery against a railroad company in excess of just compensation for the injury which its negligence had occasioned, measured by the ascertained and established rules of law in such cases.

There is another view, which we think is not without merit. Where an injury is inflicted by a negligent act, it is the duty of the party injured by reasonable care to diminish the consequences of the wrong he has suffered, in the interest of the wrongdoer. This is not merely good law but good morals, and flows from that rule which has the highest possible sanction, that we should do unto others as we would have others do unto us.

Where a passenger has been wrongfully carried beyond his station, or has not been given a reasonable time to leave a train, this principle requires him to submit for the time to the situation, secure in his right ultimately to recover for the inconvenience he may suffer, but forbids him to step from a moving train, thereby imperiling his life and limb, and then turn around and ingraft the consequences of his own rash act upon the antecedent negligence of the railroad and recover for both.

For a full discussion of the doctrine of remote and proximate cause, we refer to C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Wills, supra, and the authorities there cited. As was said in that case, there is no evidence that any agent of the company directed, advised, encouraged, or even had knowledge of the intention of plaintiff's intestate to alight from the train, except the brakeman, whose conduct was held not to fix negligence upon the railroad company. There was in this case, as in that, the intervening act of a responsible agent, that agent being the plaintiff's intestate himself; and, while the railroad company was guilty of negligence in not giving a sufficient time for Paris to alight from the train, it cannot be said that the injury for which he sues was the natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new and independent cause, of that negligent act.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, and this court will proceed to enter such judgment as the circuit court ought to have rendered.

Reversed.

BUCHANAN, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in the opinion of the court, in so far as it holds that the plaintiff's intestate in attempting to get off the train was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law; nor in the general rule laid down in that opinion that it is per se negligence in every case for a person to attempt to get off a moving train, except under the circumstances pointed out in the opinion. Whether or not the conduct of plaintiff's intestate, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, was negligence constituting the proximate cause of his death, was, in my opinion, a question for the jury, to be determined from all the facts and circumstances of the case. It is a mistaken view, as it seems to me, to take the single act of stepping off the moving train, and inquire if it alone constituted the proximate cause. The combined effect of the act of the plaintiff's intestate and the wrongful and unlawful conduct of the railroad company, which caused or induced him to attempt to step off the train after it was in motion, ought all to be considered in determining the question of proximate cause. Negligence and contributory negligence are mixed questions of law and fact, and are ordinarily questions for the jury and not for the court.

It is the province of the jury, as was said in B. & O. Ry. Co. v. Griffith, 159 U. S. 603, 611, 16 Sup. Ct. 105, 108, 40 L. Ed. 274, "to note the special circumstances and surroundings of each particular case, and then to say whether the conduct of the parties in the case was such as would be expected of a reasonably prudent man under a similar state of facts."

"Negligence," said Judge Burks in Carlington v. Ficklin, 32 Grat. 670, 676, 677, "cannot be conclusively established by a state of facts upon which fair-minded men may well differ."

I do not understand, as stated in the majority opinion, that it is per se negligence in this state to get on or off of a moving train, except in cases under the circumstances pointed out in that opinion. Neither the Jammison Case, 92 Va. 327, 23 S. E. 758, 53 Am. St. Rep. 813, nor the Morris Case, 31 Grat. 200, cited as settling the rule in this state, involved that question. In the first-named case, the plaintiff was not injured in attempting to get on or off a moving train. The Morris Case was a case of gross negligence on the part of the passenger, and, while there may be language used in both cases broad enough to sustain the statement in the majority opinion, such language was unnecessary for a decision of those cases, and not binding in a case like this, where the facts are entirely different; for the language of an opinion must always be construed in the light of the facts of the case in which it was rendered, and is not binding as a precedent in a subsequent case unless the case called for its expression. Griffin v. Woolford, 100 Va. 473, 41 S. E. 949.

In the Morris Case, the court says that time sufficient was given the person "according to the proof to leave the car while the train was standing; and after he was cautioned the last time, if he had at once followed the conductor, who stepped onto the platform with the lantern in his hand, he might have reached the platform with equal convenience and safety, or if, on tarrying longer and finding the train in motion, when told to get off he should either have declined, as he had the right to do, to obey the direction, or if he chose to take the risk of getting off under the circumstances, he should have gotten off on the stationary platform, which, as shown, was alongside of the train. Such would have been the dictates of common prudence. He did not heed them, but, according to his statement, he got up, walked to the end of the car, and 'jumped off,' not knowing, nor seeking to know, in which direction the train was moving. This would seem to be something more than the want of ordinary prudence and caution. It appears to be gross negligence—extreme recklessness."

It is clear that a case like that did not call for any expression of opinion which would control a case like this.

Neither did the opinion of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in the Aspell Case, 23 Pa. 147, 62 Am. Dec. 323, cited and relied on in the majority opinion in this case and in the Morris Case, require a decision of the question involved in this case. In that case, when the passenger, as Judge Black says in his opinion, "was about to jump, the conductor and the brakeman entreated him not to do it, warned him of his danger, and assured him that the train should be stopped and backed in the station. If he had heeded them, he would have been safely let down at the place he desired to stop at, in less than a minute and a half. Instead of this, he took a leap which promised him nothing but death; for it was made in the darkness of midnight, against a wood pile close to the track, and from a car going probably at the full rate of 10 miles an hour."

Not only was the language used in that case not necessary to its decision, but in a later case in the same court (Johnson v. West Chester, etc., Ry. Co., 70 Pa. 337), where the passenger attempted to get on a moving train, in which the trial court had instructed the jury that, "If the train was distinctly running on the track when the plaintiff attempted to enter, he was guilty of negligence and could not recover," that instruction was held to be erroneous, and that "it was for the jury to say whether the danger of boarding the train when in motion was so apparent as to make it the duty of the passenger to desist from the attempt." The language of Judge Agnew in delivering the unanimous opinion of the court in that case is so apt I cannot do better than quote it as expressing my views, especially as the earlier decision of that court in the Aspell Case is quoted and relied on to sustain the majority opinion in this case.

In that case the plaintiff had not been giv-on sufficient time to get on the train before it began to move. "Now, though the train," says the court, "was distinctly in motion, so that a bystander, cool and unconcerned, could see it visibly running on the track, are we to say, as a matter of law binding on the jury, that a passenger, having a right to go on the train, and seeing himself about to be left improperly by the wayside, is guilty of culpable negligence if he should essay to reach his destination, no matter how slow the motion in running might be or how little danger was apparent to him? He may be guilty of negligence, but of this the jury should judge under the circumstances. He may not set his life or limbs on the hazard of a leap at the running train, as the judge emphatically said, and doubtless if such were the character of the attempt it would be negligence. The expression 'leaping at a running train' denotes a higher effort and less consideration on the part of the traveler than merely attempting to board a car under way. * * *

In discussing the conduct of the passenger, we are not to lay out of sight the wrong of the company in its influence upon his mind and act. He may have strong motives to reach his destination. Indeed, no man but must feel, and feel strongly, at being left by the wayside; he is conscious of his right to go aboard, and naturally becomes excited at the sight of the moving train, perhaps is alarmed, and in some degree confused. If the train is running slowly, and the danger is not apparent to him, what so natural as that he should hurry to reach the train and get aboard? But if we lay down the inexorable rule for this and every other case that, whenever the train can be seen distinctly running, it is legal negligence to attempt to get on, we set a premium on the wrong of the company which influenced the very act itself. To say that, whenever the motion of the train is so distinct that bystanders can see it running along the track, the passenger is to be as cool and unconcerned as they, fold his arms, and say to himself, 'I'll sue you for this breach of contract in leaving me here,' is to him bitterness itself. He may be a stranger and know not where to find accommodation; the severity of the winter may surround him, or the heat of summer oppress him; the elements may war against him, and night or approaching darkness may heighten his alarm; or, if no stranger, his business may be urgent, his family may require his presence, his health may be poor, his means limited, his desire to reach his destination overpowering, and a hundred reasons may influence him to go on. Now, are we to say that the wrong which has caused his mind to be excited and aroused his fears, which confuses him, and has made him less cool and calculating than those who are standing by and can look upon the departing train without emotion, is not to be taken into the account in considering his act? What caused his state of mind? Not his own carelessness or breach of duty as a passenger, but the illegal and wrongful act of the carrier. Surely it does not lie in the mouth of the railroad company to say to him: 'The law will take no account of our breach of duty in its effect upon you. You ought not to have suffered it to move you; but, if you saw our train was moving along the track, the slack taken up, the train stretched out, and the cars under way, so that any one else could distinctly see it running, you ought to have looked upon our leaving you on the wayside with perfect coolness, made no effort to go, and sued us for our breach of the contract of carriage. No matter how slow the motion of the train was, nor how little danger in getting on was apparent to you, or what the state of your mind caused by our wrongful act, it is not a question for the jury under the circumstances, but the law holds you guilty of culpable negligence in the attempt to board the train, and we are allowed to go free.' This is too stringent a rule for the case. Culpable negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable, prudent, and honest man would do, or the doing of something which such a man would not do under all the circumstances surrounding the particular case. Shearman & Redfield on Negligence; Kay v. Penna. Railroad Co., 65 Pa. 273 [3 Am. Rep. 628]. Instead, therefore, he should have left it to the jury to say, under all the circumstances in evidence, whether the danger of boarding the train, when in motion, was so apparent as to have made it the duty of the plaintiff to desist from the attempt. There is no objection to the court assisting the jury in the performance of their duty by reminding them of the danger of boarding a train in motion, and the caution and care that passengers should use, as well as of the duties of the carriers and the influence of their wrongful acts in producing the catastrophe. But railroad companies are bound to remember that they owe duties to the public, for whose benefit their charters have been granted, and, therefore, should not be lightly loosed from the effects of their own wrongful acts."

In Filler v. N. Y. Central R. Co. (a steam railroad) 49 N. Y. 47, 10 Am. Rep. 327, cited with approval by this court in the case of Newport, etc., Co. v. McCormick, 106 Va. 517, 521, 59 S. E. 281, in which last-named case it was held that it was not per se negligence to step from a moving street car, it was said by the Court of Appeals of New York: "That there was more hazard in leaving a car while in motion, although moving very slowly, than when it is at rest, is self-evident. But whether it is imprudent and careless to make the attempt depends upon circumstances; and where a party by the wrongful act of another has been placed in circumstances calling for an election between leaving the cars or submitting to an inconvenience and further wrong, it is a proper question for the jury whether it was a prudent and ordinarily careful act or whether it was a rash and reckless exposure of the person to peril and hazard."

The rule laid down in those cases seems to me to be the correct one, sustained by the better reason, and in accord with the weight of authority. See New York, P. & N. Ry. Co. v. Coulbourn, 69 Md. 360, 16 Atl. 208, 1 L. R. A. 541, 9 Am. St. Rep. 430; Doss v. M., K. & T. R. Co., 59 Mo. 27, 37, 21 Am. Rep. 371; Strand v. C. & W. R. Co., 64 Mich. 216, 219, 31 N. W. 184; Cent. Railroad, etc., v. Miles, 88 Ala. 276, 261, 262, 6 South. 696; Cumberland Valley R. Co. v. Maugans, 61 Md. 53, 60-63, 48 Am. Rep. 88; Carr v. Eel River, etc., R. Co., 98 Cal. 366, 33 Pac. 213, 21 L. R. A. 354; Mills v. Railway Co., 94 Tex. 242, 59 S. W. 874, 55 L. R. A. 497; L. & N. R. Co. v. Crunk, 119 Ind. 542, 21 N. E. 31, 12 Am. St. Rep. 443; Atchison, etc., Ry. Co. v. Holloway, 71 Kan. 1, 80 Pac. 31; Sanders v. Southern Ry. Co., 107 Ga. 132, 32 S. E. 840.

The plaintiff's instate in this case, according to the plaintiff's evidence, had the right to be upon the train; he was told that the train would remain there long enough for him to find his daughter a seat and deposit her baggage and get off; he was diligent in what he had to do on the train, and in his effort to leave it. He was going down the steps of the coach almost in the very act of getting off on the station platform, in the daytime, when the train, by the wrongful and unlawful act of the defendant, began to move slowly. Whether, under these circumstances, it was negligence to attempt to get off of the train, was, in my judgment, a question about which reasonably fair-minded men might differ, and was therefore a question for the jury, and not for the court.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102*)—SAFETY OF PLACE OF WORK—EMPLOYER'S DUTY.

An employer must use ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place of work for his employes, considering the character of the work, and is liable for injuries resulting from failure to use such care; but he may choose any reasonably safe method, being not required to adopt the newest and the best.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 112*)—RAILROADS—SAFETY OF PLACE OF WORK—SWITCHES AND Y'S.

As affecting the safety of employes, the location of a railway siding or switch for freight purposes, as to its curves and grades, is ordinarily an engineering question, which the company is entitled to settle for itself.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 112*)—RAILROADS—SAFETY OF PLACE OF WORK—Y'S.

As affecting a railway company's liability for the death of a brakeman, who was unable to stop a car he was handling on a Y by gravity, the Y was not negligently constructed, though the curves at one point were so sharp that locomotives could not run over it, and the grades were heavy, where the Y had been so maintained for 15 years without injury to any one.

Const. 1902, § 162 (Code 1904, p. cclix), and Code 1904, § 1294k, providing that a railway employe's knowledge of defects in appliances shall not bar recovery for injury caused by them, does not prevent a railway company from adopting any reasonably safe methods in conducting its business or constructing its switches, nor do they change the rule that any risk due merely to the character of a switch is one of the risks of employment.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Orange County.

Action by one Chichester, administrator, against the Potomac, Fredericksburg & Piedmont Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

St. Geo. B. Fitzhugh, for plaintiff in error.
E. H. De Jarnett, Jr., for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This is an action to recover damages from the Potomac, Fredericksburg & Piedmont Railroad Company for the death of Charles S. Waller, an employé of the defendant company, caused by its alleged negligence.

The grounds of negligence relied on for a recovery are in substance: (1) That the switch or Y upon which the accident occurred was not properly constructed as to its grades or curves; (2) that the method adopted for handling the cars upon the switch or Y was dangerous; (3) that the brake on the car from which the plaintiff's intestate fell or was thrown was out of repair; and (4) that the said car was overloaded.

The defendant company operated a narrow-gauge railroad between Fredericksburg and Orange courthouse. At Tinder's, one of its stations on the road, there was a switch in the shape of a Y. On the east leg of this Y freight cars were loaded with timber and lumber and brought down to or near the main track by hand. In February, 1908, there was standing on the east leg of the Y one of the defendant company's cars loaded with lumber. Upon the arrival of one of its trains at that station, the conductor directed the plaintiff's intestate and another brakeman to bring the car down towards the main track, so that it could be attached to the train and carried to Fredericksburg. Both of the brakemen ran toward the car; but the plaintiff's intestate reached it first, boarded it, released the brakes, and started it down the grade. After the car had run a short distance, he applied or attempted to apply the brakes; but, finding that the speed of the car was not much checked, in a further effort to apply the brakes, or in the act of jumping off to avoid a collision with another car a short distance below (it does not clearly appear which), he slipped and fell in front of, and was run over by, the car (No. 12), which caused his death.

The most material matter involved in the case, and one of much importance, is as to the action of the court in submitting to the jury the question whether or not the switch or Y, as to its grades and curves, was properly constructed. It is not contended that the switch or Y was out of repair, but that the manner in which it was constructed and operated rendered it unsafe and dangerous.

The curves in the east leg of the Y, where the cars were brought down by hand, or by gravity, were sharp, so much so that the engines then in use upon the road could not run over it to the point where car No. 12 was loaded and standing. The grades upon this part of the Y were heavy—at some points between 4 and 5 per cent. This had been substantially the condition of the east leg of the Y for more than 15 years. During that time cars had been brought down by hand almost every day, or at least several times a week, and frequently two or three at one time, by one brakeman, without personal injury to any one, though on several occasions those in charge of such cars had lost control of them, or were unable to prevent them from running against or into other cars standing on the Y. The evidence shows that the Y could have been constructed with curves less sharp and grades less heavy, and that plans for a new Y had been made by the defendant's engineer some 6 or 7 years before, and the west leg of the Y rebuilt according to that plan.

It is a general principle of law that the master shall use ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place in which his servant is to work, considering the character of the work in which the servant is engaged, and the master will be held liable for injuries to the servant which result from failure to exercise such care. But the right of selection among reasonably safe methods for doing his work rests with the master. He is not required to adopt the newest and the best, but he performs his duty if he adopts those which are reasonably safe. N. & P. Traction Co. v. Ellington's Adm'r, 108 Va. 245, 249, 250, 61 S. E. 779, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 117, and cases cited.

The general rule seems to be that the location of a siding or switch for freight purposes, as to its curves and grades, is ordinarily an engineering question, which a railway company is entitled to settle for itself.

In the case of Tuttle's Adm'r v. Detroit, etc., Ry. Co., 122 U. S. 189, 7 Sup. Ct. 1166, 80 L. Ed. 1114, one of the grounds of negligence relied on for recovery was that the railway company in the construction of a "boot-jack" siding, negligently and unskillfully constructed the same with so sharp a curve that the drawheads of the cars failed to meet and passed each other, thereby causing the death of the plaintiff's intestate while coupling the cars. In discussing that ground of alleged negligence, the court said: "We have carefully read the evidence presented by the bill of exceptions, and, although it appears that the curve was a very sharp one at the place where the accident happened, yet we do not think that public policy requires the courts to lay down any rule of law to restrict a railroad company as to the curves it shall use in its freight depots and yards, where the safety of passengers and the public is not involved, much less that it should be left to the varying and uncertain opinions of juries to determine such an engineering problem. * * * The interest of railroad companies themselves is so strongly in favor of easy curves as a means of facilitating the movements of their cars that it may well be left to the discretion of their officers and engineers in what manner to construct them for the proper transaction of their business in yards, etc. It must be a very extraordinary case, indeed, in which their discretion in this matter should be interfered with in determining their obligation to their employees."

The rule of law announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in that case was approved by this court in N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Cromer, 101 Va. 667, 671, 44 S. E. 898. In that case it was said: "Courts and juries cannot dictate to railway companies a choice between methods, all of which are shown to be reasonably adequate for the purposes intended to be subserved. Thus to subject them to the varying and uncertain opinions of juries in questions of policy, and to substitute the discretion of the latter for their discretion, would be wholly impracticable, and would prove alike disastrous to the public and the companies." See, also, generally, Boyd v. Harris, 176 Pa. 484, 35 Atl. 222, 223; C. & E., etc., R. Co. v. Driscoll, 176 Ill. 330, 52 N. E. 921-923; Bethlehem Iron Co. v. Weiss, 100 Fed. 45, 40 C. C. A. 270; Gilbert v. Burlington, etc., Ry. Co., 128 Fed. 529, 63 C. C. A. 27.

We are of opinion, therefore, under the facts of this case, that the court erred in submitting to the jury the question whether or not the defendant company was negligent in the method it had adopted for constructing the switch upon which the injury occurred.

The constitutional and statutory provisions (Const. 1902, § 162, [Code 1904, p. cclix]; Va. Code 1904, § 1294k) do not affect this question. The effect of those provisions was not to take away from the railroad company the right to carry on its business in its own way and to adopt any method of constructing its switches it might prefer, which were reasonably safe; nor do they change the rule that any risk that was due merely to the character of the switch was one of the risks of the employment. The effect of those provisions, as was held in Cheatwood's Case, 103 Va. 356, 49 S. E. 489, was merely to abrogate the previously existing rule, which forbade the servant's recovery if he knowingly used defective machinery, etc., and to declare that such knowledge, of itself, should not bar a recovery.

We are of opinion also, that the court erred in submitting to the jury the question whether or not the defendant was negligent in the method of handling cars on the switch. That method was proved to be reasonably safe, and had been used for many years without personal injury to any one, and was in common use.

"Absolute safety," as was said by the court in Norfolk, etc., Co. v. Ellington's Adm'r, supra, "is unattainable, and employers are not insurers. They are liable for the consequences, not of danger, but of negligence, and the unbending test of negligence in methods, machinery, and appliances is the ordinary usage of the business. * * * The test of negligence in the employer is the same, and however strongly they may be convinced that there is a better or less dangerous way, no jury can be permitted to say that the usual and ordinary way commonly adopted by those in the same business is a negligent way for which liability shall be imposed. Juries must necessarily determine the responsibility of individual conduct; but they cannot be allowed to set a standard which shall in effect dictate the customs or control the business of the community."

There was no error in the action of the court in submitting to the jury, as was done in plaintiff's instruction No. 9, the question whether or not the car No. 12 was dangerously overloaded, or its brakes were defective, and, if so, whether or not such dangerous overloading or defective condition of the brakes was the proximate cause of the death of plaintiff's intestate. There was evidence tending to prove that the car was overloaded with the knowledge and consent of the defendant company, and that the brakes were in a defective condition.

Another error assigned is to the action of the court in refusing to exclude the evidence of Cave Anderson, one of the plaintiff's witnesses, on the ground that the witness had acknowledged that he had been paid $10 by the plaintiff's attorney to make a trip to Fredericksburg to examine the condition of the brakes of the car which ran over the plaintiff's intestate, and was to receive $30 more if the plaintiff made a recovery in the case.

The fact that the witness had received more than his services were worth, and was to receive an additional sum in the event the plaintiff was successful, went to the witness' credibility, and not to his competency.

The court refused to exclude the evidence of Shannon, another witness of the plaintiff, because his answers to questions asked him showed that "he was a perfect ignoramus as far as any knowledge of the brake machinery" on the car was concerned.

Although the witness upon some matters as to which he testified seems to have had little knowledge, he testified positively and clearly that one link in the brake chain was longer than the others. This was competent evidence tending to sustain the plaintiff's contention as to the condition of the brake chain, and was admissible. The motion to strike out was properly overruled.

Where evidence is offered, a portion of which is admissible and the other not, and the objection to it is general, the motion to strike out must be overruled. Washington, etc., Ry. Co. v. Lacey, 94 Va. 460-463, 23 S. E. 834.

Other errors are assigned; but it will be unnecessary to notice them in detail, as they are not likely to arise upon the next trial, or are controlled by what has been said in disposing of the errors particularly considered.

The judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

OF NORFOLK.†

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 9, 1910.)

1. LIFE ESTATES (§ 27*)—VOID SALE DURING LIFE ESTATE—REMEDY OF REMAINDERMEN.

Where land subject to a remainder interest was sold under a void decree during the life estate, the proceeds being deposited in bank to await the death of the life tenant, the remaindermen, at the death of the life tenant, could elect to receive the funds so deposited, which would be an acceptance of the benefit of the void decree and estop them from asserting any claim to the land, or they could decline to accept the fund and elect to take the land in specie.

2. WILLS (§ 744*)—ALIENES OF DEVISEES—FUNDS IN COURT.

Where a remainder interest in land was sold under a void decree pending the life estate, the proceeds being deposited in bank to await the death of the life tenant, and the remainder interest was devised by the purchaser, and the remaindermen, upon the death of the life tenant, elected to take the land instead of the fund deposited, alienes of the devisees were entitled to be subrogated to the deposit, and the testator's personal representative was not entitled to it as part of the testator's estate; there being no equity intervening, nor circumstance which should intercept the enforcement of their demands.

Appeal from Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Bill by W. H. Turner's administrator against the Citizens' Bank of Norfolk. Decree of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This case is the sequel to the cases of Turner v. Barraud, 102 Va. 324, 48 S. E. 818, and Suburban Company v. Turner, 105 Va. 458, 54 S. E. 29.

We cannot present the facts which led up to the present case better than by adopting the statement of this court in the last-named case. That statement is as follows:

"In the year 1867 D. C. Barraud, Sr., died in the city of Norfolk, leaving a will by which, among other things, he gave to his grandson, D. C. Barraud, Jr., a life estate in a farm containing 100 acres, known as 'Barron's,' with remainder to his lawful issue, if he should die leaving any, and, if he should die without such issue, then the remainder was to pass, under the residuary clause of the will, to the persons named therein.

"Upon the death of the testator the life tenant took possession of the 'Barron's' farm, and subsequently incumbered his estate by deeds of trust and judgments.

"In the year 1874 D. C. Barraud, Jr., and others, united as complainants in a chancery suit against R. C. Marshall and others. The object of the suit, as stated in the bill, was 'to construe the said will, to fix and determine the rights and interests of the various parties interested therein, to protect and provide for the annuities, and to make partition in kind of the real estate so devised by the said D. C. Barraud, deceased, to and among the parties entitled thereto, according to their respective shares and interests, so that the part or share of your orator, the said D. C. Barraud, therein, may be set apart in kind, if practicable, and so far as practicable, and sold for the benefit of the creditors under the said deeds of trust and judgment creditors aforesaid.'

"In the year 1875 a decree was entered directing the sale of the 'Barron's' farm, remainder as well as the life estate. In the year 1878 a consent decree was entered confirming a private sale of the farm to William H. Turner. This decree also ascertained the remainder interest in the proceeds of that sale to be $1,150.10, and directed it to be deposited in the Citizens' Bank of Norfolk, bearing compound interest, to await the death of the life tenant; and at the same term of the court a final decree was entered striking the case from the docket.

"In the year 1885 William H. Turner, the purchaser at the sale mentioned, died, leaving a will by which he devised the 'Barron's' farm to his son, Henry L. Turner, during his life, and the remainder in fee to his grandson, William H. Turner, Jr. In the year 1891 the said Henry L. Turner and William H. Turner, Jr., conveyed to the Northeast Norfolk Land Company the whole of the 'Barron's' farm, with covenants of general warranty; but in the year 1894 the said land company reconveyed to Henry L. Turner for life, and the remainder in fee to William H. Turner, Jr., about 30 acres of the said farm. The residue of the 'Barron's' farm, about 70 acres, is now owned by, or is subject to the liens of, the appellants, except the Citizens' Bank of Norfolk.

"In the year 1901 Henry L. Turner, the life tenant of the 30 acres of the 'Barron's' farm, and the heirs of the remainderman, William H. Turner, Jr., deceased, instituted a suit against the children of D. C. Barraud, Jr., to remove a cloud upon the title to the said 30 acres of land growing out of the claim of the children of the said D. C. Barraud, Jr., that they were not parties to, nor bound by the decrees entered in, the cause of Barraud v. Marshall, heretofore referred to. Upon a hearing of the said cause of Turner v. Barraud, the circuit court of the city of Norfolk held that the action of the court in selling the remainder interest of the children of D. C. Barraud in the 'Barron's' farm was not binding upon them, and that the decrees and other proceedings in the cause of Barraud v. Marshall, so far as they affect the rights of the said children in and to the land in controversy were null and void. Upon appeal that action of the cir-cult court was affirmed. The history of the case and the reasons for this court's decision are fully set out in the opinion of the court in the report of the case, which is found in 102 Va. 324-388, 46 S. E. 318.

"After the affirmance of the decree appealed from in that case, the personal representative of William H. Turner, deceased (the purchaser of the 'Barron's' farm in the case of Barraud v. Marshall) instituted his suit in the circuit court against the Citizens' Bank of the City of Norfolk and others, to compel that bank to pay or turn over to him the said sum of $1,150.10 (and its interest), deposited with that bank under decree of the court in the case of Barraud v. Marshall, as above stated."

The plaintiff rested his right of recovery of the money in bank upon the allegation that his testator only acquired an estate in the "Barron's" farm for the life of D. C. Barraud, Jr., by virtue of decrees in Barraud v. Marshall, and that a trust arose to refund to him the fund on deposit (the purchase price of the remainder interest in the "Barron's" farm), the right to which on the death of Turner devolved upon him as personal representative.

The circuit court granted the relief prayed for in the bill, but upon appeal the decree was reversed. The court, at page 461 of 105 Va., page 30 of 54 S. E., observes: "Treating, however, the sale of the remainder in the 'Barron's' farm in the case of Barraud v. Marshall as a nullity so far as it affected the rights of the issue of D. C. Barraud, Jr., it does not follow that it was a nullity as to the heirs of D. C. Barraud, Sr. They were parties to that suit and consented to the decree, which confirmed the sale of the 'Barron's' farm, which included the remainder as well as the life estate. This being so, they would not be heard to object that the sale as to them was not valid and binding, and upon the death of D. C. Barraud, Jr., without issue, as it is possible, the heirs of D. C. Barraud, Sr., would be entitled to the fund deposited in the Citizens' Bank, and the title to the remainder interest in the 'Barron's' farm would be perfected in those who have acquired the rights of William H. Turner, Sr., the purchaser in the case of Barraud v. Turner."

Consequently, the court held that the fund in bank could not be properly disposed of until after the death of D. C. Barraud, Jr., and the bill was accordingly dismissed, but without prejudice.

Jas. E. Heath, for appellant. W. W. Old & Son, Jeffries, Wolcott, Wolcott & Lankford, Garnett & Garnett, W. L. Williams, Cutchins & Cutchins, and John B. Jenkins, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. (after stating the facts as above). D. C. Barraud, Jr., died in the year 1908, leaving "lawful issue" surviving him. Whereupon the personal representative of William H. Turner, Sr., filed another bill in the circuit court of the city of Norfolk to recover the money deposited in the Citizens' Bank under the decree in the case of Barraud v. Marshall (which we shall hereafter designate as the "court fund"), as an asset belonging to the estate of his testator. All parties in interest were convened in that suit, and the children of D. C. Barraud, Jr., having disclaimed and renounced all interest in the court fund, the circuit court, upon the pleadings and an agreed statement of facts, passed the decree under review, denying the prayer of the bill, and, after deducting certain costs, attorney's fees, and taxes, awarded the court fund to the parties in possession of the "Barron's" farm (at the time of the death of the life tenant, D. C. Barraud, Jr.), as alienees of the devisees of William H. Turner, Sr., deceased, in proportion to their respective holdings.

By the terms of the certificate the court fund was deposited to the credit of the suit of Barraud v. Marshall, for the benefit of such persons as might be entitled to the same under the will of the testator, D. C. Barraud, Sr., and the children (the "lawful issue") of D. C. Barraud, Jr., having survived their father, became entitled to the fund, provided they should elect to receive it.

On the death of D. C. Barraud, Jr., either one of two courses was open to the children: They could have elected to receive the court fund, which would have been an acceptance of the benefit of the void decree in the original suit, under which their remainder interest was sold, and estopped them from asserting any claim to the land; or they could have declined to accept the court fund, and have elected to take the land in specie. The effect of the former course would have inured to the benefit of the appellees, and confirmed their title to the land; the effect of the latter was to oust the appellees of their title to the land, and, as the learned circuit court held, entitled them to be subrogated to the rights of the children to the court fund.

The concrete question, therefore, for our determination, is whether the devisees of William H. Turner, Sr. (or rather their alienees), who have been disappointed of what they would otherwise have been entitled to retain (the land devised) by the election of the Barraud children to take land instead of the court fund (the purchase price of the land), are entitled in equity to resort to the court fund to make good the benefits intended to be bestowed upon them by the testator's will.

The general doctrine of subrogation and the kindred principles of substitution, compensation, and election, have repeatedly received consideration at the hands of this court, and in no jurisdiction has that doctrine been more liberally applied to meet the exigencies of particular cases than in this state.

In a note to Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea, 1 L. C. in Eq. pt. 1, 140, it was said that in Powell v. White, 11 Leigh, 309, "the Virginia practice was vindicated against the authority of Lord Eldon, with distinguished and convincing ability."

In Enders v. Brune, 4 Rand. 438, Judge Carr observes: "But the doctrine of substitution is governed by principles wholly different. It has nothing of form, nothing of technicality, about it; and he who, in administering it, would 'stick in the letter,' forgets the end of its creation, and perverts the spirit which gave it birth. It is the creature of equity, and real essential justice is its object."

In American Bonding Co. v. National Mechanics' Bank of Baltimore, 99 Am. St. Rep. 466, Judge Freeman, in note (page 478), says: "Legal subrogation is not founded upon contract or privity or strict suretyship. It is born of equity, and results from the natural justice of placing the burden where it ought to rest. It does not flow from any fixed rule of law, but rather from principles of justice, equity, and benevolence. It is a purely equitable result, depending, like other equitable doctrines, upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case to call it forth. It is a device adopted or invented by equity to compel the ultimate discharge of a debt or obligation by him who in good conscience ought to pay it."

It is a very ancient maxim of the law that "he who bears the burden ought also to derive the benefit." Broom's Max. 712.

In Sheldon on Subrogation (2d Ed.), the learned author, at section 35, says: "The purchaser from a devisee, whose purchase money has been applied in payment of debts of the testator, will be subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose demands he has thus satisfied." Gibson v. McCormick, 10 Gill & J. (Md.) 65. See, also, Judge Freeman's note to American Building Co. v. Nat., etc., Bank, supra, 99 Am. St. Rep., at page 529; Sheldon on Subrogation, § 86a; Pease v. Egan, 181 N. Y. 262, 30 N. E. 102.

At section 218, Mr. Sheldon says: "Beneficiaries under a will, who have, by the election of another legatee, been disappointed of what they would otherwise have received, will be allowed compensation for their loss out of what the latter would by a different election have taken under the will"—citing Pickersgill v. Rodger, 5 Ch. Div. 163; Wilkinson v. Dent, L. R. 6 Ch. 339, 341; Reeve v. Reeve, 1 Vern. 219; Welby v. Welby, 2 Ves. & B. 187, 190; Bor v. Bor, 3 Bro. P. C. 167; Dean v. Hart, 62 Ala. 308; Key v. Griffin, 1 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 67; Timberlake v. Parish, 5 Dana (Ky.) 345.

The reason of the rule is stated in Bor v. Bor, supra, as follows: "Where a testator, making provision for the different branches of his family, gives a fee-simple estate to one and a settled estate to another, imagining that he had power so to do, a tacit condition is implied, to be annexed to the devise of the fee-simple estate, that the devisee thereof shall permit the settled estate to go according to the will, and if in that respect he should disappoint the will, what is devised to him shall go to the person so disappointed; it being presumed that, if the testator had known his defect of power to devise the settled estate, he would out of the estate in his power have provided for that branch of his family who was not entitled to the settled estate, and have declared that no person should enjoy a legacy or devise who controverted his power as to any benefit given to another." See, also, Sheldon on Subrogation, sec. 219.

It must be remembered that the present case is supplemental merely to the original suit of Barraud v. Marshall, and that the court possesses the same power of direction and disposition with respect to the court fund that could be exercised in the original case if the same were still pending. It will be also noted that there is no suggestion, either in the pleadings or agreed statement of facts, of the intervention of any equity or the existence of any circumstance which should intercept the enforcement of the meritorious demand of the appellees to the court fund. They have confessedly been deprived of property which produced this identical court fund, by the election of parties whose right to have appropriated it in exoneration of that property cannot be questioned; and impotent, indeed, would be the processes of a court of equity, if it could devise no remedy for applying the "court fund" in reimbursement of the loss to which the appellees, without fault on their part, have thus been subjected.

Says Pomeroy, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (2d Ed., § 109): "Equitable remedies . . . are distinguished by their flexibility, their unlimited variety, their adaptability to circumstances, and the natural rules which govern their use. There is, in fact, no limit to their variety and application. The court of equity has the power of devising its remedy and shaping it so as to fit the changing circumstances of every case and the complex relations of all the parties."

With all the parties and the subject-matter before it, and with the ultimate destination of the fund, as it seems to us, plainly in sight, there could be no justification for a court of equity to relinquish its administration of the court fund in favor of a personal representative, on the theory that it is an asset of the estate, to the administration of which he is exclusively entitled.

This view of the case renders the consideration of the remaining assignment, with respect to the payment of costs, attorney's fees, and taxes, unnecessary.

For these reasons, the decree of the circuit court must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

JOHNSON v. WILLIAMS et al.

1. ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS (§ 275*)—ACTIONS BY ASSIGNEE—NECESSARY PARTIES.

In a suit by trustees for the benefit of creditors, in which neither the creditors nor an ostensible partner of the assignor were parties, the court cannot determine whether the latter is personally liable to the assignor's creditors on the ground of estoppel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors, Cent. Dig. §§ 819-823; Dec. Dig. § 275.*]

2. PARTNERSHIP (§ 34*)—OSTENSIBLE PARTNERS—LIABILITY.

One who holds himself out as a partner in an ostensible firm, and causes the creditors of such firm to give a credit, is personally liable to such creditors, though he has a right of action over against the real debtor for money so paid out.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 49; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 34*)—OSTENSIBLE PARTNERS—ESTOPPEL TO DENY LIABILITY—ESTOPPEL INTER SE.

No equitable estoppel can exist between parties who were not misled by each other's conduct, so that the members of an ostensible firm are not estopped as between themselves from denying the partnership, though they would be as to third persons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 49; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

4. PARTNERSHIP (§ 180*)—APPLICATION OF ASSETS TO LIABILITIES—OSTENSIBLE FIRMS—RIGHTS OF INDIVIDUAL AND FIRM CREDITORS.

Since partnership creditors have no right to have their debts satisfied out of partnership assets, except through the equities existing between the partners themselves, creditors of an ostensible firm are not entitled to have the property in the possession of that firm applied to the satisfaction of their debts prior to the individual creditors of the real debtor, so that the claim of a chattel mortgagee under a mortgage executed by the real debtor on property owned by him in conducting a business as a firm would have priority over a subsequent general assignment for his creditors; the creditors of the ostensible firm having no right of priority over the general creditors to have their debts satisfied out of the assets of the ostensible firm.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Isle of Wight County.

Suit by one Williams and others, trustees, against G. H. Johnson. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, for further proceedings as directed.

Jno. N. Sebrell, Jr., for appellant. R. W. Withers, Jas. U. Burges, Geo. F. Whitley, and E. H. Williams, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. It appears from the facts agreed that G. H. Johnson was the sole owner of a hardware business in the town of Smithfield, which was conducted under the name of G. H. Johnson & Co. He was also the sole owner of an undertaking business, conducted in the same town, but at a different house, under the name of Johnson & Seward. Seward owned no part of the business, received none of the profits, but occasionally worked in the undertaking establishment, for which he received pay for the time he worked. With Seward's knowledge his name appeared on the sign in front of the house in which the undertaking business was conducted, also on letter heads, bill heads, and stationary generally. Orders for goods for the undertaking business were signed "Johnson & Seward," and notes evidencing indebtedness therefor were signed in the same manner; Johnson making the orders and the notes.

On February 1, 1908, Johnson, being indebted to W. E. Johnson in the sum of $1,500 for money advanced and suretyship undertaken, executed a writing in form of a bill of sale, but in fact a chattel mortgage, on all the goods and stock in the undertaking business to W. E. Johnson to secure the said indebtedness, which paper was duly recorded on the same day. On the 20th of the same month, Johnson, being insolvent, executed a deed of assignment to E. H. Williams and two other persons as trustees, conveying all his property of every kind for the benefit of all his creditors pro rata.

The trustees in the deed of assignment filed their bill, asking to administer the trust under the direction of the court, making G. H. Johnson, their grantor, and W. E. Johnson, the chattel mortgagee, parties defendant. Neither Seward nor the creditors of Johnson were made parties.

Upon a hearing of the cause the trial court held that the chattel mortgage, although prior in time to the general assignment, was subordinate to that assignment, and that the chattel mortgagee was entitled to receive nothing under it until all the creditors of G. H. Johnson, trading as Johnson & Seward, had been paid in full, directed the trustees to so distribute the proceeds of the undertaking business and dismissed the bill. From that decree this appeal was taken.

The second error assigned (and in the view we take of the case the only one that it is necessary to consider) is that the trial court erred in holding that the creditors of Johnson in the undertaking business had a lien on the assets of that business superior to the chattel mortgage of W. E. Johnson.

Assuming (and we cannot do more in this case, as neither Seward nor the creditors are parties to this suit) that Seward was and is personally liable to the creditors of Johnson in the undertaking business, as ostensible partner, on the ground of estoppel, does that have the effect of giving the creditors of the ostensible firm the right to have the property which was in the possession and use of that firm applied to the satisfaction of their debts in priority to the claim of W. E. Johnson, the individual creditor of G. H. Johnson?

The cases are not in harmony upon this question. Some support the view that the creditors of the ostensible partnership have such priority (see Kelly v. Scott, 49 N. Y. 595; Hillman v. Moore, 3 Tenn. Ch. 454; Thayer v. Humphrey, 91 Wis. 276, 64 N. W. 1007, 30 L. R. A. 549, 51 Am. St. Rep. 887, and cases cited; Van Kleeck v. Hammell, 87 Mich. 599, 49 N. W. 872, 24 Am. St. Rep. 184; Adams v. Albert, 155 N. Y. 356, 49 N. E. 929, 63 Am. St. Rep. 679); others that they have no priority (see Kerr v. Potter, 6 Gill [Md.] 404; Reese v. Bradford, 13 Ala. 346; Scull's Appeal, 115 Pa. 141, 7 Atl. 588; Broadway Nat. Bank v. Wood, 165 Mass. 312, 43 N. E. 100, and cases cited). The weight of authority seems to be in favor of the latter view. 30 Cyc. 395; Broadway Nat. Bank v. Wood, supra.

While the question seems to be one of first impression in this jurisdiction, the principles by which it is to be determined are, as it seems to us, well settled.

In Shackelford v. Shackelford, 32 Grat. 481, 503, President Moncure gives the reason why the social creditors of an actual partnership have priority over the individual creditors of the partners in the distribution of the social assets. He says: "We know that ordinarily a partnership estate is liable to the payment of the debts of the firm in preference of the individual debts of the partners. This is the right of the individual partners inter se. The creditors of the partnership have no such right of priority over the creditors of the partners individually, but only by substitution to the rights of the partners inter se. The partners may release this right, and the creditors of the partnership cannot complain; for it is not their right, except subject to the disposition and control of the partners themselves, to whom it belongs."

In Robinson v. Allen, 85 Va. 721, 729, 8 S. E. 835, 839, it was held that the right of the simple contract creditors of a partnership to have social assets specifically appropriated in equity to the payment of their debts in preference to the creditors of an individual partner was a derivative one—that it was "merely the right to be substituted to the equity the partners have inter se to have the property so applied. * * *

And in Millhiser v. McKinley, 98 Va. 207, 209, 35 S. E. 446, 447, Judge Riely, speaking for the court, says that ordinarily a partnership estate is liable to the payment of the debts of the firm in preference to the individual debts of the partners. "This is the right of the partners inter se. The creditors of the partnership have no such right of priority over the separate creditors of the partners, otherwise than by substitution to the rights of the partners inter se. The partners may release this right, and if they do so bona fide the creditors cannot complain, for it is not their right, except subject to the proper disposition and control of the partners themselves."

The social creditors having no right to have their debts satisfied out of the social assets, except through the equities of the partners between themselves, it would seem to follow that if there be no partnership there are no equities to which such creditors can be substituted. If one holds himself out as a partner, or permits himself to be so held out when he is not a partner, and has no interest in the assets in the possession of the ostensible firm, out of what does his equities grow? The fact that his conduct caused the creditors of the ostensible firm to give it credit will make him personally liable to such creditors, and give him a right of action against the real debtor for any sum that he may have to pay; but it does not give him a lien therefor on that debtor's property. By his conduct he has become liable for the debts of the ostensible firm; but as between himself and the real debtor he is a mere surety, and with no higher rights than any other surety. As between him and the creditors of the ostensible firm, he is estopped from denying his liability as a partner; but this equity is between him and the creditors. Neither he nor the other members of the ostensible firm are estopped from denying the partnership as between themselves. Neither was misled by the other's conduct, for they knew from the beginning that there was no partnership. There can be no equitable estoppel between parties where neither has been misled by the conduct of the other. To hold, as some courts do, that they or either of the members of the ostensible partnership are estopped to deny that the property in the possession and use of the ostensible firm is partnership property, is to ignore, as it seems to us, the principles upon which the doctrine of equitable estoppel is based, and to declare equities between the ostensible partners which have no existence in fact.

If the creditors of an actual partnership have no independent right to have the social assets subjected to the payment of their debts in preference to the creditors of the individual partners, but their right to such priority is a derivative one, by substitution to the rights of the partners between themselves, the creditors of an ostensible partnership can only have this right of priority by a like substitution to the equities of the partners between themselves, unless the creditors of an ostensible partnership have rights superior to the rights of the creditors of an actual partnership. This, of course, cannot be so. Since, as we have seen, there are no equities between the ostensible partners, there being neither a partnership nor partnership property, there is nothing to which its creditors can be substituted.

In Broadway Nat. Bank v. Wood, supra, the court, in discussing the right of partners to have partnership property first applied to partnership debts, said: "In applying the foregoing doctrine to cases where a person is ostensibly, but not actually, a member of a partnership, and is therefore under a personal estoppel to deny his liability, it follows that a creditor who, by reason of this estoppel, can maintain a personal action against him, cannot extend his estoppel so as to bind the property which was in possession and use of the actual partners. The ostensible partner himself has no equity to have the property applied to the payment of the claims upon which he is liable, and therefore the creditors holding those claims, who are merely subrogated to his rights and equities, have no such equity."

In Bixler v. Kresge, 169 Pa. 405, 32 Atl. 414, 47 Am. St. Rep. 920, the question was whether the creditors of an alleged partnership had priority over the individual creditor who levied an execution on the alleged firm property. It appeared in that case that one of the alleged partners was not in fact a partner, but had permitted himself to be held out as such when he was in fact a hired man working for wages. The court in its opinion, in discussing that question, said: "Between the partners themselves the assets of the firm constitute a fund for the payment of their liabilities, and each member has an equity which he can enforce to accomplish this result, and of consequence a lien on the property to that extent. When a creditor levies on the property of a firm, his execution fixes and attaches to this right to the same extent that it existed in the partners, and hence the preference over a separate execution creditor in the distribution. All this is predicable of a case of joint property only. But where there was no joint property the rule has nothing to operate on. The mere name is not enough in such a case. There must be an equity. As the equity never existed, a creditor's execution would not attach to any right amounting to a lien to have the assets appropriated to a partnership debt. * * * The appellant cannot work out his equities through the partners, for these as such did not exist inter se, and the individual owner could not give him this right of a prior execution against him individually."

And the same court, in Scull's Appeal, 115 Pa. 141, 7 Atl. 588, said: "The rule that joint creditors are entitled to priority over separate creditors in the distribution of a joint estate applies only where there is such a joint estate for distribution. Where there is no such joint estate, the creditor who first acquired a lien upon the property is entitled to the fund arising from a sale thereof in preference to subsequent creditors. See Goldthwelt v. Janney, 102 Ala. 431, 15 South. 560, 28 L. R. A. 161, 48 Am. St. Rep. 56; Smith v. Smith, 87 Iowa, 93, 54 N. W. 73, 43 Am. St. Rep. 370; Glenn v. Gill, 2 Md. 1, 15;

Doner v. Stauffer, 1 Pen. & W. (Pa.) 193, 21 Am. Dec. 370; 30 Cyc. 395, 396.

The creditors of Johnson, trading as Johnson & Seward, having no right to have the assets of the undertaking business subjected to the payment of their debts in preference to the individual creditors of Johnson, it follows that the chattel mortgage of W. E. Johnson, being prior in time, has priority over the general assignment of G. H. Johnson.

The decree appealed from must be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, to be proceeded with in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Suit by the Carnegie Trust Company and others against the Security Life Insurance Company of America and others to have a certain voting trust agreement annulled. From a decree sustaining the validity of the agreement, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

The voting trust agreement above referred to is as follows:

"This agreement, made this first day of February, 1907, by and between Jos. E. Otis, W. O. Johnson, W. T. Durbin, P. J. Kieran and Edward E. Duff, hereinafter called 'trustees,' parties of the first part, and the several persons whose names are hereunto subscribed, hereinafter called 'subscribers,' parties of the second part, witnesseth:

"Whereas, the trustees have agreed to purchase 30,000 shares of the capital stock of the Security Life & Annuity Company of America, hereinafter for convenience termed 'Security Company,' all of which stock has been issued and now stands on the books of said company in the name of the trustees; and

"Whereas, said subscribers have arranged to procure an interest in said shares so purchased, as hereinafter provided; and

"Whereas, all parties hereto, in order to promote and protect the value of said stock, and to secure the satisfactory management of said Security Company for a period of years, are desirous that the title to all of said stock shall at all times stand on the books of said Security Company in the name of the trustees during the continuance of this agreement, and that said stock shall be held together in one block and voted as the trustees, or a majority of them, may determine, for the period of twenty-five (25) years from February 1, 1907; and

"Whereas, said sale of said interest in said stock to the subscribers has been made by the trustees, and accepted by said subscribers, upon the express condition that the same should not vest in the subscribers any right to vote said stock, during the period of this agreement, or any title thereto, except such rights as are in terms conferred by the trustees' certificates, hereinafter provided to be issued by the trustees; and

"Whereas, said Otis, Johnson and Durbin, the three trustees first named above, now hold as trustees under a trust agreement, dated June 14, 1906, certain shares of the capital stock of said Security Company, and have issued under that trust agreement certain trustees' certificates to various parties;

"Whereas the said Otis, Johnson and Durbin have agreed to procure the exchange of the trustees' certificates issued by them under said agreement of date June 14, 1906, in exchange for the trustees' certificates calling for a like amount of stock to be issued as hereinafter provided:

"Now, therefore, it is agreed by and between the parties hereto in consideration of the premises, and of their mutual covenants each with the other, as follows:

"First. Each subscriber hereto, or to any counterpart hereof, agrees to pay to the trustees upon the signing of this agreement the amount set opposite his respective name, and for each twenty-five ($25.00) dollars so paid, such subscriber, his legal representative or assigns, shall be entitled to receive at the expiration of this agreement, one share of the capital stock of said Security Life & Annuity Company of America. The sums paid by the subscribers shall be used and retained by the trustees as their own property for the purchase price of the trustees' certificates to be issued to subscribers as hereinafter provided. Provided, however, that the subscribers to the trust agreement, dated June 14, 1906, who become parties hereto as provided in the succeeding clause hereof, shall not be required to pay any money to the trustees, the surrender of their trustees' certificates issued under said agreement of June 14, 1906, being accepted by the parties hereto in lieu of other payment.

"Second. The subscribers to the trust agreement, dated June 14, 1906, hereinbefore referred to, may become parties hereto by signing this agreement and by surrendering the trustees' certificates held by them under said trust agreement of date June 14, 1906, and upon such signature and surrender such parties shall be entitled to receive trustees' certificates issued hereunder as hereinafter provided, setting forth the number of shares of stock of said Security Company to which such subscribers will be entitled at the expiration of this agreement, which shall be the same number of shares as expressed in the trustees' certificates issued under said agreement of June 14, 1906.

"Said Otis, Johnson and Durbin, upon the surrender of all of the trustees' certificates issued as above described, under said agreement of June 14, 1906, will transfer all the shares represented in such certificates to the trustees herein named.

"Third. Upon full payment by each subscriber of the amount of his subscription, a certificate shall be issued to him by the trustees, setting forth the number of shares of stock of said Security Life & Annuity Company of America to which such subscriber will be entitled at the expiration of this agreement, which certificate shall be in substantially the following form, and which is herein referred to for convenience as a 'trustees' certificate':

"No. Shares.

"Trustees' Certificate under Agreement dated February 1, 1907.

"Security Life & Annuity Company of America.

"This is to certify that on the 1st day of February, 1932, will be entitled to receive a certificate, or certificates, for full paid shares of the par value of ten dollars ($10.00) each, of the capital stock of the Security Life & Annuity Company, and in the meantime to receive payments equal to the dividends, if any, collected by the undersigned trustees, or their successors, upon a like number of such shares standing upon the books of said company in the name of the said trustees, or their successors, less expenses, if any, incurred by said trustees, under the agreement hereinafter referred to, and until after the actual delivery of such stock certificates the said trustees, or their successors, shall possess, and shall be entitled to exercise all rights of every name and nature, including the right to vote with respect to any and all such stock, it being expressly stipulated that no voting right passes by or under this certificate, or by or under any agreement, expressed or implied. This certificate is issued under and pursuant to the terms of a certain agreement dated February 1, 1907, entered into by and between Joseph E. Otis, W. O. Johnson, W. T. Durbin, P. J. Kieran and Edward E. Duff, as trustees, of the first part, and sundry other subscribers to said agreement, of the second part. This certificate is transferable only on the books of the undersigned trustees by the registered holder either in person or by attorney, duly authorized according to the rules established for that purpose by the trustees, and on surrender hereof; and, until so transferred, the trustees may treat the registered holder as the owner hereof for all purposes whatsoever, except that the delivery of stock certificates hereunder shall not be made without surrender hereof.

"In witness whereof, the said trustees have executed this certificate this of, A. D. 190...

"Joseph E. Otis,
"W. O. Johnson,
"W. T. Durbin,
"P. J. Kieran, and
"Edward E. Duff,
"Trustees.

"Countersigned:

"..... Trustee."

"Said trustees' certificate shall be transferable on the books of the trustees by the holder thereof in person or by attorney upon surrender thereof properly endorsed. Upon such assignment and surrender a new trustees' certificate shall be issued to the transferee by the trustees, and the person accepting such assignment, or accepting such new certificate shall be bound by the terms of this agreement as fully to all intents and purposes as if he signed the same. Such trustees' certificates may bear the facsimile signatures of said trustees, provided they are countersigned by one of the trustees, or their successors.

"Fourth. On the first day of February, 1932, upon surrender of any trustees' certificate then outstanding hereunder, the trustees will in accordance with the terms thereof, deliver corresponding certificates or shares of the capital stock of said Security Company, such delivery to be made only out of, and from, certificates of stock heretofore or hereafter issued to, or standing in the name of, the said trustees or their successors.

"Fifth. Should any dividends be paid to the said trustees or their successors, on the shares of stock standing in their names, they shall, within a reasonable time after the receipt by them, of such dividends, distribute the moneys so received by them to the holders of the trustees' certificates issued hereunder in proportion to the number of shares named in the certificate or certificates of each holder. Provided, however, that the trustees may retain out of any such dividends any necessary expense to which they may be put by reason of the trusteeship hereby created. In making payment of such dividends the trustees, or their successors, shall be entitled to treat the persons in whose names such trustees' certificates stand upon the books of the trustees, as the owners thereof for all purposes, and shall not be affected by any notice to the contrary.

"Sixth. Each of the said trustees shall have power to appoint his own successor in trust, and to make such appointment at any time, either by deed or by will, and each successor in trust shall in turn have the same power of appointment of his successor. Such appointment shall become effective immediately upon the death, resignation, insanity or permanent removal from the United States of such trustee, and any such appointment may be revoked by the person making the same at any time prior to its actually becoming effective. Wherever in this agreement the trustees are referred to, such terms shall be held to embrace the trustees for the time being in office as such, whether original or successor.

"Seventh. In case of the failure of either of said trustees, or their successors, to appoint a successor in trust, then, upon the death, resignation, insanity, or permanent removal from the United States of such trustee or successor in trust, his successor shall be appointed by an instrument in writing signed by a majority of the remaining trustees hereunder, then in office, and in case they are unable to agree upon such successor in trust, the appointment shall then be made by the person who shall hold the office of president of the Western Trust & Savings Bank of Chicago, Illinois, or its successor or assigns.

"Eighth. Nothing herein contained shall constitute the parties hereto partners, but this agreement shall bind and inure to the benefit of the trustees, and each of them, and their successor, or successors, and each of them, in the trust hereby created, and shall bind and inure to the benefit of the subscribers hereto and their legal representatives and assigns.

"Ninth. The trustees may, in their discretion, select some bank in Chicago to act as transfer agent for the trustees' certificates herein provided for. And in that event, no such trustees' certificate shall be valid until countersigned by such transfer agent.

"Tenth. Said trustees, or their successors in trust, from time to time, shall vote the shares of stock embraced in this agreement at all meetings, general or special, of the stockholders of said Security Company upon any matter, proposition or thing which may be submitted to any such meeting, and they shall possess in that respect the same powers as though they were the sole, unrestricted owners of such stock. The trustees may use said voting power in the election of any such trustees as officers or directors of said Security Company.

"The trustees shall not be liable for mistakes of law or fact, nor for errors of judgment in using such voting power, or otherwise in connection therewith, except for their own individual misfeasance, and no trustee shall be responsible for the acts or omission of any other trustee hereunder. All action to be taken by, and questions arising between the trustees from time to time, shall be determined by the decision of the majority of those then acting as trustees, either at a meeting, or by writing, with or without meeting, and in like manner the trustees may establish their rules of action.

"Any trustee hereunder may vote in person or by proxy to any other person, whether or not a trustee, and a proxy in writing signed by a majority of the trustees shall be sufficient authority to the person named therein to vote the stock held by all the trustees hereunder at any meeting, general or special, of the stockholders of the Security Company. Any proxy executed by the direction of a majority of the trustees, as herein provided, may be executed by such majority in the names of all the trustees.

"Upon the succession to office of a successor to any trustee hereunder, a majority of the trustees in office at the time of such succession are hereby irrevocably vested with full power should they deem it necessary or advisable to exercise it, to assign the shares of stock covered by this agreement to the trustees then in office, including such successor, to the end that a new certificate for such stock may be issued in the names of the trustees at that time duly appointed hereunder.

"Eleventh. An original hereof shall be signed by the trustees and retained by them, and counterparts may be signed by the subscribers, but all together shall be taken and deemed one original instrument, and held by the trustees.

"In witness whereof, the trustees, parties of the first part hereto, have subscribed an original hereof, and the subscribers, parties of the second part hereto, have subscribed said original, or counterparts thereof as of the day and year first above written."

Wm. A. Keener, Wyndham R. Meredith, and Coke & Pickrell, for appellants. Montague & Montague, for appellee, Security Ins. Co. Braxton & Eggleston, Pam & Hurd, for trustees.

KEITH, P. The Carnegie Trust Company and Robert J. Davidson filed their bill in the chancery court of the city of Richmond, from which it appears that the Carnegie Trust Company is the holder and owner of certain voting trust certificates, representing 12,200 shares of the capital stock of the Security Life Insurance Company of America and 188 shares of the capital stock of that company; that Robert J. Davidson, trustee of the Guarantee Title & Trust Company of Pittsburg, is the holder of voting trust certificates representing 12,667 shares of the capital stock of said Security Life Insurance Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Virginia, with its principal office in the city of Richmond and its chief executive offices in the city of Chicago, state of Illinois; that the principal business of the insurance company is to do a general life insurance business; and that there have been legally issued and are now outstanding 50,000 shares of its capital stock, each of the par value of $10. The bill then sets out in detail the negotiations entered into between certain named persons which resulted in what is known as the "February agreement" from which it appears that by an agreement made the 1st day of February, 1907, between Otis, Johnson, Durbin, Kieran, and Duff, parties of the first part, who are named as "trustees," and other parties of the second part, who are named as "subscribers," the trustees have agreed to purchase 30,000 shares of the capital stock of the Security Life Insurance Company of America, all of which stock had been issued and stands on the books of the company in the names of the trustees. "And whereas said subscribers have arranged to procure an interest in said shares so purchased, as hereinafter provided; and

"Whereas, all parties hereto, in order to promote and protect the value of said stock, and to secure the satisfactory management of said Security Company for a period of years, are desirous that the title to all of said stock shall at all times stand on the books of said Security Company in the name of the trustees during the continuance of this agreement, and that said stock shall be held together in one block and voted as the trustees, or a majority of them, may determine, for the period of twenty-five (25) years from February 1, 1907; and

"Whereas, said sale of said interest in said stock to the subscribers has been made by the trustees, and accepted by said subscribers, upon the express condition that the same should not vest in the subscribers any right to vote said stock, during the period of this agreement, or any title thereto, except such rights as are in terms conferred by the trustees' certificates hereinafter provided to be issued by the trustees; and

"Whereas, said Otis, Johnson and Durbin, the three trustees first named above, now hold as trustees under a trust agreement, dated June 14, 1906, certain shares of the capital stock of said Security Company, and have issued under that trust agreement certain trustees' certificates to various parties; and

"Whereas, the said Otis, Johnson and Durbin have agreed to procure the exchange of the trustees' certificates issued by them under said agreement of date June 14, 1906, in exchange for the trustees' certificates calling for a like amount of stock to be issued as hereinafter provided;

"Now, therefore, it is agreed by and between the parties hereto, in consideration of the premises, and of their mutual covenants each with the other, as follows:

"First. Each subscriber hereto, or to any counterpart hereof, agrees to pay to the trustees upon the signing of this agreement the amount set opposite his respective name, and for each twenty-five ($25.00) dollars so paid, each subscriber, his legal representative or assigns, shall be entitled to receive at the expiration of this agreement, one share of the capital stock of said Security Life & Annuity Company of America. The sums paid by the subscribers shall be used and retained by the trustees as their own property for the purchase price of the trustees' certificates to be issued to subscribers as hereinafter provided. Provided, however, that the subscribers to the trust agreement, dated June 14, 1906, who become parties hereto as provided in the succeeding clause hereof, shall not be required to pay any money to the trustees, the surrender of their trustees' certificates issued under said agreement of June 14, 1906, being accepted by the parties hereto in lieu of other payment."

It then provides that the subscribers to the trust agreement of June 14, 1906, may become parties to the agreement of February 1, 1907, by signing the last-named agreement and surrendering the trustees' certificates held by them under the agreement of June 14, 1906, and shall then be entitled to receive trustees' certificates issued under the agreement of February 1, 1907, in strict accordance with its terms; it being expressly stipulated upon the face of each certificate that: "No voting right passes by or under this certificate or by or under any agreement, expressed or implied. This certificate is issued under and pursuant to the terms of a certain agreement dated February 1, 1907, entered into by and between Joseph E. Otis, W. O. Johnson, W. T. Durbin, P. J. Kieran and Edward E. Duff, as trustees, of the first part, and sundry other subscribers to said agreement, of the second part. This certificate is transferable only on the books of the undersigned trustees by the registered holder either in person or by attorney, duly authorized according to the rules established for that purpose by the trustees, and on surrender hereof; and until so transferred, the trustees may treat the registered holder as the owner hereof for all purposes whatsoever, except that the delivery of stock certificates hereunder shall not be made without surrender hereof." Provision is then made in the trust agreement for the termination of the trust in 1932 upon the expiration of 25 years, and in the meantime for filling any vacancy that may occur among the trustees or their successors.

By clauses 9 and 10 of the "February agreement," it is provided (clause 9) that: "The trustees may, in their discretion, select some bank in Chicago to act as transfer agent for the trustees' certificates herein provided for. And in that event, no such trustees' certificates shall be valid until countersigned by such transfer agent." And (clause 10) that: "Said trustees, or their successors in trust, from time to time, shall vote the shares of stock embraced in this agreement at all meetings, general or special, of the stockholders of said Security Company upon any matter, proposition or thing which may be submitted to any such meeting, and they shall possess in that respect the same powers as though they were the sole, unrestricted owners of such stock. The trustees may use said voting power in the election of any such trustees as officers or directors of said Security Company."

The bill does not charge that the agreement dated February 1, 1907, and filed as an exhibit with the bill, was procured by fraud; it does not charge that it is fraudulent upon its face; and there is no charge of any fraudulent purpose or act upon the part of the trustees or any other person, natural or artificial, who is made a party to the bill. The true purpose and sole object of the bill is to attack the "February agreement" as creating what is known as a "voting trust," upon the grounds: (1) That the agreement was without consideration; and (2) that all such contracts are void as against the laws of this commonwealth, which, from motives of public policy, will not tolerate a separation of the voting power from the beneficial ownership of stock, but will set the seal of disapprobation upon all attempts to accomplish that result. This being the real issue presented by the pleadings, as we understand them, we have not deemed it necessary or proper to discuss the minor differences existing between the appellants and the appellees as to what are to be deemed the facts proved as presented by the bill and answer, as we do not conceive them to be material to the questions to be discussed and decided.

We are of opinion that a sufficient consideration to support the "February agreement" is to be found in the mutual promises which it discloses; the promise of each being the consideration for the promise of the other. Such a consideration, as its very terms import, will support not only an executed but an executory contract as well. 1 Parsons on Contracts, 464; Machen's Mod. Law of Corp. vol. 2, § 1270.

If the "February agreement" were without consideration, that of course would end it. Although resting upon a valuable consideration, if it had been procured by fraud, or if it were being used to promote a fraudulent purpose, it would be voidable. But, as we have seen, fraud is neither charged nor proven. If it be contrary to the public policy of the state, it is nevertheless void, though resting upon a valuable consideration.

As we have seen in the statement of the case, each holder of a trustees' certificate issued under the "February agreement" took it with notice of every essential feature contained in that agreement—took it with notice declared upon the face of each certificate that it was issued under and pursuant to the terms of a certain agreement dated February 1, 1907, and that it was expressly stipulated that no voting right passed by or under it or by or under any agreement express or implied. If, therefore, the voting trust be unlawful, all who dealt with those certificates were apprised of its illegality, and it might be urged against them with much force that if such transactions involved a wrong they had by their voluntary act become participants in that wrong. But in this case we shall waive all such considerations.

In treating of the rule, "in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis," this court, in the case of Harris v. Harris' Ex'r, 23 Grat. 757, said: "This rule operates only in cases where the refusal of the courts to aid either party frustrates the object of the transaction and takes away the temptation to engage in contracts contra bonos mores, or violating the policy of the law. If it be necessary, in order to discountenance such transactions, to enforce such a contract at law, or to relieve against it in equity, it will be done though both the parties are in in pari delicto. The party is not allowed to allege his own turpitude in such cases, when defendant at law, or prevented from alleging it when plaintiff in equity, whenever the refusal to execute the contract at law, or the refusal to relieve against it in equity, would give effect to the original purpose, and encourage the parties engaging in such transactions." Starke v. Littlepage, 4 Rand. 368.

We shall, therefore, place the appellants in the best position it is possible for them to occupy, permit them to assail without limit a transaction to which they were themselves parties, and to defeat, if contrary to public policy, a contract into which they have voluntarily entered.

We have been referred to no case in this court, and we know of none, in which this question has arisen; it is of the first impression in this commonwealth.

It cannot be gainsaid that in the right of property there are three elements—the legal title to the property, the beneficial interest in it, and the right of control over it—and this is conformable to the definition of a "share of stock," which in 1 Cook on Corporations (6th Ed.) § 312, is defined as a right which its owner has in the management, profits, and ultimate assets of the corporation.

In the certificates under consideration, the management is reserved to the trustees; the profits, after charging them with a just proportion of expenses, pass as dividends to the certificate holders; while the ultimate assets, in this as in other corporations, are only to be distributed and enjoyed when the corporation is terminated.

There are doubtless cases which hold such an agreement as that of February 1, 1907, to be void as against public policy; but in many of them the purpose was unlawful, or there was an effort to achieve a lawful purpose by questionable means.

In Cone v. Russell, 48 N. J. Eq., at page 208, 21 Atl. 847, complainants as executors and trustees held certain shares of stock in an incorporated company; defendants held certain other shares therein, which, added to those held by complainants, constituted a majority of all the shares. Complainants on the one part and defendants on the other entered into a contract by which complainants agreed to execute, and in pursuance thereof did execute, a proxy, irrevocable for five years, to defendants to vote at all stockholders' meetings upon the complainants' shares; and defendants, in consideration thereof, agreed to so vote said shares as that one of the complainants should be continuously employed as manager of the corporation, at a salary of $2,500 a year. It was held that such an agreement was void because against public policy, and because a breach of trust by complainants. It is not conceivable that any other conclusion could have been reached, without regard to the validity or invalidity of the voting trust.

In the case of White v. Thomas Inflatable Tire Co., 52 N. J. Eq. 178, 23 Atl. 75, the contest was upon three grounds: First, that the original contract, by which a minority of stock was given the perpetual right to elect a majority of the directors, and thus control the affairs of the company, was contrary to public policy and, for that reason, void; and, second, that, conceding the contract to be valid and binding between the original parties so long as only 33 per cent. of the stock was issued, it nevertheless became nugatory and void as against the holders of the 17 per cent. of new stock as soon as that was issued. In discussing these questions the court said that it did not find it necessary to determine certain questions bearing upon the first ground of contest stated, which had relation to the transfer of the certificates, because the court had come to the conclusion that the second position taken by the complainants was sound. "The contracts in question were not made a part of the certificate of organization or incorporated into the by-laws. Nor, in my judgment, did they, or could they, be fastened upon, or in any wise affect, the 17,000 shares of stock issued directly to the complainants. And I think this is so, whether the complainants had or had not notice of these contracts, since they did not enter into or form part of the contract between the company and complainants as holders of the new stock. As such holders they were entitled to have the other shares of stock in the company stand upon an equal footing, and to have the affairs of the company managed by a board of directors elected according to law, by a majority of all the stockholders. Unless, as the holders of the new issue of stock, they had such right, they would be deprived of a valuable right belonging to their stock, viz., the right to combine with other stockholders to elect a majority of the directors. In fact, they would be deprived of all voice in the management of the company and of the right which each stockholder has to the benefit of the fundamental and salutary rule that the best interests of the minority are found in a rule by the majority." From the statement of facts it appears that the negotiations for the purchase of the 17,000 shares of stock from the company were carried on by the complainant White, and there was evidence tending to show that before he made the purchase he had notice of the substance of the trust-voting agreement, but this was denied by him. While in the case before us there can be no doubt or question that whoever took one of the trust certificates took it with full notice of all the conditions and limitations attached to it.

In Clowes v. Miller, 60 N. J. Eq. 179, 47 Atl. 845, by a pooling agreement certain persons were to hold the certificates of stockholders for 2½ years, together with proxies authorizing them to vote on any question, and the stockholders by the agreement were not to sell their stock; the object being to finance and complete the enterprise. The court, in holding this agreement valid, suggested that: "No illegal purpose is manifest upon the face of this agreement, nor has any been alleged in the bill. It appears to be consistent with the purposes for which the company was created, and whose continuance appears to be necessary for the advantage of all who are interested in the development of the property. It is expressly declared to be for the benefit of all who join in it."

In Chapman v. Bates, 61 N. J. Eq. 658, 47

Atl. 638, 88 Am. St. Rep. 459, it was held that a proxy and power of attorney made by a stockholder in a corporation, giving voting powers and rights to deal with the stock in various ways, and to sell and exchange it, and conferring an interest, and, by its terms, irrevocable for a period less than three years, will not be revoked upon a bill filed by the maker for that purpose, unless it appears that the purposes are illegal, or in violation of some statute, or against public policy; and that what are known as pooling-agreements are not necessarily illegal, but each case will depend upon the objects to be attained. See, also, Chapman v. Bates, 60 N. J. Eq. 17, 46 Atl. 591.

It is impossible to discuss all the cases cited. Some of them are decided upon considerations as to the nature of irrevocable proxies; others turn upon the statute law of the state in which they are rendered; very many rest upon the fraudulent or otherwise objectionable character of the object to be attained; while others, it must be admitted, condemn a trust such as that under consideration as being contrary to public policy and for that cause null and void. In considering the cases, however, and the text-writers who have commented upon them, it is impossible not to be impressed with the change of opinion which has taken place with respect to the true nature of such contracts. In the early stages of the development of this idea, there was a strong sentiment against them which found expression in the opinions of judges and in the not always temperate language of distinguished commentators upon the law; but experience has demonstrated their usefulness, and the hostility evinced toward them has by degrees diminished.

This change of opinion appears nowhere more strikingly than in the very valuable work of Thompson on Corporations. In his first edition he places trust certificates beyond the pale of the law and declares that they should not be regarded as lawful instruments of commerce but be treated as "something in the nature of counterfeit money as securities which have been issued in violation of the law and in contravention of the public right." The second edition (which is not yet completed) in section 893 on Voting or Pooling Trusts uses the following language: "The fact that the earlier cases were practically unanimous in holding these pooling or voting trusts illegal and that some law-writers and perhaps some courts have broadly stated that all such contracts are void, must, in the light of subsequent cases, and the advancement and development of corporation law, be regarded as an application of a principle to all cases which was intended to fit but one. Under the recent and advanced decisions it may be asserted as the present prevailing doctrine that a pooling trust created by a deposit of stock certificates with a trustee for a specified period of time with the authority to vote the same for the benefit of the owners and to the best interests of the corporation, and without an absolute separation of the voting power from the ownership of the stock, by an agreement which is not a restraint of the alienation of property, not in restraint of trade, not against public policy, and not a fraud upon other stockholders, is legal. This principle is recognized and the rule stated by one of the foremost writers on corporation law, after collecting and commenting on the leading cases on this subject, as follows: "The above decisions seem to lead to the conclusion that a deposit of certificates of stock with trustees for a specified period of time, either with or without a transfer of the same to the trustees, is legal, and is not in violation of the usual statute against the alienation of personal property, and is not opposed to public policy as a restraint upon trade, and is not an implied fraud upon stockholders who were allowed to participate, and is not an illegal separation of the voting power from the ownership of stock; provided always that no actual fraud is involved in the transaction. In other words, such a pooling of stock is not illegal in itself, but like all contracts may be illegal if actual fraud is involved."

Upon the subject of voting trusts, Beach on Private Corporations (Ed. 1891) § 855, says: "Such an agreement, so lawfully formed at the outset, and for a proper consideration, and for a limited period, is binding upon the holders of the trust certificates claiming only under and by virtue of the stock deposited in pursuance thereof, and all the terms of which are, by appropriate statement, made a portion of the trust certificates. Even if one of the motives which led to the creation of the trust was to enable either the trustee or the cestui que trust to vote in a given manner at an approaching election, that motive will not invalidate the transfer. Voting trusts, then, not being illegal upon any principle peculiar to corporation law, can be attacked only on the ground of public policy. What agreements are void as against public policy is very well defined in the law, and contracts which have been held to be so void arrange themselves in five classes: Those founded upon corrupt considerations or moral turpitude; those in violation of a public trust; those in restraint of trade; those in restraint of marriage; those to influence persons in authority."

If the agreement under consideration can be held to come within any of the enumerated classes, it must be that it is in restraint of trade. In what manner and to what extent it restrains trade is not apparent, and we think we are safe in saying that experience has shown that, so far from exercising an injurious influence upon trade, voting trusts have added efficiency, economy, and stability to the administration of corporate affairs.

In Machen's Modern Law of Corporations,

§ 1270, it is said: "Some authorities unquestionably tend to hold that all voting trusts are illegal and void" (citing for that proposition the cases relied upon by counsel for appellants—among them, Harvey v. Linville Imp. Co., 118 N. C. 603, 24 S. E. 489, 32 L. R. A. 265, 54 Am. St. Rep. 749; White v. Thomas Tire Co., 52 N. J. Eq. 178, 28 Atl. 75; Kreissl v. Distilling Co., 61 N. J. Eq. 5, 47 Atl. 471; and the Shepaug Voting Trust Cases, 60 Conn. 553, 24 Atl. 32). "But others," continues the author, "supported, it is submitted, by sounder reasoning, hold that they are lawful if their object is lawful. A 'voting trust' properly so called may be illegal as an evasion of a statute which makes void all proxies more than a year old. Of course, if the object of a voting trust is the accomplishment of some illegal end—the restraint of trade, the formation of a monopoly, or the practical merger of two or more corporations in defiance of law—the courts will have no difficulty in holding the trust illegal. So where the sale by a shareholder of his vote, or the issue of a proxy for money or anything of value, is deemed illegal, a transfer of shares for valuable consideration which is absolute on its face, but which is really designed merely to confer on the transferee the power to vote on the stock for a period of three years, is also illegal, and the transferee acquires no right to vote. But although stock is put in trust for an illegal purpose, the intended cestui que trust is not precluded from compelling the intended trustee to retransfer the shares. Where the object of the trust is legitimate—for instance, to secure control of the company to its bondholders in order to prevent foreclosure and the utter ruin of all the shareholders—the trust should be upheld and carried out. Some authorities declare that the trust is not effective if supported by no other consideration than the mutual agreement between the shareholders to put their stock into the trust; but no reason is perceived for this conclusion. If the trust is valid, and the trustees have a discretion to determine when the condition of the company is such as to justify the termination of the trust, their discretion in that respect will not be overruled or controlled by the courts in the absence of clear proof that it has been abused."

In a note to the case of Morel v. Hoge, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) at page 1140, speaking of voting trusts, it is said: "The plan or device now more commonly adopted for the purpose of procuring and continuing the control of the corporation is to procure the stockholders or some portion of them to deposit their stock, with power to the depositary for a definite period to vote the same, the title to the stock itself being usually, though not always, transferred to the depositary upon a trust for such purpose. This form of agreement has proven better adapted to withstand the legal attacks upon it than that which merely contemplates the procuring of irrevocable proxies. It is obvious, of course, that whatever the form of the agreement, and however skillfully it may be adapted to avoid legal objection, it will be held invalid if its purpose is to secure an illegitimate or improper advantage, to the detriment of the interests of the corporation and of the other stockholders. The practical question, then, is whether an agreement in this form is per se void, as contrary to public policy, or, if not void, whether, in spite of the attempt to make it irrevocable, it may be revoked at the pleasure of the stockholders who have become parties thereto." This is a very precise statement of the question before us, and the author of the note then goes on to give his view as to the present state of the law as applicable to the question: "Probably the prevailing tendency is toward the view that such an agreement is not per se void as against public policy; in other words, that the agreement cannot be declared void irrespective of the propriety of the ultimate purpose to be accomplished, merely because it seeks to accomplish that purpose by means of severing the voting power of the stock from the beneficial ownership thereof. The tendency also appears to be toward the view that such agreement, supposing that it is not void, and is by its terms irrevocable, may not be revoked at the pleasure of the stockholders who have become parties thereto."

In Brightman v. Bates, 175 Mass. 105, 55 N. E. 809, the plaintiff brought suit to recover compensation as the agent for the sale of stock to a syndicate, which was organized for the purpose of obtaining control of a corporation. There was a written agreement by the subscribers, reciting their desire to become members of the syndicate to the end that control of a corporation and advantage to them might be gained, and agreeing to buy the number of shares set opposite their names, and to enter into a pooling contract whereby all the syndicate stock "shall be voted at each annual meeting for a period of not less than three years for such board of directors as shall be named" by a committee of five of the subscribers, with power to the majority of them to fill any vacancy in the committee. The suit was defended upon the ground that the object for which the syndicate was organized was illegal, and that the covenant sued upon was so directly aimed at helping to bring the unlawful arrangement about that it must fall with the other, citing Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co., 130 U. S. 396, 9 Sup. Ct. 553, 32 L. Ed. 979. The court said: "Without deciding whether, if the covenant was dependent upon the rendering of further services, it was so closely connected with the syndicate agreement as to fall if the latter cannot be sustained, we pass to the question whether the latter agreement is unlawful on its face, bearing in mind that unless it is unlawful on its face it has the advantage of a finding in favor of the plaintiff. In dealing with this question, it does not need to be said that combination of common interests is necessary, and constantly is taking place. It is as legitimate for a majority of stockholders to combine as for other people. The fact that they expect 'gain and advantage'—in the words of the syndicate agreement—to accrue to them does not make the syndicate unlawful. That expectation and intent would have that effect only if the gain was to be at the expense of the corporation, or in some way was intended to work a wrong on the other stockholders. No such intent appears, and, although it is impossible not to view such an arrangement with suspicion, it is also impossible to let suspicion take the place of proof. The only serious ground of objection is the agreement that the stock 'shall be voted at each annual meeting' for three years for a board of directors named by the committee. It is suggested that this was an unlawful attempt by the contracting parties to deprive themselves in advance of their deliberate power and duty as stockholders, and to submit themselves to the dictation of five men who in the future might not be even members of the corporation. Perhaps the notion upon which these suggestions are founded has been pressed somewhat further than would be warranted by more far-seeing views, but we have no occasion to discuss it in this broad form. The question before us is not whether it would be possible to carry out the contract in a way which would have made the contract bad if specified in it, but whether it was impossible to carry out the contract in a way which might lawfully have been specified in advance. We put the question in this form because there is no doubt that the subscribers might actually have done the things stipulated without giving any one a right to complain. That is to say, they might have held their stock and voted by previous understanding according to the advice of the committee, as long as they chose. The question is what they might contract to do; for this is supposed to be a case where a contract to do lawful acts is unlawful. * * * A stockholder has a right to put his shares in trust, whatever his motive. If the trust is an active one, he cannot terminate it at will, and the attempt to cut himself off by contract, instead of by the imposition of duties, from ending it, certainly is not enough to poison the covenant with the plaintiff. It might be held that the duty of voting incident to the legal title made such a trust an active one in all cases. * * * If the stockholders want to make their power felt, they must unite. There is no reason why a majority should not agree to keep together."

It is impossible to read the argument of counsel and the cases and text-writers cited without perceiving that the force of the attack upon such agreements as that under consideration rests upon the proposition that the trustees are clothed only with the naked or dry trust, wholly separated, or "divorced," as it is sometimes described, from the beneficial interest in the stock. If the analysis of the elements of property in the ownership of a share of stock, given by Cook on Corporations (8th Ed.) § 312, be sound—and we think it cannot be controverted—then the right to vote the stock is, in itself, and of itself, a valuable right of property, and such a trust becomes by virtue of that right an active and not a passive or dry trust. If this view be correct, it of course answers the other branch of the proposition, and there would be no separation—certainly no complete separation—or "divorce," such as is contended for, of the ownership of the stock from the beneficial interest in it.

Passing from definitions, as given by writers upon the law of corporations, and considering it as a practical subject, does not common experience prove that the power to manage and control property is a valuable right; that the right to manage and control a great corporation, to direct its policies, involving in many cases the rightful levy and expenditure of vast sums of money, is in itself and of itself a right of great value? Is it not a matter of common knowledge that the common stock of many corporations which have never paid a dividend has a considerable market value, growing out of and dependent upon the right to vote the common stock, which is the power of control? It may be that the expression used by Mr. Justice Holmes, of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in Brightman v. Bates, supra, was in the particular case an obiter dictum, but his observation is none the less true that it might with propriety be held "that the duty of voting incident to the legal title makes such a trust an active one in all cases." So Mr. Justice Swayne, in Warren v. Plin, 66 N. J. Eq. 353, 59 Atl. 773, delivering one of the many opinions in that case, says: "The right to vote is, I think, a property right and is a valuable one, and I see no reason why the owner of such a right, having the legal title to the stock, has not also a beneficial interest in the stock itself. I think the owner of stock, even though his only beneficial interest is the right to vote thereon, must be held to have a beneficial interest in the stock itself."

Let it be remembered that in this case the trustees were the absolute owners of the stock, and that when they sold the trust certificates they agreed to sell, and the purchasers of those certificates only bought, the right to receive payments equal to the dividends upon the shares of stock, less the expense, if any, incurred by the trustees, and on the 1st of February, 1932, to call for certificates for full-paid shares of stock at their par value, and that in the meantime the right to vote remained in the trustees, in order to promote and to protect the value of the stock and to secure the satisfactory management of the Security Company.

As we have said, there is no case in this state upon the subject, and upon an examination of the authorities elsewhere we are unable to say that the contract under consideration should be held violative of the public policy of this commonwealth.

This brings us to a consideration of the only statute which has any bearing upon the subject.

Clause 20 of section 1105e, Va. Code 1904, is as follows: "Unless it shall have been otherwise provided in the charter, certificate of incorporation, or in the articles of association, or in an amendment or by-law, each person in whose name stock shall stand upon the books of any corporation at any date fixed by the by-laws as prescribed by section eighteen of this chapter shall be entitled to one vote in person or by proxy for each share of stock appearing in his name on said books."

Clause 21: "The right of any person holding stock in a representative or in a fiduciary capacity, to represent such stock at meetings of any corporation, and to vote thereon, shall be as provided by any agreement heretofore or hereafter made between such person and the beneficial owner concerning such stock, or the right to vote thereon; provided, such agreement or a copy thereof shall have been furnished to the corporation."

Clause 22: "As between the pledgor and the pledgee of capital stock pledged to secure a specific loan with a fixed period or periods of maturity, the right to vote shall be determined as follows: (a) By the written agreement of the pledgor and pledgee. (b) In all other instances the pledgor shall be held to be the owner and entitled to the right to vote."

Clause 23: "Shares of stock of a corporation belonging to it shall not be voted, directly or indirectly."

A consideration of these clauses discloses: (1) That the Legislature had under advisement the right of a holder of stock to vote, which is secured to each person in whose name stock stands upon the books of any corporation "at any date fixed by the by-laws as prescribed by section eighteen of this chapter"; (2) the right of any person holding stock in a representative or fiduciary capacity to represent such stock at meetings of any corporation, and to vote thereon, which it provides "shall be as provided by any agreement heretofore or hereafter made between such person and the beneficial owner concerning such stock, or the right to vote thereon," as to which the only limitation imposed is that "such agreement or a copy thereof shall have been furnished to the corporation"; and (3) the right to vote, as between the pledgor and the pledgee of capital stock pledged to secure a specific loan with a fixed period or periods of maturity, which it is provided shall be determined (a) by the written agreement of the pledgor and pledgee, and (b) in all other instances the pledgor shall be held to be the owner and entitled to the right to vote.

The Legislature must have known that it was dealing with a subject of the utmost importance, and one as to which there was great controversy and contrariety of opinion. It certainly cannot be said that the statutes to which we have referred contain any inhibition upon, or condemnation of, the separation of the ownership of stock from the right to vote upon it. We repeat, that this was the crux of the controversy. It is the point around which the whole contest had been waged before many courts; that it was in and of itself a violation of sound public policy to put the ownership of stock in the hands of one person and the right to vote upon that stock under the control of another; and yet the Legislature of this state, which it is impossible to consider ignorant of such a question, deals with the subject, regulates the right to vote upon stock under many varying aspects and conditions of ownership and representation, without a hint or suggestion that a voting trust is in violation of public policy, when, if it had been of that opinion, a line upon the subject would have put the whole controversy at rest. So far from condemning a voting trust, it may well be argued that clause 21 in fact approves them, at least in so far as it recognizes as lawful that which constitutes the principal ground upon which such trusts have been elsewhere disapproved, for it declares that the right of a person holding stock in a fiduciary capacity to represent such stock at the meetings of any corporation and to vote thereon shall be as provided by any agreement heretofore or hereafter made between such person and the beneficial owner concerning such stock, or the right to vote thereon; the only condition being that such an agreement or copy thereof shall have been furnished to the corporation.

As we have already said, the record in this case does not disclose any element of oppression, immorality, fraud, or bad faith as the actuating motive underlying the "February agreement." There is no averment or proof of a purpose to do any act beyond the limits of the corporate authority of the Security Company, "or to secure an illegitimate or improper advantage to the detriment of the interests of the corporation and of the other stockholders." As was said in Brightman v. Bates, supra, the question before us is not whether or not it would be possible to carry out the contract in a way which would have made the contract bad if specified in it, but whether it was impossible to carry out the contract in a way which might lawfully have been specified in advance. If in the future the trustees are guilty of a breach of trust, or do any unlawful act to the prejudice of the interests of the corporation or its stockholders, a court of equity is always open to give such relief as the nature of the case may require.

The decree of the chancery court must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

GRANT et al. v. DERRICK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 22, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The suit was for specific performance of an alleged contract for the sale of land. The evidence introduced was insufficient to show the existence of a written contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 44*) — PAROL CONTRACT—PARTIAL EXECUTION.

There was evidence to show a parol contract for the sale of the land; but it was not of such character as to bring the plaintiff's case, which was for affirmative equitable relief, within the rule expressed in Civ. Code 1895, § 4037, and to entitle him to a decree for specific performance.

ATKINSON, J. 1. J. H. Derrick instituted suit against James R. Grant to compel specific performance of an alleged contract for the sale of land. It was not alleged in the petition whether the contract was in writing or rested in parol, but on the trial it appeared that there were only two writings relating to the alleged sale. One of them consisted of a memorandum written out by hand, which recited that on the 21st day of September, 1906, the defendant had bargained to sell to the plaintiff the land in dispute, and that the plaintiff was allowed to retain out of the purchase price the sum of $125 to be applied in discharge of a mortgage on the land. It also recited that the plaintiff was bound so as to apply the $125 and to surrender any surplus therefrom (if it was more than sufficient to pay off the mortgage) to the defendant, and that "a lien is created on said land and said property for the said $125, and I hereby waive and renounce all homestead and exemptions for myself and family." The memorandum was signed by the plaintiff, but it did not state the amount of the purchase price. The other consisted of a typewritten sheet dated September 27, 1906, which recited that the plaintiff had bought the land in dispute for the sum of $450, and also that: "Whereas, W. J. Ramey holds a mortgage on said property for $85 principal, which said mortgage has been sued and a plea filed by said Grant disputing the amount claimed to be due thereon, and the litigation thereon is still pending, and I am desirous of protecting myself: Now, therefore, I have retained the sum of $115 out of the purchase money of said land for the purpose of protecting myself against any judgment the said Ramey may obtain against said property, and after the termination of said lawsuit I am to pay off any judgment that Ramey may obtain, and am to pay to McMillan & Erwin, Clarkesville, Ga., for said grant, the balance due on the purchase of said land, together with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum on the amount so retained." This writing was also signed by the plaintiff. Neither of the memoranda was signed by the defendant. The defendant admitted in his answer that the memorandum first above mentioned was written by him; but it was also alleged that no agreement was made between the parties, and that the plaintiff refused to sign and deliver the writing. It was alleged in the answer that, after the plaintiff refused to execute and deliver the paper first mentioned, the defendant, by his counsel, prepared "another paper or agreement for $115, delivered same to said plaintiff to sign, and said plaintiff refused to sign and deliver same to defendant." The parol evidence showed that the second memorandum was prepared by defendant's counsel; but neither the plea of defendant, nor any written memorandum made by him, nor any admission which he made on the trial, showed that this was the paper referred to by the defendant in his answer. These writings, unsigned by the defendant, the person sought to be charged, were sufficient to constitute a written contract obligating him to sell the land.

2. There was evidence of a parol contract for the sale of the land, also evidence of partial payment of the purchase price; but there was no evidence that the plaintiff had taken possession, or had made valuable improvements, or had made full payment of the purchase price, accepted by the vendor. The admissions and allegations made in the defendant's plea relative to the two written memoranda which were introduced, either separately or when considered in connection with the plea as a whole, did not amount to an admission of the contract sued on. The plea alleged that there had been negotiations between the parties, but expressly denied that they had reached an agreement for the sale of the land. The plaintiff did not execute the contract further than as indicated above. Under the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 4037, specific performance of a parol contract for the sale of land will be decreed only in two instances. One is where the defendant admits the contract. The other is where it is so far executed by the party seeking relief that if the contract be abandoned he cannot be restored to his former position. Full payment alone, accepted by the vendor, or partial payment accompanied with possession, or possession alone with valuable improvements, if clearly proved in each case to be done with reference to the parol contract, will be sufficient part performance to justify a decree. The plaintiff is seeking affirmative equitable relief, namely, specific performance of a parol contract for the sale of land. It is incumbent upon him to bring his case within the statute. This he has failed to do, and he is not entitled to recover. The judgment of the trial court on demurrer did not conclude the defendant upon the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to require specific performance. On demurrer the contract was presumed to be in writing, as the law required it to be. Crovatt v. Baker, 130 Ga. 507, 61 S. E. 127. But on the trial the evidence showed affirmatively that it was not in writing. As the evidence was not sufficient to authorize a decree for specific performance, it is unnecessary to deal with the assignments of error based upon exceptions to the charge of the court.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

BERRY v. VAN HISE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 18, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 20*)—APPLICATION FOR LETTERS—RIGHT OF CAVEATOR TO OBJECT—TIME TO QUESTION.

In an application for letters of administration, where the caveator alleges certain facts as giving her a right to object to the grant of administration, if the applicant desires to challenge the caveator's right to object, he must do so by timely motion or other appropriate pleading. The applicant cannot litigate with his adversary in the trial court, and complain for the first time in this court that the caveator has no such interest as will entitle her to object to the grant of letters of administration.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 11*)—APPOINTMENT—ESTATE OF NONRESIDENT.

Letters of administration on the estate of a person, who at the time of his death was a non-resident of the state, will not be granted unless it is made to appear that such decedent has property in the county where the application is made, or has a bona fide cause of action against some person therein.

Error from Superior Court, Habersham County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Application by W. H. Van Hise for letters of administration on the estate of T. J. Barnard, to which Mrs. C. L. Berry filed a caveat. From a judgment for applicant, caveator brings error. Reversed.

J. C. Edwards, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Sutton and Robt. McMillan, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. On September 27, 1902, Mrs. O. L. Berry sold and conveyed to T. J. Barnard a tract of land for $3,000. On the same day Barnard executed to Mrs. Berry a mortgage to secure the purchase money, which was represented by nine notes for $300 each and two notes for $150. The sale of the land was consummated through the agency of J. H. Hicks, and in payment of his commissions Mrs. Berry delivered to him one of the $150 notes with the following indorsement: "Pay the within note to the order of J. H. Hicks, without recourse upon me. Mrs. C. L. Berry." Hicks afterwards indorsed the note to Van Hise for value and before maturity. On September 3, 1904, T. J. Barnard reconveyed the land to Mrs. Berry by deed expressing a consideration of $3,000. Mrs. Berry addressed the following note to the clerk of the superior court, which was attached to the mortgage: "Clarksville, Ga., Oct. 10, 1904. Mr. J. A. Erwin—Dear Sir: Please cancel mortgage from T. J. Barnard to myself, recorded in Book 8, folio 228, and oblige. Respect, Mrs. O. L. Berry." The words of this writing were entered upon the record book of the mortgage, and across the face of the original mortgage was entered: "Cancelled, October 10th, 1904." Van Hise brought suit against Mrs. Berry and Barnard, the character of which does not appear in the record. Pending the suit Barnard died, and Van Hise applied to the ordinary of Habersham county for letters of administration on his estate. In his application he represented that he was a creditor of Barnard, who at the time of his death was a nonresident of the state, but that he left real and personal property in the county of Habersham. Mrs. Berry filed a caveat to the grant of letters of administration, alleging therein that the applicant had filed a suit in the superior court of Habersham county, Ga., in which suit he was seeking to subject caveator's land for the payment of a certain note made by T. J. Barnard; that caveator denied liability on the note, or that her land was subject to pay it, but that, if the issue should be found against her, she was entitled to reimbursement from the estate of Barnard, and therefore was interested in the choice of an administrator on his estate; that at the time of Barnard's death he did not reside in the state of Georgia, neither did he have any property, real or personal, within the county of Habersham or state of Georgia at the date of his death; that the sole object of the application is to have an administrator appointed for the purpose of making parties to a case in the superior court of Habersham county, in which case caveator is defendant; that Barnard was a resident of Jackson county, Mo., at the time of his death, and that the probate court of that county and state has jurisdiction of the granting of letters of administration. The case was appealed from the court of ordinary to the superior court, and on the trial the foregoing facts appeared from the evidence submitted. At the conclusion of the evidence on both sides the court directed a verdict in favor of the applicant for administration. A motion for new trial was made by Mrs. Berry, which being refused, she brings error.

In his brief counsel for defendant in error insists that Mrs. Berry had no such interest in the estate of Barnard as would entitle her to caveat an application for administration on his estate. There is nothing in the record before us to indicate that such point was either made or adjudicated in the trial court. She made certain allegations in her caveat, intended to show such interest in the estate of Barnard as would give her the right to caveat the application for administration. If the applicant desired to challenge her right to litigate over his appointment, he should by proper motion or other pleading have done so. After a trial in which both sides introduced evidence, which eventuated in a verdict, it is too late to raise for the first time the point in this court, and that, too, only in the argument. Before the ordinary can grant administration upon the estate of a person who was not a resident of the state at the time of his death, it must appear that such decedent has property in the county where the application is made, or a bona fide cause of action against some person therein. Civ. Code, § 4234; Neal v. Boykin, 129 Ga. 676, 59 S. E. 912, 121 Am. St. Rep. 237. The decedent had neither tangible property nor a bona fide cause of action against any person residing in Habersham county. It is immaterial for the purposes of this case whether, under the facts stated above, Mrs. Berry had a right to cancel the mortgage which Barnard had given to secure the purchase-money notes of the land, one of which was held by the applicant, Van Hise. Certainly no impediment existed to prevent Barnard from reconveying the land to Mrs. Berry in settlement of her debt, or upon any other valid consideration. By his conveyance he divested himself of all title to the property. We are not apprised of the character of the litigation in which Van Hise seeks to hold Mrs. Berry responsible on the note which she had indorsed without recourse. From the brief reference to it we gather that the whole object of obtaining letters of administration was to provide a way, not for asserting or establishing a right in favor of the decedent's administrator, but of asserting and establishing a right against that representative. The purpose of appointing administrators is to administer estates; and if the nonresident decedent has neither property nor a cause of action in the jurisdiction of the court, it follows that the court has no power to appoint an administrator. Patillo v. Barksdale, 22 Ga. 356. The court erred in directing a verdict for the applicant.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Arbitration proceedings between W. F. Train and others and C. A. Emerson. A motion to enter a judgment nunc pro tunc was denied, and W. F. Train and others bring error. Affirmed.

O'Byrne, Hartridge & Wright, for plaintiffs in error. Cann, Barrow & McIntire, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. On July 24, 1906, an agreement was made to submit a controversy to arbitrators under the statutory provision contained in the Code. On May 28, 1907, two arbitrators and an umpire (called also an arbitrator, though chosen by the other arbitrators) qualified. On the same day they made an award. This was not filed in the superior court until April 25, 1908. On June 24, 1909, the parties in whose favor the award was made filed a written motion to have it "now received, and that an order be passed authorizing the entry of a judgment nunc pro tunc." The other party to the award objected to the grant of the motion, on the grounds, among others, that the award was not returned to the superior court within the time prescribed by law, that the movants were guilty of laches in failing to move sooner, and that to permit a judgment to be now entered would be inequitable and work a hardship on the defendant. The presiding judge denied the motion to enter a judgment nunc pro tunc upon the award, and the movants excepted.

This was a statutory arbitration under Civ. Code 1895, § 4486 et seq. No litigation was pending. The question is whether the arbitrators were required to return the award to the next term of the superior court of the proper county. Section 4503. The provisions of the Code on the subject of such statutory awards are derived from the act of 1856 (Acts 1855-56, p. 222), amended by the act of 1876 (Acts 1876, p. 38). The former act provided that "after said arbitrators have made up their award they shall furnish a copy of the same to each of the parties, and shall return the original award to the next superior court of the county where the award is made," etc. This provision was codified in section 4242 of the Code of 1873. The act of 1876 stated in its title that it was "An act to define in what court awards provided to be entered on the minutes of the superior court under section 4242 of the Code of 1873 shall be entered." It declared that, "whenever a case of any kind, pending in any court in this state, shall be referred to arbitration, the award made upon the same shall be entered on the minutes of the superior court where suit is pending; and in all cases where a matter of dispute not involved in litigation is referred to arbitration under section 4225 of the Code of 1873, the award upon the same shall be entered on the minutes of the superior court of the counties where the parties reside against whom the award is rendered if residents of the state, and if not such resident, in the counties where the award was made." It will be observed that the only purpose of this act was to provide in what court awards should be entered. It changed the provision for returning the award to the superior court of the county where it was made, and made another provision as to the court of the return; but it did not deal with the time when the return should be made to the proper court. King v. Davidson, 69 Ga. 708, 712. Under the act of 1856, the necessity for making the return to the next term of the superior court after the award was made was recognized in Green v. Shields, 37 Ga. 35; but it was held that, when an award was made the judgment of the court at an adjourned term after notice given to the defendant between the regular and the adjourned term, such notice was sufficient. In Chisolm v. Cothran, 40 Ga. 274 (decided in 1869), it was held that an award might be returned at the next superior court after it was made, whether such term was a regular or an adjourned term. In Marshall v. Hicks, 61 Ga. 73, the duty of making the return to the next superior court was again recognized; and the decision in Tompkins v. Phipps, 68 Ga. 157 (decided after the passage of the act of 1876, though not dealing with it), quotes from the opinion in the Marshall Case.

When the Code of 1882 was compiled, the provisions of the act of 1876 were embodied in section 4242a. Nothing was said in the section so made as to the time of the return. It is contended that the omission of a direct statement that the return should be made to the next term of the court operated as a repeal of that requirement. The Code of 1882 was not formally adopted by the Legislature; but that of 1895, which contains the same provision (section 4503) was adopted. Provisions in conflict with such section and not contained in the Code would give way to it; but the question remains whether the requirement of a prompt return of an award is in conflict with the section last cited. From what has been said above, it will be seen that it was not the intention of the Legislature by the act of 1876 to deal with the time of making the return, but only with the court to which it should be made, and section 4503 of the Code of 1895 does no more than this. Either there is some requirement as to when a return of an award should be made, or there is none. If it was the intention of the codifiers and of the Legislature, by the section to which reference has been made, to remove all restrictions or requirements as to the time of making the return, then it might be made at any indefinite time after the award was agreed upon. If this was the legislative purpose, how could parties know when they would have to file exceptions? Section 4504 has as its subtitle the words "Frauds may be Suggested at the Return Term." These titular words would not operate to change positive law; but they throw some light upon the view entertained by the codifiers that the preceding section, which has as its subtitle the words "Award, Where Returned," did not destroy all requirements as to the time when the return should be made. Section 4504 declares that, when the award shall have been returned and entered on the minutes of the court, "either of the parties may suggest, on oath, at the term to which said award is returned, that the award was the result of accident, or mistake," etc. Here was a requirement that the objections to the award should be filed on oath at the term to which it was returned. But if there were no term to which it was returnable, the arbitrators might hold it in their possession for years, and the parties might be required to watch the records throughout each term of the court, lest at some time when they were off their guard the award might be filed and become conclusive by a failure on their part to file objections during the term.

There is no reason to believe that either the codifiers or the Legislature contemplated that any such result should arise from the act of 1876 and its codification, although it did not in express terms require the return to be made to the next term. An examination of the various sections of the Code on the subject of statutory awards will show that the Legislature contemplated promptness throughout, and did not anticipate that any indefinite delay should be made. In section 4489 it is declared that the arbitrators shall appoint a time and place of meeting, "which shall be as soon as practicable, consistent with a proper preparation of the case." Section 4493, in authorizing postponements by the arbitrators, states that "the arbitrators may postpone the hearing of the case to a future day, which day shall be as early as may be consistent with the ends of justice." Section 4504, after providing for objections to the award at the term when it is returned, also declares that, if they are made, the court shall cause an issue to be made up and tried, "which trial shall be had at the same term of the court at which the suggestion is made, unless good cause be shown for a continuance, when the same may be continued for one term only, except for providential causes." Thus the entire legislative scheme of statutory awards which shall become judgments binding upon the parties and enforceable by execution contemplates promptness, not delay. It would be extraordinary if they should intend that everything should be promptly done except the return of the award, and that by the adoption of a section of the Code dealing with the court to which the return should be made they intended to repeal all requirements as to promptness in regard to its making. In McMillan v. Allen, 98 Ga. 405, 408, 25 S. E. 505, 507, Atkinson, J., said that the object designed to be accomplished by the Code in requiring that copies of awards should be furnished to each of the parties by the arbitrators was "to enable the parties, if for any reason dissatisfied with the award, to move promptly in the matter of attacking it and causing it to be set aside." But it is evident that such a purpose would avail little if the parties should be furnished with copies of the award, but the original should not be required to be returned into court promptly, so that they could promptly attack it. In Savannah, etc., Ry. Co. v. Decker & Fawcett, 94 Ga. 149, 21 S. E. 372, there was no question as to the time when the return should be made; but, having been made apparently in due time, it was held that a judgment nunc pro tunc might be entered at a term subsequent to the filing.

No question here arises as to what would be the rights or remedies of a party, if arbitrators should delay in returning the award, but such party should act promptly in seeking to require them to make the return. Nor is the question of the validity of a common-law award involved. Here there was a lapse of 11 months from the date of the award to its filing in the clerk's office (during which interval there were three terms of court), followed by an interval of 14 months before any motion was made in regard to it. The presiding judge did not err in declining to grant the motion made.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

ALACULSY LUMBER CO. v. GUDGER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 17, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TAXATION (§ 351*)—COLLECTION OF TAXES—EXECUTION AGAINST WILD OR UNIMPROVED LANDS.

"The power of tax collectors of this state to issue executions against wild and unimproved lands, because of the nonpayment of taxes due thereon by the owner, is dependent upon a non-return of such lands for taxes by the latter; and it is therefore essential to the exercise of this power, and to the validity of the title of a purchaser of such land, acquired at a sale under and by virtue of an execution so issued, that it appear from the recitals in the execution, not only that the land against which the same was issued was wild and unimproved, but that it was likewise not returned for taxes by the owner."

(a) A paper, purporting to be a tax execution, issued by the tax collector against a specified lot of land, is fatally defective because of its omission to recite that the land was wild, or that it had not been returned for taxes, or set forth any facts authorizing the issuance of a tax execution against the property in rem.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1319; Dec. Dig. § 651.*]

2. TRESPASS (§ 44*)—TO LAND—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action of trespass to land, the burden is on the plaintiff to show either title to or possession of the land at the time of the alleged trespass.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass, Cent. Dig. § 112; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

3. TRESPASS (§ 19*)—QUARE CLAUSUM FREGIT—TITLE TO SUPPORT ACTION—ESTOPPEL.

Estoppels in pais operate only upon existing rights. A plaintiff in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit must recover on proof of his title or possession at the time of the alleged trespass, and his defective title at that time will not be aided by the defendant's subsequent purchase of the land from one who may be estopped from denying the plaintiff's title, although the defendant may have notice of facts constituting the estoppel at the time of his purchase.

Error from Superior Court, Murray County; A. W. Flite, Judge.

Action by R. M. Gudger and another against the Alaculsy Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff Gudger, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. O. Martin and C. N. King, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Mann, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. R. M. Gudger and John Hampton brought an action in trespass against the Alaculsy Lumber Company to recover damages occasioned by the cutting and removal of certain timber and tanbark from a lot of land alleged to be the property of the plaintiffs. Hampton was stricken from the case, and the defendant in its answer denied that the plaintiff had title. The title relied upon by the plaintiff was a deed from A. T. Logan, sheriff, to R. M. Gudger, dated December 2, 1884, conveying lot of land No. 290 in the twenty-seventh district and second section of Murray county, under and by virtue of the following fi. fa.: "Georgia, Murray County. By W. R. Loughbridge, Tax Collector of Said County. To All and Singular Constables of Said County—Greeting: You are hereby commanded that of lot of land 290, 27th district and second section, you cause to be made the sum of thirty cents, the amount of tax due the state of Georgia and county for the year 1883 by reason of the nonpayment thereof as aforesaid, as appears to me from the tax returns, and the sum of fifty cents, the costs and charges incurred by the said delinquent in consequence of the nonpayment of the taxes as aforesaid. Fall not. This the first day of September, 1884. W. R. Loughbridge, Tax Collector."

The fi. fa. and deed were objected to when offered in evidence, upon the ground that the fi. fa. was not issued in the terms of the statute, in that it contained no recital that the land was unreturned for taxes, that it was wild land and unimproved, and that the owner was unknown. The court charged the jury that under the record evidence the plaintiff was entitled to recover the actual value of the tanbark and timber which the defendants had cut and carried away from the lot of land in dispute. The court was requested to charge "that, unless the plaintiffs show actual possession of the land in dispute—that is to say, possessio pedis—or actual legal title, then you should not find any amount of damages against the defendant." This request was refused. At the trial the plaintiff prevailed; and in the motion for new trial the defendant complains of the admission in evidence of the tax deed, the instruction of the court, and the refusal to give its written request in charge. A new trial was refused, and the defendant excepts.

1. The land upon which the trespass was alleged to have been committed was wild or unimproved land. It was such at the time of the alleged sale under the tax fi. fa. This tax fi. fa. was not issued in terms of the statute, in that the execution did not show upon its face that the land against which the same was issued was wild or unimproved land and had not been returned for taxes by the owner. A tax fi. fa., issuing in rem and omitting such recitals, is fatally defective, and a sale of land thereunder is void. Leonard v. Pilkinton, 99 Ga. 739, 27 S. E. 753; Southern Pine Company v. Kirkland, 112 Ga. 216, 37 S. E. 362; Pol. Code 1895, §§ 821, 908. It was therefore erroneous to admit in evidence the fi. fa. and deed upon which the plaintiff relied as showing title to the land upon which the trespass was alleged to have been committed.

2. So far as the evidence discloses, the plaintiff was never in actual possession of any part of the land. In order to maintain an action of trespass to land, it is essential for the plaintiff to show title in himself or possession. The requested charge should have been given. Ault v. Meager, 112 Ga. 148, 37 S. E. 185.

3. The only record title introduced in evidence by the plaintiff was a tax deed from A. T. Logan, sheriff, to himself, dated December 2, 1884. The plaintiff testified that he had returned the land continuously for taxation since his purchase at sheriff's sale, and that the agents of the defendant, just before committing the trespass, made an effort to buy from him the timber upon the land in controversy, and that he refused to sell. The value of the timber and tanbark cut and removed by the defendant was shown. The defendant offered in evidence a deed from W. G. Harris, sheriff, to A. T. Logan, dated July 2, 1878, a deed from S. M. Logan, administratrix of A. T. Logan, to defendant, dated July 20, 1907, and the tax returns of A. T. Logan for the years 1883 and 1884, showing that he returned the land for taxation during those years. It further appeared that all of the alleged trespasses by the defendant were committed prior to obtaining its deed from Mrs. Logan, administratrix of A. T. Logan. The defendant moved for the direction of a verdict, which the court refused. In his charge the court instructed the jury that under the record evidence the plaintiff was entitled to recover the actual value of the tanbark and timber which the defendant had cut and carried away from the premises, and limited the investigation of the jury to the amount of the damages. The title upon which the plaintiff based his right to recover was the tax deed from A. T. Logan, sheriff, to himself. As already pointed out, this deed conveyed no title, for the reason that the tax execution upon which it was based was invalid. If the plaintiff could recover at all, it would be because the defendant is estopped from denying his title. It may be conceded that if at the time of the alleged trespass the defendant was claiming title under A. T. Logan, and at the time of acquiring title it had notice that the land which was sold by Logan, sheriff, was his own land, an estoppel would arise against it from asserting Logan's individual title. But it appears that at the time the defendant cut the timber and tanbark from the land it had not purchased the land from the administratrix of A. T. Logan, and was not claiming under that title. Estoppels only operate against parties and their privies. They do not bind strangers. Harris v. Amoskeag Lumber Co., 101 Ga. 643, 29 S. E. 302. When the defendant cut and removed the timber it was a stranger to the Logan title, and therefore was not estopped from attacking the plaintiff's title. Estoppels in pais operate only upon existing rights, not upon rights subsequently acquired. Rorer on Judicial Sales, § 473. Although A. T. Logan's administratrix might be estopped, under the facts developed in this case, from denying the title of the plaintiff, such estoppel could not affect the defendant, and render it liable for acts which were done when it had no connection whatever with the Logan title. The court, therefore, erred in his instruction that under the record evidence the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

HAGINS v. SOUTHERN BELL TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 22, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 155, 185*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—OBVIOUS DANGER—WARNING—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT.

When a servant is engaged with others in pulling down by means of a rope attached there to a tree being felled in an open space, the danger of his being injured by the fall thereof is an obvious one, and known, or should be known, to the servant, and in the absence of an express contract on the part of the master to give warning when the tree begins to fall, and in what direction it will fall, there is no duty on him to do so.

(a) The failure of foremen in charge of the details of such work (who at the time of the injury, because of the absence of other employes, are engaged with the servant who is injured in pulling on a rope to guide the direction of the fall of the tree) to warn the servant when it begins to fall, and in what direction it will fall, or to station themselves or others elsewhere to give such warning, cannot be charged against the master as negligence, entitling the servant to recover damages for injuries received by reason of the tree falling on him. There being no nondelegable duty resting on the master to thus warn the servant, the negligence of the foremen, if any, is that of a fellow servant.

(b) The court committed no error in dismissing the petition upon the general demurrer filed thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 310, 385-421; Dec. Dig. §§ 155, 185.*]

Error from Superior Court, Effingham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by Angus Hagins against the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Gignilliat & Heidt and Travis & Travis, for plaintiff in error. Osborne & Lawrence, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The gist of the plaintiff's allegations may be stated as follows: With other servants of the master he was engaged in pulling down by means of a rope a tree which was being felled. The tree was to be so pulled as to fall within a space of about 80 feet between the wires of the defendant company on the one side and a railroad track on the other. The work was under the charge and direction of one who was a general foreman over several gangs, and another employé who was immediate foreman over the gang in which the plaintiff worked. Usually six men pulled the rope, but at the time of the injury for which suit is brought only four had hold thereof; two of them being the foremen above referred to. The tree, in falling, struck and injured the plaintiff. He claims the company is liable to him in damages because it was negligent in not warning him when it began to fall, and in which direction it was falling, which he alleges it was the duty of the foremen in charge of the work to do, and that their failure to do so was the sole cause of his injury; he being free from fault. He alleges that the immediate foreman was the alter ego of the company, and that he had a right to rely and did rely on receiving warning from him, or the other foreman, or the master, or some one by them provided for that purpose, when the tree began to fall, and in what direction it was falling, in time for him to escape injury, for which reason, and the fact that he was engaged in pulling on the rope, he did not discover that the tree was falling until it was halfway down. The allegations above stated are amplified, but it is unnecessary to state them more in detail, as the plaintiff's right to recover depends upon whether the facts above set forth give him a cause of action.

A servant assumes the ordinary risks of his employment, whether or not such employment be of a dangerous character. One who is pulling on a rope fastened to a tree being felled in an open space, for the purpose of pulling the tree down and so guiding it that it may fall in some general direction, incurs an obvious danger of the tree falling on him, and he either knows of such danger, or is chargeable with knowledge thereof. Under such circumstances there is no hidden danger, but one which is as obvious to the servant as to the master. Such danger is an incident to the very work in which the servant is engaging, and does not come from an independent agency. A case of this character differs from that class of cases in which the danger arises from sources disconnected with the details of the work upon which the servant at the time is employed, as, for instance, where an employé is working in a mine, and the danger is occasioned by the firing of a blast by other fellow servants at irregular intervals in other parts of the mine.

Among the nonassignable duties of the master are those of furnishing the servant a reasonably safe place in which to work, and to give the servant warning of dangers incident to the employment unknown to the servant, of which the master knows or ought to know. When a tree being felled in an open space is guided in the direction in which it falls by a rope upon which the servant is pulling, there is no duty imposed upon the master to warn the servant when the tree begins to fall, and in what direction it is falling, in order that the servant may escape being injured by its fall. In this connection, see Anderson v. Columbia Improvement Co., 41 Wash. 83, 82 Pac. 1037, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 840, and authorities cited in note; Melton v. Jackson Lumber Co., 133 Ala. 580, 31 South. 848; Allen v. Augusta Factory, 82 Ga. 76, 8 S. E. 68; Holland v. Durham Coal & Coke Co., 131 Ga. 715, 63 S. E. 290.

The petition alleges that it was the duty of the foreman in immediate charge of those engaged in the work of felling the tree to warn the latter when the tree began to fall, and in what direction it was falling. As there was no duty on the master to give such warning, the failure of the foremen to thus warn the servants, if any such duty rested on them, is not chargeable to the master, being an act of negligence by a fellow servant, for which the master is not responsible. Moore v. Dublin Cotton Mills, 127 Ga. 609, 56

S. E. 839, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 772; Dennis v. Schofield Sons' Co., 1 Ga. App. 489, 57 S. E. 925.

The court committed no error in dismissing the petition upon general demurrer thereto. Judgment affirmed.

MENDEL v. L. F. MILLER & SONS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 18, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 152*)—PLEADING—NECESSITY.

If a contract is of a character which, under the statute of frauds, is required to be in writing, and it does not meet the requirement of the statute in that regard, and suit is brought upon it, if the defendant in his answer admits the contract, without insisting on the statute of frauds, he will be treated as having renounced the benefit thereof. But if the defendant by his answer admits the agreement, but pleads and insists upon the benefit of the statute, he will be entitled to it, notwithstanding such admission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 365; Dec. Dig. § 152.*]

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 154*)—PLEADING—AMENDMENT TO PLEAD STATUTE.

Under the liberal right of amendment in this state, and the right to file contradictory pleas, although a defendant may have in his original answer admitted a contract as alleged by the plaintiff, he is not prevented from amending, and setting up the statute of frauds, if applicable to the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 368; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 131*)—OPERATION AND EFFECT—MODIFICATION OF WRITTEN INSTRUMENT.

If the contract for the sale of corn, as originally made, be treated as sufficient to answer the demand of the statute of frauds, but on cross-examination of a witness the defendant showed that there was a parol agreement between the witness and the defendant that sales by the former to the latter should be under the rules of a municipal board of trade, of which the defendant was not a member, and that in the absence of specification of time for shipment of goods prompt shipment was intended, and then showed by a rule of the board of trade that in case of orders for prompt shipment five days were allowed, this did not present such a case of a written contract specifying that shipments should be made in five days as to authorize the invoking against the plaintiff, upon an offer of parol evidence to show a waiver of time, of the rule that where a contract was required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, and was reduced to writing, parol evidence was inadmissible to show a binding executory modification of its terms.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

4. ERRONEOUS CHARGE.

The charge in some particulars did not clearly present the defenses raised by the original answer and the amendment thereto, and the case is accordingly returned for a new trial.

5. EVIDENCE IRRELEVANT.

The letter written by the purchaser to the seller in regard to another transaction was not relevant.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by L. F. Miller & Sons against Jonas Mendel. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Osborne & Lawrence, for plaintiff in error. Oliver & Oliver, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. L. F. Miller & Sons brought suit against Jonas Mendel to recover damages for a breach of contract in refusing to receive a car load of corn purchased by him. They alleged that the corn had been shipped under bill of lading with draft attached, and had been held for some time at the request of Mendel, and on his promise to take up the draft, and that upon his final refusal the corn was sold; and suit was brought for the difference between what it brought and the contract price, together with certain storage charges. The plaintiffs recovered, and the case was brought to this court, after the refusal of a new trial. The judgment was reversed, because some of the instructions of the charge submitted to the jury issues which were not authorized by the evidence. Mendel v. Miller, 126 Ga. 834, 56 S. E. 88, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1184. In the original answer the defendant admitted the purchase of the corn and its shipment as alleged by the plaintiff, but denied that the corn shipped was of the kind or quality ordered. When the case was returned to the trial court, the defendant amended his answer, by pleading that the subject-matter of the action was the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise to the amount of more than $50, and therefore within the statute of frauds (Civ. Code 1895, § 2693, par. 7), and that no contract in writing was made, nor any memorandum thereof signed by the defendant, or by any one lawfully authorized by him, and also that the corn offered to him was not delivered within the time or in the manner ordered. The plaintiffs again recovered a verdict. Defendant moved for a new trial, and, after it was refused, excepted.

On behalf of the plaintiffs in the court below, the defendants in error here, it was contended that, inasmuch as the defendant in the trial court admitted in his original answer the making of the contract alleged by the plaintiffs, he could not afterwards by amendment set up and get the benefit of the statute of frauds. The right to amend pleadings in this state is very broad. Indeed, no exception was taken to the allowance of the amendment in this case. Contradictory defenses may be filed. Civ. Code 1895, § 5065: Wade v. Watson, 129 Ga. 614, 59 S. E. 294. If suit is brought upon a parol contract, which under the statute of frauds should be in writing, and the defendant in his answer admits the contract, without insisting on the statute of frauds, the court will consider that the defendant has renounced the benefit of the statute, and proceed accordingly. But if the defendant by his answer admits the parol agreement, and yet pleads the statute and insists upon the benefit of it, he will be entitled to it, notwithstanding such admission. Hollingshead v. McKenzie, 8 Ga. 457; Douglass v. Bunn, 110 Ga. 165, 35 S. E. 339. This is a different thing from admitting all the facts which create liability, and yet denying the existence of such liability in general terms. When the amendment to the answer was allowed, it stood as if it were originally a part of the pleading. The defendant did not by reason of his original admission, preclude himself from setting up the statute of frauds.

We have experienced some difficulty in dealing with this case, because the trial proceeded, in part at least, on an erroneous basis. While the statute of frauds was pleaded, and certain rulings invoked in regard thereto, it was not contended in this court by counsel for plaintiff in error that the original contract fell within the statute of frauds. It was stated in the brief: "The original contract of sale was admitted. It was therefore without the statute. But this contract provided that the corn should be delivered within the stipulated time. The court permitted plaintiff to introduce parol evidence to show that this time limit had been waived, and instructed the jury that, if they found that the time limit had been waived, the defendant would be liable. * * * We insist upon the proposition that where a contract is by the statute of frauds required to be in writing, and is so made, the parties may not thereafter show a variation or alteration of this contract by parol testimony." The letters introduced in evidence and the statement of the contract in the plaintiff's petition did not set any definite limit to the time for delivery. The letter from Browder, the local broker, to Mendel, which Browder in his evidence called a "sale ticket," stated that "I have to-day sold you to arrive steamer for account of L. F. Miller & Sons, Philadelphia, Pa., one car sacked 2 white corn at 61½c. per bu. delivered." This did not name the date for delivery, and therefore, in the absence of anything else, would mean that the delivery should be in a reasonable time, considering the nature of the transaction. Civ. Code 1895, § 3724. While Browder was on the stand as a witness, on cross-examination, he testified as follows: "There was no time specified for the shipment of that corn. When no time is specified as to shipment, that means prompt shipment. This corn was sold under the rules of the Board of Trade of Savannah. In selling that specified car, I did not tell Mr. Mendel at that time that it was sold under the rules of the Board of Trade; but when Mr. Mendel went into the grain business, I told him I would only sell him grain under the rules of the Board of Trade. He said that he was not a member of the Board of Trade. I said: 'I will sell you grain, but whenever there is a controversy between you and the shipper as to grade, whatever the certificate of the inspector of the Savannah Board of Trade calls for, you must abide by it, or I will not sell it to you.' It was sold under the rules of the Board of Trade. He did not buy it, except under the understanding had with him at that time."

This evidence did not undertake to show any custom of trade so universal as to become a part of the contract. It did not even show a definite agreement on the part of Mendel to be bound by all the rules of the Board of Trade, or to adopt the limitations placed by such board upon the time for delivery. The only thing specified by Browder as having been mentioned to Mendel was that, in case of a controversy as to grade, Mendel should abide by whatever the certificate of the inspector called for. There was no reference in the letters to the rules of the Board of Trade, the defendant did not mention them in his pleadings, and the plaintiff only passingly referred to them by saying that the corn was inspected by the official inspector of the board, and that the defendant paid for the service the inspection fee of 75 cents due under the rules. This evidence practically amounted to tacking on to the writing a parol agreement connecting it with the rule as to time; and a rule of the Board of Trade was introduced to show that, where goods were ordered for prompt shipment, five days were allowed. Thereupon the defendant contended that the written contract, required by the statute of frauds, limited the shipment to five days (or two days, if the shipment was to be "immediate"), and that the plaintiff should not have been allowed to show by parol evidence that, although the car was not shipped within that time, after its arrival Mendel waived that fact, and promised from time to time to take up the draft and receive the corn within a few days.

We do not deem it necessary to enter into a discussion of the rule that where a contract is required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, and is put in writing, executory modifications of it cannot be shown by parol, or the question of whether, by a request for a postponement of delivery and an assent thereto, there may be a waiver of strict performance in the nature of a mere voluntary forbearance, or of an estoppel, rather than an executory contract, or the extent of it. The defendant, not having stood on the written contract claimed to have been made by the "sale ticket" and to have been acknowledged by the letters, but having sought by parol to add other stipulations thereto, now complains that other parol evidence was admitted on the other side. The court also charged to the effect that if a contract was made that a thing should be delivered in a certain number of days, and if it arrived shortly after the expiration of the limited time, and the purchaser did not object to the delay, but asked that the goods be kept for his convenience to a later date, he waived the time limit. This charge appears to deal with the rule of the Board of Trade as being a part of the written contract and fixing definitely the time within which the delivery should be made.

The presiding judge informed the jury that he did not charge them on the subject of the statute of frauds, because he did not consider that it was involved in the case, although the defendant contended that it was so. He added: "I do not consider, under the evidence in this case, we are concerned with the giving of that law in charge to this jury, as the contract seems to come within the exceptions of the statute of frauds, and not under the statute of frauds." We are not clear to which of the exceptions to the statute of frauds the learned presiding judge had reference. The exceptions stated in the Code are, when the contract has been fully executed, where there has been performance on one side, accepted by the other in accordance with the contract, and where there has been such part performance of the contract as would render it a fraud of the party refusing to comply, if the court did not compel a performance. Civ. Code 1895, § 2694. It is quite clear that the contract had not been fully executed, or there would have been no occasion for the present suit. When the case was previously before this court, a reversal was had partly because the presiding judge submitted to the jury the question of delivery, and explained to them the difference between actual and constructive delivery. We do not see that the evidence on the last trial established a delivery of the corn. Even were there evidence in such a case tending to show such a part performance by one party to a contract as would render it a fraud for the other party to refuse to comply, the court should not generally declare this as a matter of law.

If it should be determined that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, but questions arise concerning loss by deterioration of the corn and the diligence of the plaintiffs in protecting it and preventing or reducing damages resulting from keeping or delay, they have been discussed in the former decision of this court. There was no error in admitting evidence on that subject. Nor was the criticism on the charge in regard to due care well taken.

The letter from the defendant to the plaintiffs in regard to another car load of corn, written after the order for this car load and before its arrival, does not appear to have been relevant. It was contended that certain statements therein as to the price of corn and the time for the delivery of that car threw light on the case; but the evidence did not disclose that the market price was the same when that letter was written as when the car load of corn in controversy arrived, or that the contracts made in the two cases were similar. If offered to impeach the defendant's evidence, no foundation appears to have been laid for its introduction.

We think the case should be returned for another trial on the defenses set up in the original answer and the amendment thereto. Aside from the question of the statute of frauds, much of the law of the case was discussed in the former decision of it by this court.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

NASHVILLE, C. & ST. L. RY. v. PEAHLER.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 18, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

There was no error, requiring a reversal, in overruling the demurrer to the petition as amended.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 344*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—COPY OF CITY CODE.

Where city ordinances were codified, and such codification was adopted by an ordinance, and the clerk of the council and keeper of the records copied and certified a section of such codification, and also copied and certified from the record a copy of the adopting ordinance, this was sufficient to authorize the admission in evidence of the copy of the section of the City Code. Metropolitan Street Railway Co. v. Johnson, 90 Ga. 500, 16 S. E. 49; Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Hix, 104 Ga. 11, 30 S. E. 424; 8 Enc. Ev. 825, 826.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1293; Dec. Dig. § 344.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 236*)—REGULATING SPEED OF TRAINS.

A municipal corporation, under what is commonly called the "general welfare" clause of its charter, may by ordinance make reasonable regulations as to the speed of railroad trains within its limits; and this power is not as matter of law confined to regulating the running of such trains in the streets or public squares of the city, or while crossing a street.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 749; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 397*)—DEATH OF PERSON ON TRACK—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—CUSTOM.

Where suit was brought for the homicide of a workman employed in working on the piers of a bridge where one railroad crossed over another, by reason of being run upon, while temporarily standing on the track, during the passing of a train overhead, by a train on the lower road, which was alleged to have been carelessly run at a reckless speed and in violation of a municipal ordinance, there was no error in refusing to permit counsel for defendant to ask a witness introduced by him, "Do you know what the custom is, what the bridge gang does for the protection of approaching trains, when they are working on bridges?"

(a) This is true, although counsel stated that he desired to have the witness state, "if he knows the custom in railroad operations, where a bridge gang is at work on a bridge, what they do or are required to do for the protection of approaching trains."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 397.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Whether or not it was proper, over objection of the defendant, to permit the plaintiff's counsel to ask a witness whether the person injured could have heard a whistle if it had been blown at any time before the engine struck him, if done with a view to showing that no such whistle was blown, because he did not seem to have observed it, it will not cause a reversal that such question was allowed to be asked, where the situation, location, and circumstances were shown, and in answer to the question the witness, a co-employee on the same job with the injured person, and who had been engaged at similar work for the same company for some time, testified that, had the whistle been blown opposite to a certain described post, or between it and the point where the decedent was struck, the witness could have heard it at the place where he was standing, and that he did not hear it. Pride v. State, 133 Ga. 433, 66 S. E. 259; 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1976; Southern Railway Co. v. Bonner, 141 Ala. 517, 37 South. 702.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

6. RAILROADS (§ 397*)—DEATH OF PERSON ON TRACK—ACTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—NEGLIGENCE.

Where the question was whether a train was being run at a negligent or reckless rate of speed, and in violation of a municipal ordinance, at the time when it struck a man, it was not competent for the defendant to show that the speed was no greater than that at which other trains on former occasions had passed that point, as a means of negating the charge of negligence. Central R. R. v. DeBray, 71 Ga. 406 (14).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1344; Dec. Dig. § 397.*]

7. RAILROADS (§ 397*)—DEATH OF PERSON ON TRACK—ACTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—REASONABLENESS OF SPEED ORDINANCE.

Where evidence was introduced by a plaintiff to show that a municipal ordinance prohibited railway trains from running faster than a certain specified speed within the corporate limits, it was not admissible for the defendant to show that some months after the injury the ordinance was changed, so as to exclude certain portions of the city from its operation. The making of such an amendment did not show that the original ordinance was void for unreasonableness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 397.*]

8. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

No exception was taken to the submission to the jury of the question of the reasonableness of the ordinance as applied to the place of the injury, and the charge and refusal to charge on that subject do not require a new trial.

9. RAILROADS (§ 381*)—INJURIES TO PERSON ON TRACK—ORDINARY CARE.

In an action against a railroad company for a personal injury done to a person not an employee of the defendant, where it is claimed that the injured person could have avoided the consequences to himself of the defendant's negligence, if it was negligent, by the use of due care, the measure of care so due is ordinary care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1285-1293; Dec. Dig. § 381.*]

10. NEGLIGENCE (§ 4*)—ORDINARY CARE.

What ordinary care requires a person to do depends on the circumstances surrounding him at the time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

11. GROUNDS FOR NEW TRIAL INSUFFICIENT.

In the light of the evidence and the entire charge of the court, none of the grounds of the motion for a new trial are such as to require a reversal.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Price Edwards, Judge.

Action by M. L. Peavler against the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Tye, Peebles & Jordan and Dean & Dean, for plaintiff in error. Lipscomb, Willingham & Doyal, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. At a certain point within the corporate limits of Rome the Southern Railway crossed over the track of the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway by means of a bridge. Peavler was a member of a bridge gang of the former company, and was at work with others on the piers of the bridge beside the track of the latter railroad. A train of the former company passed over the bridge. It was contended that it was dangerous to remain under it, and the hands stepped out to one side of it; that on account of the high embankments on each side, and of water alongside the track caused by a recent rain, they stood on the track of the other company; and that a train of such company, running at a high and reckless speed and in violation of a municipal ordinance on the subject, and without the exercise of due care on the part of the agents in charge of it, struck Peavler and killed him. His widow sued for the homicide. She recovered a verdict. A new trial was refused, and the defendant excepted.

The general welfare clause of the charter of the city of Rome is expressed in broad and comprehensive language. Acts 1882-83, p. 430. Under such authority, in the exercise of its police power, a municipal corporation may pass a reasonable ordinance regulating the rate of speed at which the cars propelled by steam may be run within the corporate limits. 3 Abbott, Mun. Corp. § 854; McQuillan, Mun. Ord. §§ 473, 474; Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Young, 81 Ga. 397, 417, 7 S. E. 912, 12 Am. St. Rep. 320; Bluedorn v. Missouri Pacific Ry. Co., 108 Mo. 439, 18 S. W. 1103, 32 Am. St. Rep. 615; Prewitt v. Missouri, Kansas & T. Ry. Co., 134 Mo. 615, 36 S. W. 667. The authority to pass such ordinances is not limited to places where a railroad track runs along or across a street, or over ground belonging to the municipality. Generally it has been held that the reasonableness of a municipal ordinance regulating the nied liability under the contract, for the reason that it was obtained by the fraudulent representation of the plaintiff as to the condition of the books, and that was an issue in the case. The effect of this evidence was to afford a possible inference that the defendants would not have offered to pay a sum under a contract obtained from them by fraud, and therefore the illegal testimony operated to their injury.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurred.

FLINT RIVER LUMBER CO. v. SMITH et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 22, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The evidence submitted preliminary to the introduction of the certified copy of the deed was sufficient to authorize the court to find that the original deed was lost.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 444*)—DEEDS—VALIDITY.

The deed executed in 1850 by the president and cashier of the Bank of Milledgeville was, under the charter of the bank (Acts 1835, p. 36), a good conveyance of the land.

(a) The deed to which the above ruling applies was not rendered void because the grantee, taking as an individual, was one of the officers who acted for the bank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1779; Dec. Dig. § 444.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 343*)—CERTIFIED COPY OF RECORD OF DEED—INSTRUMENT NOT ENTITLED TO RECORD.

A deed to land, executed in this state on the 29th of April, 1850, purporting in its caption to be executed in a designated county, and to be attested by a justice of the inferior court of a different county, there being no aliunde evidence to show that it was in fact executed in the county for which the official witness was commissioned, was not entitled to record, and a certified copy thereof from the records of the county in which the land was situated was inadmissible in evidence, over appropriate objection, although sufficient cause was shown for the nonproduction of the original.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1825; Dec. Dig. § 843.*]

4. DEEDS (§ 207*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 854*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—REVIEW—NONSUIT.

On the issue of forgery, where a witness testified that previous to the trial he had compared the original signature of the grantor in a deed attacked as a forgery with other writings of the grantor which were introduced in evidence, and which were proved by the testimony of another witness to be in the writing of the grantor, and that in the opinion of the first witness, from a comparison of the two papers which were before him at the same time, the signature to the original deed attacked as a forgery was the genuine signature of the grantor therein named, it was erroneous, after an accounting for the loss of the original, to refuse to admit in evidence a certified copy thereof, upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to authorize a submission of the issue of forgery to the jury. But, for reasons stated in the opinion, the judgment granting a nonsuit will not be disturbed on account of the error above mentioned.

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by the Flint River Lumber Company against G. O. Smith and others. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The Flint River Lumber Company instituted suit against G. O. Smith and the Smith Lumber Company, a firm composed of J. W. White and J. F. M. Smith, for the recovery of a tract of land, and damages on account of trespasses committed thereon. The plaintiff based its right to recover on an alleged grant from the state and an unbroken chain of title from the state's grantee to itself. On the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence a certified copy of a deed from the bank of Milledgeville to James U. Horn, alleged to be one of the deeds in its chain of title. The material parts of the deed were as follows: "Georgia, Baldwin County. This indenture made the 29th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1850, between the Bank of Milledgeville, located in the city of Milledgeville, in the county and state aforesaid of the one part, and James U. Horn, of the same place, of the other part, witnesseth: That the said Bank of Milledgeville, for and in consideration of the sum of $1,000 in hand paid at and before the sealing and delivery of these presents, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, hath granted, etc., unto the said James U. Horn, his heirs and assigns," the lot of land in dispute and other lands. "To have and to hold the said described lots of land," etc., "to the said James U. Horn, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, in fee simple; and the said Bank of Milledgeville for itself, and assigns the said bargained premises unto the said James U. Horn, his heirs and assigns, will warrant and forever defend the right and title thereof against himself and against the claims of all other persons whatever. In witness whereof, Walter H. Mitchell, president, and James U. Horn, cashier, of the Bank of Milledgeville, on the day and year therein mentioned, signed the name and affixed the seal of said corporation thereto, and delivered the foregoing deed as the act of the Bank of Milledgeville. [Signed] W. H. Mitchell [L. S.] President, James U. Horn [L. S.] Cashier. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of: A. M. Nisbet, James Jackson, J. I. C. W. C." Counsel for the defendants objected to the admission of this deed in evidence, upon the following grounds: "(1) Because the preliminary proof in reference to the loss of the original was not sufficient; (2) because the deed purports to be a deed between the Bank of Milledgeville and James U. Horn, and is not signed by the Bank of Milledgeville, but is only signed by W. H. Mitchell [L. S.] President, James U. Horn [L. S.] Cashier; (3) because there is no corporate seal attached to the deed, and there is no seal or scroll represented to be the seal of the Bank of Milledgeville attached to the deed; (4) because it is a deed of James U. Horn, cashier, to James U. Horn individually, and is a void conveyance as between these parties; (5) because W. H. Mitchell, president, had no authority to convey the property of the bank—that the bank could only convey property through the authority of its directors; (6) because the deed appears to have been executed in Baldwin county before the judge of an inferior court of another county, and was therefore not entitled to be recorded.” Upon the introduction of allunde evidence, the court ruled that the preliminary proof of the loss of the original was sufficient, but excluded the deed on the ground that it was not properly executed, and that no corporate seal of the bank was attached to it so as to authorize the presumption that it was executed by authority of the bank. The plaintiff excepted and assigned error on the ruling. After the exclusion of the deed from evidence, the plaintiff's counsel announced to the court that under the court's ruling it would be impossible for the plaintiff to make out its case, but with the court's permission, and in order that all questions relating to the plaintiff's title might be decided by the Supreme Court, it would proceed with its evidence only in so far as it related to its chain of title. Defendant's counsel interposed no objection to this, and the court remarked that in his opinion this would be the proper way in which to proceed with the case in order that all questions relating to the title might be settled. Plaintiff's counsel thereupon introduced further evidence for the purpose of making proof of the remaining deeds in its alleged chain of title. One of the alleged deeds was from Simon W. Nicholls to Samuel T. Beecher. The defendants had filed an affidavit of forgery to this deed, and the issue of forgery was, by consent, tried with the other issues in the case. The original deed was lost, but the plaintiff introduced a certified copy from the records of the county in which it was recorded, and in connection with it an original deed from Luke G. Weeks to Simon W. Nicholls, which was proved by the interrogatories of a witness to have been in the handwriting of Simon W. Nicholls. In connection with the original deed just mentioned the plaintiff also introduced a witness who testified, in effect, that he had previously compared the signature of Simon W. Nicholls to the lost original deed with the writing in the deed from Luke G. Weeks to Simon W. Nicholls, having them both before him at the same time, and that the writing was the same, and in his opinion the signature to the lost deed was the genuine signature of Simon W. Nicholls. After this evidence was introduced, the judge sustained the objection of defendant's counsel to the admission of the certified copy of the deed from Simon W. Nicholls to Saml. T. Beecher, upon the ground that the execution of the deed had not been sufficiently shown by the evidence to entitle the plaintiff to go to the jury on the issue of forgery, the court holding that the testimony of the two witnesses was not sufficient to authorize the submission of the question as to the execution of the deed to the jury. Upon the close of the evidence the court awarded a nonsuit. The plaintiff excepted to these rulings.

Donalson & Donalson and J. R. Pottle, for plaintiff in error. Albert H. Russell and T. S. Hawes, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. 1. The ruling announced in the first headnote does not require elaboration.

2. The objections (2 to 5, inclusive) which were interposed to the admission of the deed from the Bank of Milledgeville to James U. Horn were without merit. This results from a construction of the charter of the bank and the application of the ruling of this court made in the case of Veasey v. Graham, 17 Ga. 99, 63 Am. Dec. 228. The act incorporating the Bank of Milledgeville, among other things, declared: “That the bills obligatory and of credit, notes, and other contracts whatsoever in behalf of the said corporation shall be binding upon the company; provided, the same be signed by the president and countersigned by the cashier of said corporation.” Acts 1835, p. 39, § 9. Similar language was contained in the charter of the Bank of Hawkinsville. Acts 1831, p. 43, § 8. Construing and applying that language it was held in the case of Veasey v. Graham, supra, that a deed executed like the present was sufficient in point of form, and was prima facie a good deed. This meets objections 2, 3, and 5. As to the fourth objection it may be added that the fact that James U. Horn, who as cashier was one of the officers who signed for the bank, was, in his individual capacity, the grantee named in the deed, did not render it void. Veasey v. Graham, 17 Ga. 99, 63 Am. Dec. 228.

3. Another objection to the deed from the Bank of Milledgeville to James U. Horn was that it appeared to have been executed in Baldwin county before the judge of an inferior court of another county, and therefore was not entitled to be recorded. The deed appears to have been executed on the 29th day of April, 1850, and the manner and sufficiency of its execution to authorize its record depends upon the law which was in force at the time of its execution and record. An examination of all the published acts and digests prior to the Codes of 1861 discloses that the law in force at the time of the execution of the deed in question, regarding the attestation of deeds in this state by notaries public, judges of the superior courts, justices of the inferior courts and justices of the peace was the act approved December 20, 1827. By section 3 of that act it was provided: "Every deed of conveyance or mortgage, on either real or personal property, hereafter to be made, may upon being executed in the presence of and attested by a notary public, judge of the superior court, justice of the inferior court, or justice of the peace (and in cases of real property by one other witness), be admitted to record and made evidence in the different courts of law and equity of this state as though the same had been executed, proved, and attested as heretofore required by the laws of this state in cases of deeds to real property." Prince's Dig. pp. 165, 166; Cobb's Dig. p. 172. Under this law one of the requirements for the proper execution of a deed to land was that it should be attested by one of the officers designated. The act does not purport to give them extra-territorial jurisdiction for the purpose of attesting deeds. The caption of the deed under consideration was, "Georgia, Baldwin county." It was not stated in the attestation clause, or elsewhere in the deed, that it was in fact executed in another county, and there was no aliunde evidence to that effect. The presumption is that the situs of its execution was Baldwin county. Rowe v. Spencer, 132 Ga. 426, 64 S. E. 468. The deed was attested as follows: "Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of: A. M. Nisbet, James Jackson, J. I. C. W. C." There was no official seal attached, nor anything to show the official character of the witness, except the letters which follow the name of the witness James Jackson. At that time there were justices of the inferior courts of the various counties of the state, who were authorized, among other things, to attest deeds. If the letters which follow the name of James Jackson characterize the witness as the official witness who attested the deed, and the letters be held to indicate that the witness was a justice of the inferior court of some county, the name of which commenced with the letter "W," it will be a different county from that of Baldwin, where the caption of the deed prima facie showed the situs of its execution to be. Thus it appears that the evidence relied upon to show the official character of the witness would show the officer to be such only in a different county from that where he purported to act. In 1850 James Jackson, as the justice of the inferior court of a different county from the county of Baldwin, did not have authority, under the law, to attest deeds in Baldwin county. The inferior courts were first established by the act approved December 23, 1798, § 36, et seq. (Watkin's Dig. p. 389), and their jurisdiction and the jurisdiction of the judges thereof defined. The law with regard to justices of the inferior courts and their jurisdiction was amended from time to time. Watkin's Dig. pp. 480, 619; Cobb's Dig. pp. 206, 1121, et seq.; Prince's Dig. pp. 180, 181, 433, 910. Sections 4 and 6 of article 3 of the Constitution of the state, adopted May 13, 1798 (Watkin's Dig. pp. 39, 40), provided that the justices of the inferior courts should be appointed by the General Assembly and commissioned by the Governor, to hold their commissions during good behavior, or as long as they should reside in the counties, respectively, for which they should be appointed, unless removed in a manner designated, and provided that the powers of the court of ordinary or register of probate should be vested in the inferior courts. These several changes in the law occurred prior to the execution of the deed under consideration. Subsequently to that time the law relating to inferior courts was embodied in the Code of 1863, §§ 276 to 287, and the Code of 1867, §§ 336 to 347, and sections 4052 to 4057. But the jurisdiction of the justices of the inferior courts of the several counties of the state always related to the performance of official acts within the respective counties for which they were commissioned. While the judges were authorized to attest deeds, they were authorized to do so only in the counties of their appointment. They were county officers, and had no official authority outside of the counties for which they were commissioned. The official attestation of a deed being an official act, it could not be exercised beyond the limits of the county for which the justice was commissioned. In this connection, see remarks of Nisbet, J., in Fain v. Garthright, 5 Ga. 6, 12, as approvingly cited in Hammond v. Wilcher, 79 Ga. 421, 5 S. E. 113. The plaintiff in error insists that the inferior courts were courts of record, and being such, under Civ. Code 1882, § 2706, as construed and applied in the case of Gress Lumber Co. v. Coody, 99 Ga. 775, 27 S. E. 169, the witness James Jackson, as judge of the inferior court, had authority to attest deeds anywhere in the state, and it became immaterial that he was not commissioned as a justice of the inferior court of the county of Baldwin. In the case cited it was said: "Under section 2706 of the Code, a judge of a court of record may attest a deed in any county in this state. That section declares that if executed in this state it must be attested by a judge of a court of record of this state, or a justice of the peace, or notary public, or clerk of the superior court in the county in which the 'three last-mentioned officers, respectively, hold their appointments,' etc. It will be seen, therefore, that while the statute requires that a deed, when attested by one of the three last-mentioned officers (namely, a justice of the peace, or a notary public, or a clerk of the superior court), shall be attested in the county where such officer holds his appointment, it expressly excepts from this requirement an attestation by a judge of a court of record." It will be observed that this ruling was based on a construction of the provisions of the Code which contained an exception with regard to judges of courts of record, who were put in one class, while justices of the peace, notaries public, and clerks of courts of record were put in another class; and it was held, as the latter were expressly restricted in the matter of acting as attesting witnesses to deeds to the counties in which they respectively held office, while there was no such restriction as to the former, that judges of courts of record could attest deeds in any county in the state. The first appearance in this state of the classification and exception above stated was in the Code of 1863, § 2868. Prior to that time, while justices of the inferior courts could attest deeds, they did so under the statute which authorized them, as such, to do so, and could only act in the territory of the county in which they held office. But, as was said in the case of Gress Lumber Co. v. Coody, supra, the section of the Code above mentioned changed the law as it stood prior thereto. "the whole subject having been fully considered by the codifiers, and it being manifestly their intention to revise and alter the existing law." After the adoption of the Code the statute no longer designated judges of the superior courts as authorized to attest deeds, but declared generally that the judge of a court of record might so act, and expressly named the class of officers whom it declared might act only in the county in which they held office. Though the inferior courts might have been courts of record, the ruling made in the case of Gress Lumber Co. v. Coody, supra, is not authority for holding that a justice of the inferior court was authorized to attest a deed beyond the limits of the county for which he was commissioned at the date of the deed now under consideration, while the act of 1827 was in force, and long before the adoption of the Code of 1863. It follows that the deed was improperly admitted to record, and there was no error in excluding from evidence a certified copy thereof on the objection urged thereto by the defendants in error.

4. Another assignment of error complains of the refusal of the judge to admit a certified copy of a deed from Simon W. Nicholls to Saml. T. Beecher. The deed was attacked by an affidavit of forgery, and the issue thus made was, by consent, on trial with the issues involved in the main case. Evidence was admitted, without objection, tending to show that a different deed was in the handwriting of Saml. W. Nicholls, the original of which was also admitted without objection. There was still further evidence, which was admitted without objection, that a witness had before the trial compared the writing contained in the original deed admitted in evidence, and shown to be the writing of Saml. W. Nichols, with the signature of Simon W. Nicholls to the deed which was lost. The witness who compared the writing had the two original deeds before him at the same time, and, after having so compared them, testified that the signature to the lost deed was, in his opinion, the genuine signature of Simon W. Nicholls. The court excluded the copy deed from evidence, on the ground that its execution had not been sufficiently shown to entitle the plaintiff to go to the jury on the issue of forgery. It thus appears that the question which the court ruled upon was as to the sufficiency of the proof made to entitle the plaintiff to submit his case to the jury on the issue of forgery and that the ruling was not as to the admissibility of evidence offered to show the genuineness of the deed under consideration. Independently of the question whether it was proper to permit the witness, over appropriate objection, to testify as to his opinion touching the genuineness of the signature of Simon W. Nicholls to the lost deed, evidence to that effect having been admitted, it was sufficient to authorize the plaintiff in error to go to the jury on the issue of forgery, and it was error on that account for the judge to exclude the certified copy of the deed. But the judgment granting a nonsuit will not be reversed on account of this error, it being recited in the bill of exceptions that after the ruling of the court excluding the deed, counsel announced to the court that under that ruling it would be impossible for the plaintiff to make out its case, and he would only introduce further evidence, with the court's permission, in order "that all questions relating to the title might be settled," and there being no contention in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error before this court that the judgment granting a nonsuit was erroneous if the ruling of the trial court in excluding the deed from the Bank of Milledgeville to James U. Horn should be sustained. We have seen that several of the objections to the deed last mentioned were insufficient, while one of them was sufficient, which requires an affirmance of the ruling excluding the certified copy of that deed from evidence. Hence it follows that the judgment of the court below will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

BULLARD et al. v. WYNN et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 22, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 336*)—PARTIES—AMENDMENT.

A motion to dismiss a writ of error having been made for want of certain necessary defendants in error, who were parties in the trial court, as shown by the record, and a motion having been made to amend the bill of exceptions by making them parties, and they having waived service and agreed that the hearing proceed, the latter motion is sustained. and the former overruled. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5570, 5547, par. 3.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 336.*]

2. WILLS (§ 355*)—SETTING ASIDE PROBATE—NECESSARY PARTIES TO MOTION.

To a motion to set aside a judgment the party in whose favor it was rendered, or, if dead, his legal representative, is a necessary party.

(a) A motion was made in the court of ordinary to set aside the probate of a nuncupative will. The propounder, who was the husband of the testatrix and the nominated executor, was dead. It was alleged that the probate was procured by fraud, no will having in fact been made, and the signatures of witnesses to a form of affidavit having been obtained by misrepresentation, and without any oath being administered, and also that no legal service was made on minor heirs, but an attempted service by a private person. It was further alleged that the executor died insolvent, and that the children, who were parties to the motion (three of them being movants and one being made a respondent), were his only heirs. Held, that the judgment of probate could not be set aside in the absence of a representative of the father's estate as a party, and the fact that no administrator had been appointed upon his estate did not alter this requirement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 355.*]

3. WILLS (§ 355*)—SETTING ASIDE PROBATE—NECESSARY PARTIES TO MOTION.

The motion to set aside the judgment of probate, in view of the allegations made and the parties thereto, was demurrable, and there was no error in dismissing it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 355.*]

4. WILLS (§ 425*)—PROCESS TO SUSTAIN—JUDGMENT VOID ON FACE OF RECORD.

If the judgment probating the nuncupative will in solemn form was void for want of legal service and because the minor heirs were not served and made parties as required by law, and this appeared upon the face of the record, the judgment would not be conclusive upon them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 425.*]

5. WILLS (§ 355*)—SETTING ASIDE PROBATE—MOTION—PROPER PARTIES.

Where a will was probated, which conferred upon the executor power to sell the property of the testatrix, and subsequently a motion to set aside the judgment of probate was made by the heirs of the decedent, a person who had purchased property from the executor under the authority contained in the will was properly allowed to intervene and oppose the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 355.*]

Error from Superior Court, Pulaski County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by Ruby Bullard and others against J. M. Wynn and others. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

In 1908 Mrs. Ruby Bullard, Mrs. Hennie Thompson, and Watts Morgan, by his next friend, filed their petition in the court of ordinary of Pulaski county, seeking to have revoked and set aside the probate of a nuncupative will of Mrs. Emma V. Morgan. The petitioners alleged as follows: Mrs. Emma V. Morgan died in Pulaski county November 28, 1892. At the time of her death she left as her only children the petitioners, Mrs. Lola Speer, and another child who died in infancy. Her husband, the father of the petitioners, died on May 19, 1907, leaving no heirs except the children. At the time of the death of their mother Mrs. Speer was 19 years old, Mrs. Thompson was 15, Mrs. Bullard was 10, and Watts Morgan was 4 years of age. About March 6, 1893, their father, Y. H. Morgan, made application to the court of ordinary for the probate of what he alleged to be a nuncupative will of their deceased mother. It was prayed that citation issue to the minor children. On such citation there purports to be an affidavit made by one R. J. Morgan, dated April 10, 1893, setting forth that he had personally served each of the children with a true copy of the citation. At the April term of the court the ordinary appointed a guardian ad litem for the minors, and he accepted the appointment. The will was admitted to probate upon the affidavit or a purported affidavit of R. J. Morgan, Lola Morgan, and Emeline Jordan, and Y. H. Morgan qualified as executor under an alleged appointment contained in such will. Petitioners learned about July, 1907, of the fact that the alleged nuncupative will had been set up and admitted to probate and that in point of fact no such will was ever made and began this proceeding to set aside the probate within three years of the time knowledge of the fact came to them. They were first put on inquiry by a letter written to them about some property in Atlanta. They learned that in fact no nuncupative will was made; that neither of the attesting witnesses ever testified by affidavit or otherwise "properly sworn to," that such a will had been made; that such witnesses did not know the contents of the alleged affidavit which they signed and the paper was simply prepared and presented to the witnesses who were told that it was merely a matter of form which they had to sign, and they signed it without knowing the facts contained in it and without being sworn. The papers were prepared by an attorney at the instance of their father, and the signatures were made at the instance and by the procurement of the latter. The purported will was gotten up entirely after the death of Mrs. Morgan by her husband and the father of the petitioners, who desired to have the property in such shape that he could take care of it and dispose of it as he saw fit without giving bond as in the case of administration. While the record purports to contain an affidavit of R. J. Morgan to the effect that he served the parties named in the citation, yet in point of fact no such service was made and the purported affiant did not testify that he made such service, but signed the affidavit merely upon the statement that it was a matter of form necessary in order that Y. H. Morgan could be made the guardian of his children

The person named as guardian ad litem was not informed that he was to act for the petitioners or Lola Morgan, but that his services were desired as guardian ad litem for the infant since deceased, and he did not know until recently that the establishment of the will depended in any way upon any action of his in his capacity as guardian ad litem. Mrs. Lola Speer is the only other surviving heir besides the petitioners. They prayed that citation issue and be served upon her, and upon the alleged witnesses to the will and the person who was appointed guardian ad litem in that proceeding for the minor children of Mrs. Morgan.

The nuncupative will which was probated appointed the husband of the testatrix her executor, with full power to take charge of her entire estate, and manage it as in his discretion seemed best, to sell, convey and reinvest the proceeds of any sale as he deemed best without any order from the court of ordinary for that purpose, and without being required to make any return. It recited that the testatrix had entire confidence in his judgment and discretion to manage the property for the best interests of their children without any interference from the court of ordinary, and gave him power "to manage without restriction all her said property, leaving it to him when and how to divide it among their children, or to keep it together as long as he lived, or until the youngest child became of full age before any division thereof, or make division earlier, or at any time that he saw fit, and in the manner that he thought best; that her said executor should not be made to account for the management or disposition of her property or the proceeds thereof, but should have absolute and untrammelled control of her entire estate during his life without any liable [liability] therefor; and at his death the estate then in his hands should be divided equally between her children, share and share alike; but should the executor make any advances to any child during his or her life as his or her said child's distributive share in the estate of testator, then such advances so made shall be [accounted] for by such child in the distribution among the children of testator." In the court of ordinary J. M. Wynn asked leave to intervene and resist the petition to set aside the judgment of probate, alleging that in reliance upon it he had purchased certain property from the executor, and still owned it. He was allowed to intervene, and filed a demurrer and answer. The ordinary rendered a judgment granting the prayer of the petition and setting aside and annulling the probate of the will. An appeal was taken to the superior court by Wynn. When the case came on for trial, the petitioners demurred and moved to strike the intervention and the pleadings of Wynn on the ground that he was not a party defendant in the petition and had no right to be heard. The motion was overruled, and the demurrer of Wynn was sustained, and the petition dismissed. The petitioners excepted to each ruling.

Haygood & Cutts and H. F. Lawson, for plaintiffs in error. O. J. Wimberly, Hall & Hall, and W. L. & Warren Grice, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). If the will was of force, the estate left at the death of the testatrix passed to the children. If the judgment of probate should be set aside, and the will be declared of no effect, the children would inherit as heirs of their mother and of another child who died in infancy. The father, who had been appointed executor, would also have been an heir, and they would claim as his heirs. As in the one instance they would take the entire estate left at the death of the executor, and in the other would claim partly as heirs of their mother and partly as heirs of a deceased child and of their father, it may readily be inferred that the substantial purpose to be accomplished by the motion to set aside was to repudiate the sales and transactions of their father as executor, and to seek to recover property which had been disposed of by him as such. Most outrageous fraud was charged against him in procuring the probate of the will. He was dead, and no legal representative was made a party. The movants were three of the children who would benefit by setting aside the judgment. As respondents they named a fourth child, who would also be benefited pecuniarily by the grant of the motion, the three witnesses to the alleged will, and the person who had been appointed by the ordinary as guardian ad litem for the children in the proceeding to probate it. The four last-mentioned respondents had no interest in the matter. Practically the case stood for determination between the four children, all of whom were interested on the same side. If the motion prevailed, their father would be adjudged to have procured the judgment by fraud. In that event also he would rank as an heir. It was alleged that he was insolvent, and there was no administration. But the children could not ignore him, procure a judgment stamping him with fraud and setting aside the former judgment obtained by him, overlook the creditors of his insolvent estate, and take his share as heirs. To a motion to set aside a judgment the person in whose favor it was rendered was a necessary party. If he is dead, a legal representative for him is a necessary party. Grier v. Jones, 54 Ga. 154; Tarver v. New England Mortgage Security Co., 96 Ga. 536, 23 S. E. 507; Whitley Grocery Co. v. Jones, 128 Ga. 791, 58 S. E. 623. If in some cases on account of the fact that there is no estate to administer, an administrator cannot be appointed, this may be a matter for legislative consideration as to whether that body will make proper provision for such a contingency. But the fact that a man obtains a judgment and afterwards dies without leaving an estate will not authorize the adverse party to move to set aside the judgment with no party respondent.

A person who had purchased land from the executor asked to intervene and make defense against the motion to set aside the judgment probating the will and appointing the executor, under whom he obtained his title. The children opposed his application, but it was granted. There was no error in this. Walker v. Equitable Mortgage Co., 114 Ga. 862 (3), 40 S. E. 1010. Having effected an entrance into the litigation, he demurred to the petition. His demurrer was sustained. It was distributed over 17 grounds. We do not deem it necessary to discuss each separately. Some of them were good, and some of them were not. Suffice it to say that, with the parties before the court and under the allegations of the petition, it was properly dismissed.

In one ground, among other things, it was contended that in 1893, when the probate was had, the children were minors; that they were not served and made parties as required by law but the only service attempted was by an unofficial person; and that these facts appeared on the face of the record. If the children were not served or made parties so as to be lawfully before the court, they were not concluded by the judgment of probate. Civ. Code 1895, § 3282. If the judgment was a nullity and this appeared from the record, it could be treated as void. Hobby v. Bunch, 83 Ga. 1, 10 S. E. 113, 20 Am. St. Rep. 301; Civ. Code 1895, § 4987. A motion to set aside the judgment in such a case would seem to be unnecessary, though perhaps it would be a legitimate mode of attack. In sustaining the judgment dismissing the motion to set aside, the validity of the judgment of probate is not adjudicated, nor is the status of a purchaser from the executor decided. Whether the judgment of probate was valid or invalid, the motion to set aside was properly dismissed.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

CAVERLY v. STOVALL

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 24, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 52*)—PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH—PROCEDURE.

In order for the owner of a tract of land to have the lines around the same surveyed and marked anew by processioners under the Civil Code, § 3244, et seq., he must make application in writing to the processioners of the district in which a portion, or all of the land, is situated. Ballard v. Haines, 115 Ga. 847, 42 S. E. 218.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 253-263; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 52*)—PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH—PROCEDURE.

It is proper that one application be addressed to all three processioners; but the proceedings will not be unlawful if the applicant addresses a separate application to each of the processioners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

3. BOUNDARIES (§ 52*)—PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH—PROCEDURE.

It is sufficient if such applications are sent to the processioners and received by them through the United States mails.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

4. BOUNDARIES (§ 52*)—PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH—RETURN OF PROCESSIONERS—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where the processioners in their return, which, with the plat of the surveyor, was filed with the ordinary, recite that they were "applied to by S. C. Stovall [the applicant] to trace and mark anew the lines around a certain tract of land," etc., the presumption is that a proper application in writing was made to them by the applicant before they acted in the premises, and in the absence of proof that no such application was thus made, a motion by the protestant to dismiss the proceedings should be denied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

5. BOUNDARIES (§ 52*)—PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH—FILING OF APPLICATION.

It is proper that the processioners file the application to them, together with their report and the plat of the surveyor, with the ordinary; but a failure to thus file such application will not afford a good ground upon which to dismiss the proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

6. BOUNDARIES (§ 52*)—PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH—SUFFICIENCY OF PLAT.

The plat was not inadmissible in evidence on the ground that the survey of the tract of land containing less than 200 acres was laid down by a scale of 200 feet to the inch, instead of a scale of 10 chains to the inch, as required by rule 56 of the superior court; as such rules do not apply to surveys made by the county surveyor acting with processioners under an application of the owner of land to the processioners to have the lines around the same surveyed and marked anew.

WARE v. STATE. (No. 2,582.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 14, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)CRIMINAL LAW (§ 112)—VENUE.

Where a husband voluntarily and willfully separates from his wife in one county, leaving with her provisions, money, and clothing sufficient for the temporary support and maintenance of their minor child, and thereafter continues the desertion of his wife and the abandonment of his child, and the wife, on account of such desertion and abandonment, is compelled to take the child and seek a home with her brother in another county, and the child in the latter county subsequently becomes dependent, the abandonment still continuing, the venue of the offense should be laid in the county where the condition of dependency first arose during the continued abandonment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 220, 230; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

Error from Superior Court, Coffee County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

W. O. Ware was convicted of abandonment of a child, and brings error. Reversed.

Levi O'Steen, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Thomas, Sol. Gen., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Ware was convicted, in the superior court of Coffee county, of a violation of section 114 of the Penal Code, as amended by the act of 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 57), in that he "did willfully and voluntarily abandon his child, leaving her in a dependent condition." The only question to be decided is one of venue. Was the venue properly laid in Coffee county? The uncontroverted evidence shows that the defendant left his wife at their home in Coffee county, and went to the state of Florida. At the time he left home the child was temporarily absent, having been placed by him with an uncle of the child in Jeff Davis county for the purpose of attending school. Four days after the father left home the child was brought back into Coffee county to her mother, and the mother and child remained in Coffee county for about two weeks when they left home and went to the home of the mother's brother in Jeff Davis county, where they were living at the time of the trial. When the father left his wife in Coffee county, according to her testimony, he left with her "plenty of clothes and other necessities of life for herself and the child as long as they remained in Coffee county"; and she further states that the child "never became dependent on any one while they were in Coffee county," as during that time she cared for the child with the money and other property which the father had left with her for the purpose. When the father left home the child was not dependent in Jeff Davis county; for, according to the testimony of the uncle, with whom the child was boarding, the father had made arrangements with him for the child's support for five months and had made proper provision for it while attending school.

It is clear, therefore, that when the father left home to go to Florida, leaving his wife in Coffee county and his child in Jeff Davis county, the child was not in a condition of dependency, and this condition did not arise, if it ever did arise under the evidence, until after the mother took the child from Coffee county and went with it to the home of her brother in Jeff Davis county. Under these facts we think the venue should have been laid in Jeff Davis county. Where a husband voluntarily and willfully separates from his wife in one county, and during this period of separation the wife, because of such separation, is compelled to leave home and go to another county, and she takes their minor child with her, and while living in the latter county the child becomes dependent, the father would be indictable in the latter county for the abandonment of the child (Bennefield v. State, 80 Ga. 107, 4 S. E. 869); for in that county the condition of dependency first arose, and the father was continuing to abandon and desert his child. The willful desertion of the husband authorized the mother of the child to have the control of it and to take it with her to the place where the exigencies of her condition required her to go after such desertion and during its willful continuance. For these reasons, we think the venue should have been laid in Jeff Davis county.

Judgment reversed.

SPENCE v. STATE. (No. 2,573.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 12, 1910.
On Rehearing, July 5, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 972, 974)—MOTIONS IN ARREST—TIME—GROUNDS—"FACE OF THE RECORD."

A motion in arrest of judgment in a criminal case must be made during the term at which the trial was had and the sentence was imposed and it must be predicated on some defect which appears on the face of the record or pleadings. In a criminal case a defect "on the face of the record" exists when there is some inadequacy in the allegations of the indictment, not cured by the verdict, or where the verdict does not conform to the charge in the indictment. Relatively to a motion in arrest of judgment, the "face of the record" does not include the charge of the court or the brief of the evidence approved and filed as a part of the record in a motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2423, 2471, 2473; Dec. Dig. §§ 972, 974.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, p. 2636.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 887*)—VERDICT—INSTRUCTIONS—CONVICTION OF LESSER OFFENSE.

On the trial of an indictment for murder, the jury may convict of any lesser grade of homicide; and a verdict for voluntary manslaughter, in accordance with the evidence, would be a legal verdict, although the court did not instruct the jury on the law of voluntary manslaughter. The validity of a verdict is to be tested by the law as it is written, and not by the law as it is given in charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2094; Dec. Dig. § 887.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 342*)—WRIT OF ERROR—RIGHT TO COMPLAIN.

The evidence in this case demanded a verdict of murder. The statement of the defendant, if true, did not show justifiable homicide. As the verdict of voluntary manslaughter was more favorable to him than was authorized by the evidence and the law applicable thereto, he is not in a position to demand another trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 722; Dec. Dig. § 342.*]

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; Frank Park, Judge.

J. H. Spence was convicted of voluntary manslaughter on a charge of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Pope & Bennet, Spence & Bennet, Stanley S. Bennet, S. A. Roddenbery, J. J. Hill, and Cox & Peacock, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Wooten, Sol. Gen., F. A. Hooper, and O. H. B. Bloodworth, for the State.

HILL, C. J. J. H. Spence was indicted for murder, and on his trial was convicted of voluntary manslaughter. During the term of court at which he was tried, he filed a motion for a new trial, which was heard and overruled in vacation at the time to which the hearing had been duly adjourned by the court. Sentence was pronounced on the defendant during the term of the court in which he was tried. In vacation, on the day of the hearing of the motion for new trial, the defendant for the first time filed a motion in arrest of judgment, which the court overruled, and the defendant excepted. The motion in arrest of judgment attacks the validity of the verdict on two grounds: (1) Because the only charge in the indictment was murder, and the court did not submit to the jury any issue as to whether defendant was guilty of manslaughter, and no part of the law of manslaughter was charged in the case; and for this reason the verdict of manslaughter was wholly illegal and amounted to an acquittal of the defendant on the charge of murder. (2) Because the evidence in the case did not in any view sustain a verdict of voluntary manslaughter, and the court and counsel for both sides took the position that there was no manslaughter in the case. The motion in arrest of judgment further recited that it was filed after the brief of the evidence and the charge of the court had both been approved and filed and had become parts of the record in the case.

1. We think the court did right in overruling the motion in arrest of judgment. In the first place, a motion in arrest of judgment was not the proper procedure, if there was any merit in the objection made to the verdict. A motion in arrest of judgment will reach any defect apparent on the face of the record, not cured by the verdict, to which a general demurrer could have been successfully interposed before arraignment. It is also proper procedure where the verdict is for some offense not covered by the charge made in the indictment. As used in this connection, the expression "the face of the record" means, in a criminal case, the indictment and the verdict; a defect on the face of the record exists when there is any inadequacy in the allegations, not cured by the verdict, or where the verdict does not conform to the charge in the indictment. It is not, in our opinion, broad enough to reach the charge of the court or the brief of the evidence. These are parts of the record subsequent to the trial; and if the verdict is contrary to the charge of the court for any reason, or contrary to law for any reason, or is without evidence to support it, it is ground for a new trial, and not for arrest of judgment. But, even if we are not correct in the position just taken, the motion in arrest of judgment was filed too late. A motion in arrest of judgment "must be made during the term at which such judgment was obtained." Civ. Code, § 5363. In this case the motion was not filed in term, with an order taken to hear it in vacation, as might probably have been done. It was not filed until vacation, and until after sentence had been imposed by the court. This motion should properly be made before sentence. 1 Bishop on Criminal Procedure, § 1284. As the judgment or sentence of the court is in the breast of the court and subject to be changed by it during the term, the motion in arrest may probably be made after sentence has been actually passed; but it cannot be made after the sentence has been passed (unless it relates to the sentence itself) and after the court has adjourned. The court has no power over the judgment after the term in which it was rendered has passed.

2. The objections made to the verdict by the motion in arrest of judgment constitute one of the grounds in the motion for new trial. We think the contention that the verdict is illegal because the court did not charge the law of voluntary manslaughter is unsound. It is true the indictment was for the offense of murder; but the higher charge, as is well settled, includes every lesser offense embraced therein. The indictment, therefore, was not only for murder, but was for all the lesser grades of homicide. While it is well established that the jury, although judges of the law and the facts in criminal cases, must take the law from the court, yet it has been frequently held by the Supreme Court that if the trial judge should erroneously instruct the jury as to the law, and the jury should nevertheless find a correct verdict under the evidence and the law applicable thereto, the verdict will stand. In other words, the validity of the verdict is to be tested, not by the law as given in charge, but by the law as it is. Where the verdict is right in itself, as being in accordance with the evidence and the law applicable thereto, it ought not to be set aside on account of an erroneous instruction given by the court to the jury. Much less should it be disturbed because the court did not fully instruct the jury as to the law applicable to every phase of the evidence or reasonable theory deducible therefrom. Johnson v. State, 14 Ga. 55; Wellborn v. Weaver, 17 Ga. 267, 63 Am. Dec. 235; Potts v. House, 6 Ga. 324, 50 Am. Dec. 329. An exception to the verdict because contrary to the charge of the court is immaterial, unless it is also contrary to law. If the jury can disregard an erroneous instruction, a fortiori it has the prerogative to find a verdict in accordance with the evidence, although the judge may fail to instruct as to the law applicable to that theory of the evidence which the jury finds to be the truth. In this case the court charged fully the law of murder and justifiable homicide in self-defense. The defense relied upon was justifiable homicide in self-defense. The contentions of both sides were fairly submitted. But the jury did not agree with either contention. What was the jury to do? They could not conscientiously convict of murder, or acquit. They could have asked the court for instructions on the law of manslaughter; but, if they believed that a verdict of voluntary manslaughter was the only just and true solution of the question of fact, why could they not so find? And if this finding is authorized by the evidence, it would be a palpable perversion of the purpose of a trial by jury to hold that a righteous verdict in accordance with the evidence should be set aside as illegal because the jury found the truth unaided by court or counsel, or even contrary to the views of the law entertained by both.

The foregoing remarks are based on the assumption that the facts warranted a verdict of manslaughter. But from a study of the evidence and the defendant's statement we are convinced that the law of manslaughter was not really involved. It is conceded that the evidence for the state demanded a verdict of murder. There was no evidence for the defendant. It is insisted that his statement to the jury made a case of justifiable homicide in self-defense. We do not think his statement makes a case of self-defense, actual or apparent. Construed in connection with the evidence, or considered alone, the statement shows that the killing was caused by opprobrious words. Whisky and abusive language aroused ungovernable rage, and murder was the result. There was no menace or threat accompanying the vile epithets used by the deceased to the defendant. There was nothing in the conduct of the deceased in connection with his abusive language to justify a reasonable fear on the part of the defendant that his life was in danger, or that a serious personal injury was about to be committed on him; nor was there any "appearance of imminent danger." Passion was aroused by words alone, without threats, menaces, or any manifest intention to inflict bodily injury. The statute declares that "words," even when accompanied by "threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures, shall in no case be sufficient to free the person killing from the crime of murder." Pen. Code, § 65. What we here hold is not intended to controvert the doctrine announced in the Cummings Case, 99 Ga. 662, 27 S. E. 177, and frequently applied by this court, that while words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures may not be sufficient to mitigate a homicide from murder to manslaughter, yet these things may, in some cases, arouse that reasonable fear which will justify the killing.

The facts of the homicide, as narrated by the defendant in his statement to the jury, in no substantial particular distinguish this case from Malone v. State, 49 Ga. 217. See, also, Fallon v. State, 5 Ga. App. 663, 63 S. E. 806. We do not deem it necessary to give the evidence or the statement in detail. It is enough to state our conclusion. The evidence demanded a verdict of murder; and the statement of the defendant, even if believed by the jury, shows no fact, or reasonable inference from facts, to justify or warrant an acquittal. The defendant, therefore, is not in a position to demand another trial. He cannot be heard to complain of a verdict strongly on the side of mercy, and more favorable to him than was authorized by law, under the evidence or his statement. Robinson v. State, 109 Ga. 506, 34 S. E. 1017. The opinion of the evidence expressed above makes it unnecessary to consider or decide any of the objections made to the charge of the court. If there were any inaccuracies, they were harmless.

Judgment affirmed.

On Rehearing.

POWELL, J. At the rendition of the original opinion in this case, I intended to mark myself as specially concurring, but neglected to do so. While I do not fully agree to all that is there said, I cannot escape the conclusion that the judgment of affirmance is correct; and it is deemed expedient that I express on the application for rehearing the views which to my mind seem controlling in the case. And I am authorized to state that my colleagues agree with me as to the principles here announced.

The reason that this court should not grant a new trial in this case is, not that the record does not show error, but because, in our sincere opinion, the error shown is, so far as the complaining party is concerned, harmless. The jury in every case ought to follow the charge of the court as to the law. It is error for them not to do so; but whether a party will be allowed successfully to claim a new trial on account of the jury's delinquency in this respect depends upon whether any legal hurt was to him thereby occasioned. If the jury's departure from the law as given in charge has been solely and unequivocally in the direction of favoring the complaining party, it is not only fair and proper that he should not be allowed successfully to assign error therefor, but we are sure that the uniform usage of the courts forbids that he should do so.

In this case, if there were any fair theory of the evidence or of the defendant's statement upon which an upright and intelligent jury could acquit him under the law, the verdict of manslaughter should be set aside. But there are only three classes of homicide—murder, manslaughter, and justifiable or excusable homicide. There is no contention that there was not a homicide; and in our judgment there was no rational view of the evidence (including the defendant's statement) from which it could be said that the killing was justifiable or excusable. The verdict was for manslaughter. As an upright and intelligent jury could not acquit under the most favorable view of the facts as applied to the law, it follows from logical necessity, that unless the defendant was guilty of manslaughter (the offense of which he was convicted) he was guilty of murder, and that the only result flowing from the error of the jury in finding manslaughter, when they had not been given that offense in charge, was that the defendant was found guilty of the lower of the two offenses remaining in the case; and we cannot concede that he should be allowed successfully to assert such an error as a reason for sustaining his motion for a new trial. It cannot reasonably be the duty of the court to order a new trial of the case to see if another jury would acquit, when, under the law and the facts, no such verdict could properly be rendered. The end and object of courts is to give opportunity that justice may be judicially administered. In our opinion they have no duty resting upon them of taking any affirmative step, even in favor of a defendant in a criminal case, which could have no other apparent object than to give the party an opportunity to see if the jury could not be induced to render a verdict which neither the law nor any reasonable construction of the facts would authorize.

We understand that in all cases an error (however egregious) pertaining to the trial of the case is to be considered as harmless when, if the error had not been committed, the complaining party could not, under the application of the law to the most favorable theory of the evidence (including the defendant's statement in a criminal case), have been properly awarded a more favorable verdict. The suggestion of able counsel for the plaintiff in error is that this is in effect what was held in Perry's Case, 102 Ga. 365, 30 S. E. 903, and Luby's Case, 102 Ga. 633, 29 S. E. 494, both of which cases were overruled in Glover v. State, 128 Ga. 1, 7, 57 S. E. 101. We heartily agree with them that the Glover Case correctly states the law, and that the Luby Case and the Perry Case were so strikingly wrong in principle as to cause their prompt overruling when they were subsequently reviewed. But we are not willing to concede that the present ruling is any reiteration of the erroneous features of the two cases criticised. In each of those cases the evidence was conflicting, and, while it was sufficient to authorize the conviction of murder and the assessment of the death penalty, did not demand that verdict, and on an errorless trial the defendant might, under the law and the evidence, have been properly awarded a more favorable verdict. Hence the errors in those cases were not harmless within the rule above announced.

Able counsel for the plaintiff in error, in their strenuous motion for a rehearing, take as a text, so to speak, the following questions, which they place upon the title page of their written motion, as filed: (1) "Can a legal verdict be rendered on the disputed issue, when no charge of the court is given?" If the word "legal" is used in contrast to "erroneous," we answer, "No;" but, if used in absolute or formal sense, we answer, "Yes." (2) "In other words," they ask, "are jurors night-riders, Ku-Klux Klans, or vigilance committees, each enforcing his own idea of justice, regardless of the law of the land?" And to this question we answer, "Undoubtedly, no." And then they ask: (3) "When no charge whatever is given to control the jury in their deliberations on the disputed issue, and when not even a definition of the offense of which they convicted the man is given to the jury, either in the indictment or charge of the court, will the appellate court refuse a new trial, merely because the judges think the evidence supports the verdict?" Again we answer, "No." But we do unhesitatingly say that, while the judges of the reviewing court have no power whatever to decide disputes of fact, they nevertheless have the undoubted power, and, when the case authorizes it, the duty, of ascertaining whether a given state of facts is sufficient, taken in its strongest view, to authorize this or that legal result. It is also within the province of the reviewing court to examine the evidence, to see whether any alleged error was or was not harmful to the complaining party; for error without possibility of injury will not justify a reversal by a reviewing court, however limited its power over the facts. And lastly they ask: "In other words, can the appellate court make a verdict—try the case—or is its duty confined to the 'correction of errors in law and in equity' in the court below? Does the appellate court give judgment on the case itself, or does it give judgment on the question whether the lower court properly tried the case?" The Constitution limits the jurisdiction of this court to "correction of errors in law," and gives it no jurisdiction over the issues of fact; but these powers are to be exercised in accordance with the established rules of judicial procedure, and one of these rules is that error without injury will not work a reversal. We do not understand the Constitution to mean that we must order a retrial of every case wherein we find that some abstract error has been committed.

The very earnestness with which counsel have presented their points in the application for rehearing, our knowledge of their personal and professional fairness and ability, and our belief in the perfect sincerity with which they insist that our judgment is wrong, have caused us to carefully look into the matter again. Law and common sense both seem to support us in the proposition that if the state's testimony showed unequivocally that the homicide was murder, and the defendant set up no facts showing legal justification, he cannot complain of a verdict of voluntary manslaughter, though that verdict was erroneous, because contrary to the charge of the court. But it is insisted that the evidence was not in this condition—that under the defendant's statement the jury might have found him justifiable. If this were so, there ought to be a new trial. The evidence for the state, as well as the statement of the defendant (for he introduced no evidence), showed much moral mitigation for the homicide. The deceased evidently did much to provoke the killing, by his unreasonably abusive and taunting language addressed to the defendant; but, under the law, none of these things justify a homicide.

Under the defendant's statement, he and another man had had a difficulty in the store of the deceased. The other man went off for a weapon. The defendant went out to his buggy in front of the store, and put shells into his double-barreled gun, and brought it inside the store, and set it down near the door. The deceased told the defendant to get out. The defendant took his gun and went out. The deceased began to curse the defendant, employing very vile and abusive language. The defendant remonstrated with him, begging him to desist from his abuse, and telling him: "I don't want to hurt you. I am a friend to you. I didn't load my gun to hurt you." An outsider intervened, and, putting his hand on the shoulder of the deceased, asked him to quit cursing the defendant. The deceased, who was walking with a crutch, drew it back as if he would hit this outsider, and then turned to the defendant, saying: "You God damn cowardly son of a bitch, you needn't bother about shooting any one else; here, shoot me!" As to what then occurred, we quote the defendant's statement literally: "And he changed his crutch to the other hand, and put his hand in his pocket. I grabbed my gun and shot him. When I shot him, I had a carbuncle on my neck, and I couldn't get my neck around. I had on my overcoat and everything when I shot him. I just took and threwed my gun down, and cocked the other barrel, and shot him again. I didn't know whether I hit him the first time or not. I was looking for him to shoot me every minute. I knew he had a pistol at the time. He had it in the store. He carried it to town with him, and he carried it back with him; and when I shot the second time, saw him drop the crutch right inside the door, I saw the crutch fall."

Did this set up a case of justifiable homicide? The deceased used abusive language; and the placing of his hand in his pocket may be construed as a menace. Compare Malone v. State, 49 Ga. 217. But words and menaces alone do not justify. The deceased in fact had no pistol, but the defendant thought that he had one. He therefore relied upon the doctrine of apparent self-defense—a perfectly sound defense when the facts justify it. Words and menaces, while not sufficient per se to justify, may under peculiar circumstances constitute such an apparent state of danger as to arouse reasonable fears. But as was said in the leading case on this subject, as to reasonable fears generated by words or menaces, justifying a homicide: "There must be more than mere verbal threats. The means of inflicting the threatened injury must apparently be at hand, and there must be some manifestation of an intention to inflict the injury presently." Cumming v. State, 99 Ga. 662, 664, 27 S. E. 177. In the present case the deceased was not threatening to shoot. He did not draw. He did not manifest a present intention of shooting. He merely put his hand to his pocket, where the defendant thought he had a pistol, and invited the defendant to shoot him—the act and the word probably constituting an apparent invitation from the deceased to the defendant to engage in a combat with deadly weapons. As the defendant accepted the apparent invitation, the writer thinks that in this view of the evidence the homicide was manslaughter. See Roberts v. State, 65 Ga. 431, 436 (bottom page). As is said in the Roberts Case, supra: "The mere show of a deadly weapon, without more, would not produce an exigency to justify a homicide," and much less would it produce such an exigency for the deceased merely to put his hand into his pocket, and upon a weapon there (for we may treat the case as if the deceased actually had the weapon), not with a threat that he would shoot the defendant, but with an invitation to the defendant, who was presently possessed with a loaded gun, to begin the shooting. The Malone Case, supra, the Roberts Case, supra, the Fallon Case, 5 Ga. App. 663, 63 S. E. 806, besides others, seem to justify us in saying that as a matter of law the defendant did not set up a state of facts which justified him, and, on the contrary, admitted such a state of facts that the jurors were under their oaths bound to convict him of either murder or manslaughter. We all agree that the defendant, throughout the whole transaction, except in his final act of homicide, acted in much better spirit than did the deceased. He was much provoked, but not legally justified.

Nothing herein conflicts with the oft-repeated proposition that if the evidence of the state shows murder, and that of the defendant shows justification, or denies the homicide, and there is no middle ground, a verdict of manslaughter will not be allowed to stand. This case is within the rule announced in Carver v. State, 105 Ga. 461, 30 S. E. 433, a case differing from this one only in the fact that the error there consisted in the court's submitting manslaughter to the jury, while the error here is that the jury acted without the instruction. In that case it was held: "Though a charge upon the law of voluntary manslaughter was barely warranted, the fact that such a charge was given does not, in the present case, present any reason for granting the accused, who was convicted of this offense, a new trial; for the state's evidence made against him a case of murder, and there was no testimony which would have justified an acquittal. The homicide being manifestly felonious, and the verdict being the most favorable to the accused which could, in any view of the case, have been rendered, he was not injured by an instruction which afforded the jury an opportunity to thus grade the crime."

We feel it our duty to deny the rehearing.

Action between J. H. Lanham and L. U. G. Presley. From the judgment, Lanham brings error. Affirmed.

Dean & Dean, Nathan Harris, and Mundy & Mundy, for plaintiff in error. Lipscomb, Willingham & Doyal and Maddox & Doyal, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. It is with no little reluctance that we give this case the turn we are about to give it. It involves at least two pretty points, not new points in the strict sense, for they are merely old acquaintances in new dress, and yet attractive. Judges are human, of course, and when we see a pretty point, and have studied it, we feel a disappointment in being deprived by any reason from the privilege of having our say on the subject. So, if we justly could refuse to do so, we would not notice the condition of the so-called brief of the evidence; but the prime, cardinal essential of juridic justice is expressed in the homely colloquialism, "Feed everybody out of the same spoon," and to apply the same law to this case that we have been applying to others constrains us to hold that there is no legal brief of the evidence, and that, therefore, the exceptions and the interesting questions made in them cannot be considered. Of what is called the brief of the evidence in the record, the portion relating to wholly immaterial matters is the major part. The history of a transaction wholly foreign to the points presented is set out in full, is repeated, and then reiterated time and again. Other immaterial matters are set out at great length. Hidden in all this mass of surplusage, the evidence that elucidates the points may be found, if diligent search is made. It is plain that counsel, instead of making such a brief of the evidence as is required by section 5488 of the Civil Code of 1895, took the stenographer's report of the trial and added to it a brief of the documentary evidence.

There is nothing difficult in complying with the law on this subject. This court is not enforcing the statute captiously. It is not mere length that offends against the statute. We have had before us this week a record in which the brief of the evidence extends through more than 100 pages of compact typewritten matter, and yet that brief of the evidence substantially complies with the law in letter and in spirit. We have been attempting in several recent cases to stress the fact that we cannot, without violating the law, waive the failure of counsel to brief the evidence. In the present instance the neglect to comply with the statutory requirement is palpable. See, on the subject generally, Southern Ry. Co. v. Wafford, 7 Ga. App. 652, 67 S. E. 831; Powers v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 7 Ga. App. 673, 67 S. E. 831; General Accident Corp. v. Turner, 7 Ga. App. 679, 67 S. E. 832; Johnson v. Douglass Co., 6 Ga. App. 681, 65 S. On Motion for Rehearing.

For the special reasons shown in the motion for a rehearing, we would ordinarily be inclined to grant the rehearing. However, it is the precedent not to grant a rehearing where the judgment, irrespective of the applicability of the particular reason given in the original decision, would be the same. Carreker v. Thornton, 1 Ga. App. 508, 511, 57 S. E. 988. In this case, on a consideration of the merits, we had reached the conclusion that the case should be affirmed, before we decided to affirm it for the technical reason expressed in the opinion.

Therefore the rehearing is denied.

DEARISO et al. v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF SYLVESTER. (No. 2,335.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 14, 1910.
Rehearing Denied July 5, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTION (§ 154*) — FORECLOSURE OF CHATTEL MORTGAGE—FORTHCOMING BOND—SATISFACTION.

Two mortgages of different dates held by the same mortgagee covered the same three mules. The mortgagee foreclosed the senior mortgage and had the three mules seized under execution. An affidavit of illegality was interposed by the defendant in the mortgage fi. fa., and upon his giving a forthcoming bond the sheriff left the three mules in his possession. Subsequently the mortgagee foreclosed the junior mortgage and had the sheriff to seize under execution two of the mules, take them from the possession of the defendant, and sell them; and the proceeds were applied as a credit on the junior mortgage fi. fa. Held, that the act of the mortgage creditor amounted to a satisfaction of the bond as to the production of the two mules, but the bond still remained binding as to one mule, and the sureties thereon were liable pro tanto for a breach thereof.

2. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 110*) — DISCHARGE OF SURETY.

Both at common law and under the express provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 2972, any act of the creditor, either before or after judgment against the principal, which injures the surety, or increases his risk, or exposes him to greater liability, will discharge him.

Error from City Court of Sylvester; J. B. Williamson, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Sylvester against R. L. Deariso and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Polhill & Foy and R. S. Foy, for plaintiffs in error. Claude Payton and C. E. Hay, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The First National Bank of Sylvester held two chattel mortgages covering the same property, viz., three mules. It foreclosed the senior mortgage and caused a fi. fa. issued thereon to be levied upon the three mules. The defendant in the mortgage fi. fa. filed an affidavit of illegality, and on his giving a forthcoming bond for the property levied upon the sheriff left the property in his possession. Subsequently the bank caused its junior mortgage to be also foreclosed, and under the fi. fa. issued thereon two of the three mules were seized by the sheriff and sold, and the proceeds were applied as a credit on the junior mortgage fi. fa. The affidavit of illegality having been dismissed, the sheriff advertised the three mules for sale, under the levy made by virtue of the execution issued on the foreclosure of the senior mortgage, and, on failure of the principal and the sureties on the forthcoming bond to produce any one of the mules at the time and place of sale as required by the terms of the bond, the present suit was brought on the bond by the bank against both principal and sureties.

On the trial it was contended by the sureties that the act of the mortgage creditor, the bank, in foreclosing the junior mortgage and seizing and selling two of the mules that were covered by the forthcoming bond and applying the proceeds of the sale, not to the senior mortgage, but to the junior mortgage, increased their risk as sureties on the forthcoming bond, and released and discharged them from all further liability thereon. The view entertained by the trial court was that the acts of the mortgage creditor only released the sureties pro tanto—that is, to the extent of the value of the two mules which had been seized and sold under the foreclosure of the junior mortgage—and that it did not release the principal in the forthcoming bond and his sureties from their obligation to deliver according to the terms and condition of their bond the third mule at the time and place of sale. The only question in the case, therefore, is whether this view of the court was correct, or whether the conduct of the mortgage creditor above stated did not fully release the sureties from the obligation of the forthcoming bond.

Section 2972 of the Civil Code provides (and this is the general law on the subject) that "any act of the creditor, either before or after judgment against the principal, which injures the surety or increases his risk or exposes him to greater liability, will discharge him." The mortgage creditor had the right to foreclose the junior mortgage and to sell the property covered thereby, although it had been previously seized under the foreclosure of the senior mortgage and was left in the possession of the defendant subject to his forthcoming bond. But when he had the sheriff to take from the possession of the defendant two of the mules and sell them under the junior mortgage fi. fa., he made it impossible for the principal in the bond to comply with its terms in so far as a production of the two mules was concerned at the time and place of sale, or when required by the sheriff. This amounted to a satisfaction of the bond as to the two mules; but it was still binding upon the principal and the sureties as to the third mule, and a breach of the bond as to this mule would render the sureties liable pro tanto—that is, to the extent of the value of the one mule.

The jury found a verdict against the defendants for the proven value of this one mule, and we think this verdict was in accordance with the spirit, if not with the letter, of the Code section, supra.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by C. H. Wells against A. W. Watters. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. A. Denny and Nathan Harris, for plaintiff in error. Geo. A. H. Harris & Son, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. An execution from a justice's court in favor of Wells against Watters was levied on personal property. Watters filed an affidavit of illegality, setting up payment of the fl. fa. Upon the trial it appeared that, pending the suit brought by Wells against Watters in the justice's court, and before judgment had been obtained therein against Watters, Doss had garnishment proceedings served on Watters, requiring him to answer what he owed Wells. Watters answered the garnishment, denying indebtedness, and this answer was traversed by Doss. Subsequently a judgment was entered in the suit by Wells against Watters for $71.93. After this judgment, which concluded the issue on the garnishment in favor of the traverse, Wells' attorney instructed the justice of the peace to enter a judgment in favor of Doss, garnishing creditor, against Watters, for the full amount of the judgment in favor of Wells and against Watters, and judgment was thereupon entered in favor of Doss against Watters for $71.93. After this payment the fl. fa. of Wells against Watters was levied for "the purpose only of prosecuting the levy for the attorney's fees in the case, and the court instructed the jury to find for Wells, for the use of his attorneys, the sum of $20, and Watters' motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepts.

Watters, having paid the principal and interest on the Doss judgment, claimed that it satisfied the principal and interest of the Wells judgment. In other words, he insisted that there had been no settlement by him of the fl. fa. with Wells, but that the payment of the judgment in favor of the garnishee by him fully satisfied the judgment in favor of Wells against him; or to express it differently, he claimed that he had simply set off one judgment against the other, and that this he had a right to do. He also insisted that, as the judgment in favor of the garnishee was entered against him by direction of Wells' attorneys, the attorneys were estopped from enforcing the judgment in favor of Wells against him for their fee. Section 2814 of the Civil Code of 1895 prohibits the settlement of a fl. fa. or judgment by the defendant with the plaintiff in fl. fa., so as to defeat the fees of the attorneys for the plaintiff; but under the facts of this case it seems to us that Watters, defendant in fl. fa. in the suit of Wells, did not settle the fl. fa. with Wells. Watters owed wells, and Wells owed Doss. Watters, by consent of Wells' attorneys, paid the debt which Wells owed to Doss, garnishing creditor. Under the facts of this case, Watters, the defendant in fl. fa., was compelled at his peril to settle the garnishment debt, and the payment by him of the judgment for that debt was a complete satisfaction of the judgment in favor of Wells, the original plaintiff in fl. fa. We think the case is controlled by the principle, announced in Langston v. Roby, 68 Ga. 406, that "while parties cannot settle a judgment, so as to avoid the lien of the plaintiff's attorney for his fee, yet the right of setting off one judgment against another is conferred by express statute, and may be exercised, although the practical result may be an extinguishment of such judgment in whole or in part, and thereby the attorney may lose the power of enforcing it for his fee." See, also, Smith v. Evans, 110 Ga. 536, 35 S. E. 633.

We think, also, that the attorney for Wells was estopped from prosecuting the fi. fa. against Watters for his fee, because he had himself directed the justice to enter judgment in favor of Doss, the garnishing creditor, against Watters, for the full amount due from Watters to Wells. This was in effect a payment by Watters of the Wells fi. fa. against him under the direction of Wells' attorney. The judgment in favor of Wells against Watters having thus been paid by Watters, in the payment by him of Doss' claim against Wells, the fi. fa. issued thereon could not be prosecuted for any purpose. Judgment reversed.

SHEPPARD v. DANIEL MILLER CO.
DANIEL MILLER CO. v. SHEPPARD.
 (Nos. 2,281, 2,327.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 14, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. GUARANTY (§ 7*)—ACCEPTANCE.

Where the terms of a proposed guaranty contemplates acceptance thereof only by an extension of credit, and, relying thereon, the credit is actually given, the contract becomes complete and binding, and no notice of acceptance of the guaranty is necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. GUARANTY (§ 53*)—SCOPE OF LIABILITY.

Where an absolute promise to become responsible for a certain amount becomes binding by acceptance, the promisor will be bound to the extent of his guaranty, although the creditor during the existence of the contract may have extended credit to the original debtor in an amount greater than the sum named in the guaranty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 64; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

3. GUARANTY (§ 36*)—RECOVERY OF ATTORNEY'S FEES.

Where the undertaking of the guarantor is to pay for goods sold by the creditor to the debtor to the extent of a specified sum, and in addition to pay 10 per cent. on the indebtedness as attorney's fees in the event of suit, the amount stipulated as attorney's fees is recoverable from the guarantor on giving the statutory notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 839*)—REVIEW—CROSS-BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where this court has jurisdiction of the writ of error on a main bill of exceptions, it will consider and decide all questions properly made by a cross-bill of exceptions although such questions may be interlocutory in character, where, under the judgment of this court, the case is to be again tried in the court below.

Error from City Court of Calhoun; H. M. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by the Daniel Miller Company against E. S. Sheppard. From the judgment, defendant brings error; plaintiff filing cross-exceptions. Affirmed on main bill of exceptions, and reversed on cross-bill.

The Daniel Miller Company, a corporation, sued Sheppard on the following writing:

"For goods delivered and to be delivered to Fain & Weaver, of Edison, Ga., debtor, and for other valuable considerations, the undersigned agrees to pay to Daniel Miller Company, a corporation, a sum not exceeding fifteen hundred dollars as guarantor for any sum or sums that may now be due or may hereafter become due by said debtor to the said corporation, this being also a continuing guaranty for such goods as the Daniel Miller Company shall sell and deliver (and it shall have the exclusive right to determine what and when it shall deliver), or for any credit it may extend to the said debtor, at any time from the date hereof and as long as this guaranty shall be in force and not revoked in writing. And the said guarantor agrees to pay on demand, without offset or delay, to the said Daniel Miller Company any part of said indebtedness hereby guaranteed remaining unpaid at maturity according to the terms thereof; and the guarantor hereby waives notice of nonpayment of said bill or bills or other indebtedness by said debtor, and also waives notice of future purchases as long as this guaranty is in force, and further waives any right to require said corporation to sue said debtor and to exhaust his assets before demanding payment under this guaranty. And the said guarantor hereby agrees to pay 10 per cent. in addition to the sum due by said debtor to cover costs of collection and attorney's fees, with waiver of exemption and homestead in favor of Daniel Miller Company. Witness our hands and seals this March 7, 1907.

"[Signed] E. S. Sheppard. [Seal.]

"Received March 11, 1907.

"[Signed] Daniel Miller Company."

The petition alleges an indebtedness of $1,500, principal and interest, and $150 as attorney's fees, on the above-stated written obligation; that the petitioner complied with the terms of the obligation on its part, and furnished and sold to the firm of Fain & Weaver merchandise in the sum of $1,500 upon the said written obligation (a bill of particulars being attached to the petition); and it also alleges the statutory notice as to attorney's fees.

The defendant demurred on the grounds that the petition set forth no cause of action, as the contract relied upon was unilateral, and not binding on the defendant; that the writing sued upon was a mere proposal of guaranty, calling for a timely acceptance, and that no acceptance is alleged; and that, if the contract ever became binding at all, the guarantor was released therefrom by the act of the plaintiff in furnishing to the original debtor merchandise exceeding the sum of $1,500, thereby increasing the risk of the guarantor as contemplated by the instrument. And a further ground of demurrer was urged against the right to recover attorney's fees.

The court overruled the demurrer, except as to attorney's fees, and both plaintiff and defendant excepted to the rulings against them respectively; the plaintiff filing a cross-bill of exceptions.

Pottle & Glessner, for plaintiff in error.
Smith & Miller, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1, 2. The questions made by the main bill of exceptions are so fully and clearly covered by the decision of Judge Russell, speaking for this court, in the case of Sheffield v. Whitfield, 6 Ga. App. 762, 65 S. E. 807, and the decisions there cited, that it would seem superfluous to go over the ground therein covered, or to cite any other authorities. As stated by Mr. Brandt: "All courts recognize the principle that it is necessary to the completion of a contract that the minds of both contracting parties shall meet. The conflict is as to when they have met. They all hold that a mere offer to guaranty, the same as any other offer, is not binding unless accepted. The conflict is as to whether the guarantor must be notified of the acceptance of the guaranty, and whether the writing amounts to an offer to guaranty or to a completed guaranty." 1 Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty (3d Ed.) § 216. As was said by Judge Russell in the Sheffield Case, supra: "An offer may be accepted, either by a promise to do a thing contemplated therein, or by an actual doing of the thing."

In the present case the allegation of the petition is that the goods had actually been sold and furnished to the original debtor by the plaintiff; in other words, the offer was accepted by the plaintiff in the manner contemplated by the guaranty, to wit, the furnishing of goods to the extent of $1,500. The act of furnishing the goods was acceptance of the guaranty, and this made the contract complete as between the guarantor and the guarantee. The guaranty in question covered, not only goods that were to be sold, but goods that had already been sold. It is absolute in its terms, and there could be no stronger or higher acceptance by the plaintiff than by making sales in reliance thereon. As to any future sales that might be made under the guaranty, notice to the guarantor was also expressly waived by its terms. But, as above intimated, we think any extended discussion on the subject is rendered wholly unnecessary by the decision of this court in the Sheffield Case, supra, following the decisions of the Supreme Court, especially in the case of Sanders v. Etcherson, 36 Ga. 405, and Manry v. Waxelbaum, 108 Ga. 14, 33 S. E. 701.

As to the point that the plaintiff had violated the contract of guaranty by extending to the original debtor a credit in excess of the $1,500, and thereby released the guarantor from liability, it is ruled adversely to the contention of the plaintiff in error in the case of Small Co. v. Claxton, 1 Ga. App. 83, 57 S. E. 977. It could not concern the maker that other goods were sold to the debtor, as in no event could his liability exceed the sum of $1,500, the payment of which he had absolutely guaranteed. The limitation is not of the credit of Fain & Weaver, but of the extent of the guarantor's liability. The guarantor will be held liable to the extent of his guaranty, notwithstanding credit may have been given by the guarantee to the debtor greater than the sum named in the guaranty. Manry v. Waxelbaum, 108 Ga. 14, 33 S. E. 701. We are satisfied that the judgment of the trial court in overruling this part of the demurrer should be affirmed.

3, 4. As to the cross-bill of exceptions: A motion was made in this court to dismiss the writ of error as to the cross-bill of exceptions, on the ground that it was premature; that the judgment excepted to was only interlocutory in character; and that, even if a decision had been rendered as claimed by the plaintiff in error in the cross-bill, this would not have been a final disposition of the case, or final as to some material part thereof. We do not think there is any merit in the motion to dismiss. The rule as to the final disposition of a case in the court below, which applies to cases brought to this court by main bill of exceptions, does not apply to questions made by a cross-bill of exceptions, and whenever the case is to be tried again in the court below, it is the duty of this court to decide all questions made by the cross-bill. Civ. Code, §§ 5527, 5535.

We think the court erred in holding in effect that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover 10 per cent. as attorney's fees. The right to attorney's fees upon giving the statutory notice, it seems to us, is expressly promised by the guarantor in his written obligation: "And the said guarantor hereby agrees to pay 10 per cent. in addition to the sum due by said debtor, to cover costs of collection and attorney's fees." In other words, the maker of this guaranty said to the guarantee: "Whatever goods you may sell to Fain & Weaver, of Edison, Ga., debtors, I will pay, up to $1,500; and in addition to the sum which they, Fain & Weaver, may owe you for goods so furnished, whether it be less than $1,500 or up to $1,500, I will also pay 10 per cent. on the amount of that indebtedness as attorney's fees." The contract is not to pay in any event only $1,500, this to exclude attorney's fees, but the contract is to pay, in addition to the $1,500, 10 per cent. on this amount as attorney's fees. We do not see how the contract to pay attorney's fees in this case differs from the stipulations as to attorney's fees in any other written obligation of indebtedness, and we are clear that the only rational construction of the contract on this subject is that the guarantor obligated himself to pay 10 per cent. as attorney's fees, in addition to the amount that he might be called upon to pay under the guaranty, to the limit specified therein.

Judgment on the main bill of exceptions affirmed; on cross-bill, reversed.

BROWDER-MANGET CO. v. EDMONSON.
(No. 2,370.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 14, 1910.
Rehearing Denied July 5, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 128*)—IMPLIED WARRANTIES.

In a lease contract, where there is no stipulation to the contrary, the lessor impliedly warrants that the leased premises shall be open to entry by the lessee at the time fixed for taking possession. But the law does not impose upon the lessor the duty of putting the lessee in possession of the leased premises. It demands only that the possession shall not be withheld when the lessee seeks it under the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 448; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 233*)—ACTION FOR RENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There are inferences fairly deducible from the evidence and from the testimony which the court improperly excluded that uncontroverted would have entitled the plaintiff to recover, and therefore the judgment of nonsuit was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 941, 942; Dec. Dig. § 233.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by the Browder-Manget Company against George R. Edmonson. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The Browder-Manget Company leased from the Georgian Company a storehouse, No. 23 West Alabama street, Atlanta, for a term of 25 months, and the Browder-Manget Company subleased to George R. Edmonson space in the storehouse, 15 by 57 feet, for two years, commencing April 1, 1909, and ending March 31, 1911. The rental was $100 per month for the first year, and $125 per month for the second year, payable in advance. The lease was in writing, dated February 26, 1909, and duly executed. On March 18, 1909, the Browder-Manget Company wrote a letter to Edmonson, notifying him that the Georgian Company would be delayed in vacating the storehouse, and asking him if it would be convenient for him to delay taking possession until April 15th, and stating that if the delay was inconvenient to him they would have the Georgian Company remove and give him possession by April 1st as stated in the contract. In reply to this letter Edmonson on the same day wrote a letter consenting to the delay requested, and saying that he would wait until April 15th for the lease to become effective. It was further shown that the storehouse and basement in question, exclusive of the space which had been rented to Edmonson, was placed by the Browder-Manget Company in the hands of real estate agents for subrenting beginning April 15th, at which time it was expected that the Georgian Company would vacate. It was also shown that the space rented to Edmonson was placed by him in the hands of an agent to sublet. The evidence does not clearly show when Edmonson employed the agent to sublet the space, but it was some time prior to April 15th, when, under the terms of the lease as amended, he was to have possession. Several conversations were also had between Mr. Edmonson and his agents in reference to subletting this space; Mr. Edmonson desiring to sublet it for a "near-beer" saloon, and the landlord and the agent both objecting to this character of tenant.

On April 15th no notice was given by the lessor to the lessee that the rented space was ready for him and that he could take possession thereof, nor did the lessee make any demand on the lessor for possession, or come to the storehouse for the purpose of taking possession. On May 8th the lessor wrote to Edmonson that the space was ready for him. Edmonson, after the receipt of this letter, did not take possession of the premises, unless the placing of a rent card by his agent in the place could be considered as equivalent to possession, and the letter of May 8th, which the lessor had written to him notifying him that he could take possession, was not answered until May 20th, when he wrote the following letter: "In reference to the lease of the store, 23 West Alabama street, beg to say that, owing to the fact that I was unable to obtain possession of the store according to the terms of the lease and the amended lease, and in view of the fact, as you know, I rented the property for other people, and could not give them possession as agreed upon, they had to make other arrangements, annulling agreements they made with me. On May 11th, I stated to you, through your Mr. Wynne, that you had the right to rent the entire building, and that it was subject to your order. * * * Therefore the lease that I made with you I have already treated as void, owing to the fact that the party to whom I rented the place has left the city because I could not deliver the property to him according to the terms of my contract." It was further shown that the property of the Georgian Company, from whom the Browder-Manget Company had rented the store, was until May 8th on the space which had been rented to Edmonson, that this property consisted of a counter and several desks, and that it would require about two hours to remove them from the space. Edmonson never asked that this property be removed from the space.

The plaintiff also offered to prove that the Georgian Company had been informed by the Browder-Manget Company that this space had been sublet to Edmonson, and that their furniture should be removed whenever Edmonson desired the space, and that arrangements had been made with the Georgian Company to remove these articles of furniture whenever Edmonson desired to take possession of the premises which he had subrented from the Browder-Manget Company. The court refused to allow evidence of these facts, and the plaintiff excepted to this ruling. In the letter of May 8th, written by Browder-Manget Company to Edmonson, the following language was used: "The Georgian has vacated that part of their building which we leased to you, and same is ready for occupancy. Please send us your check Monday for two-thirds of the month of May, $68.67, so as to make it due thereafter on the 1st of each succeeding month." Edmonson refused to pay the rent, and suit was brought against him in a justice court for $100 rent under the lease contract from April 15 to May 15, 1909.

The case was appealed to a jury in the superior court, and, after the introduction of the testimony for the plaintiff as above substantially stated, the court awarded a nonsuit, to which the plaintiff excepted.

Saml. D. Hewlett and Nathan Harris, for plaintiff in error. Thos. L. Bishop, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The authorities on the question as to whether it is the duty of the lessor to deliver possession of the leased premises, or whether it is the duty of the lessee to demand possession at the time specified in the lease, are in conflict. The English rule seems to be that the duty is upon the lessor to notify the lessee that the leased premises are ready for his possession; and to "clear the possession" for the lessee. In the case of Coe v. Clay, 5 Bingham, 440, it is held that he who lets agrees to give possession, and if he fails to do so the lessee may recover damages against him. The American courts generally hold that it is the duty of the lessee to take possession of the leased premises when the lease begins, and if possession is wrongfully withheld the lessee may repudiate the contract, and the lessor cannot recover rent, as the date fixed for possession is of the essence of the contract of lease. Gear, Landlord & Tenant, § 163.

We think the conflict between the authorities is more apparent than real, and that the true rule on the subject is that, where the lease contains no stipulation to the contrary, there is an implied covenant on the part of the lessor that the premises shall be open to entry by the lessee at the time fixed by the lease for him to take possession, and if possession is then wrongfully withheld from the lessee he can maintain an appropriate action against the lessor, or can at his option repudiate the contract and bring an action for damages for its breach. 24 Cyc. 1049, and cases cited. In other words, the lessee has the right of entry at the time fixed by the lease for him to take possession, but he must do something towards exercising this right. He must go to the leased premises and see whether they are ready for his possession, and see whether there is any obstacle in the way of his taking possession. He has the right to assume, and to act upon the assumption, that the premises will be ready for him to take possession at the time specified in the lease. If he finds that the leased premises are still in the possession of the lessor, or in the possession of a third person, and he is refused possession, he is not obliged to bring an action to obtain possession of the premises; but he may repudiate the contract and sue the lessor for its breach.

An entry by the lessee, however, is not necessary to give effect to a lease contract. The lease takes effect upon its execution, and while the possession and enjoyment of the leased property is a condition precedent to the right of the lessor to recover the rent, yet, before the lessee can repudiate the contract on the ground that possession and enjoyment are wrongfully withheld from him, he must do something to show that he desires possession. After the execution of the contract he cannot remain wholly inactive in reference to possession and justly claim that he is excluded therefrom by the wrongful act of the lessor.

Apply these general rules to the facts of this case. The time for the lessee to take possession under the lease as amended by consent was April 15th. The lessor had by implication notified him that on that day the premises would be vacated by the Georgian Company and would be ready for him. The lessor was not required to give him notice on April 15th that he could take possession of the leased premises. Any notice then would have been simply the reiteration of information given by the lease. He had the right to assume that he could do so, and it was his duty to go and take possession, and if he saw that the premises were not then ready for his possession he should have called the attention of the lessor to the matter and demanded of him that possession be given. If he had gone on April 15th to take possession of the rented premises, he would have found the property of the Georgian Company occupying the space which had been rented to him. If the property was of such character as could be readily removed, and inlicated a mere casual and temporary occupancy, it would have been his duty to request his lessor to have the property removed. He did not do this. He made no request that the property of the Georgian Company be removed from the space which was leased to him. He did not even object to its being there, or call the attention of the lessor to the fact that it was occupying his space, and he could not have repudiated his contract, unless it was apparent that the lessor or some one else intended to exclude him from the possession, or that the occupancy of the leased premises was of such a character as to justify the conclusion that possession was wrongfully withheld.

The occupancy by the Georgian Company of the space rented by him was equivocal in character. It was subject to explanation, and if it was shown, as above intimated, that this furniture could have been readily and speedily removed, and interposed no serious obstacle to possession, and was not intended as an impediment, he could not set up the fact that it was occupying the space rented by him as a reason of sufficient materiality or gravity to justify him in repudiating his contract. We do not think the court, under the facts of this case, was warranted in holding as matter of law that possession was wrongfully withheld by the lessor or by the Georgian Company from the lessee, and that, therefore, he was entitled to repudiate his contract; but this question should have been submitted to the jury.

1. COURTS (§ 163*)—JURISDICTION—"RESPECTING TITLES TO LAND."

A suit to recover damages for trespass to land is not one "respecting titles to land," within the meaning of the Constitution, conferring upon the superior court exclusive jurisdiction of suits "respecting titles to land," although the title to the land in question may be incidentally or collaterally involved.

Error from City Court of La Grange; Frank Harwell, Judge.

Action by W. B. Higginbotham against W. C. Batson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

B. H. Hill and A. H. Thompson, for plaintiffs in error. Hatton Lovejoy and E. T. Moon, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Mrs. Higginbotham brought suit against W. C. Batson and three others in the city court of La Grange to recover damages for trespass to her real estate. She sued for $1,000 as general damages and $500 as punitive damages, and the jury gave her a verdict for $350 as general damages and $180 as punitive damages against W. C. Batson and one of the other defendants, W. H. Huguley; a nonsuit having been granted as to the other two defendants. A motion for a new trial was made by the two defendants, which was overruled, and they excepted. Defendants filed also a demurrer to the petition, on the ground that the city court of La Grange was without jurisdiction, as the suit was one respecting title to land, of which the superior court of the county had exclusive jurisdiction by the Constitution of the state. The court overruled the demurrer and exceptions pendente lite were filed.

The suit arose on the following facts, briefly stated: Plaintiff alleged that she held title to a described lot of land in the city of West Point, Ga., and that she had been in the quiet, peaceable, and uninterrupted possession of this land, under a fee-simple title, for a period of more than 30 years, having it inclosed by a fence for that length of time; that on September 11, 1908, it was entirely inclosed by a wire fence; that on that date the defendants went to it in person, with a force of hands, and instructed them to tear down the plaintiff's fence around the lot and take possession of a strip of the lot, 24 feet in width and 173 feet in length, for the purpose of opening a street or alley, and in pursuance of these directions and instructions they did tear down the fence, took possession of this strip of land from the lot, leveled it off, and converted it into a street or alley of the city. She alleges that these acts were without her consent, and constituted a willful and malicious trespass.

The defense relied upon was that the land

In question was not the property of the plaintiff, and was not in her lawful possession; that it was a street or alley of the town of West Point, and had been used as a street or alley for many years; that the plaintiff, without authority, had taken possession of this street or alley, and had placed a fence around it; that the city council, of which the defendants were members, composing the street committee of the council, had directed them to have the fence removed, as an obstruction to the public street or alley of the city; and that they had removed the fence and opened up the street or alley in pursuance of their authority as members of the street committee of the council, and in obedience to instructions given to them by the mayor and council of the city of West Point. There was no evidence as to the value of the strip of land in question, either before or after the alleged acts of trespass. It was shown that the value of the wire fence taken down, with the cost of restoring the same, was about $12.

The view that we entertain of this case makes it unnecessary to decide many of the numerous assignments of error raised by the record, and we will confine ourselves to a decision of the question of jurisdiction, made by the demurrer to the petition, and of the question as to the character of damages recoverable under the facts and the law applicable thereto.

1. The suit is not one "respecting titles to land." The title to the land was not necessarily involved; but, if involved, it was only incidental or collateral to the main issue. The suit was brought to recover damages for trespass to real estate. In the case of Smith v. Bryan, 34 Ga. 53, it is said that "cases respecting title to land, in the intendment of the Constitution, are cases in which the plaintiff asserts his title to the land in question, and depends for a recovery upon his maintenance of it, or to supply a link in the chain, wanting by reason of accident or other cause." The plaintiff specifically alleges in her petition that she is not suing to recover the land, or any mesne profits thereof; but her suit is for damages resulting from a trespass to the real estate and injury to the possession. This question has been repeatedly ruled by the Supreme Court, and the court was right in overruling the demurrer to the petition. Black v. Fritz, 98 Ga. 32, 25 S. E. 188; Robins v. McGehee, 127 Ga. 436, 56 S. E. 461; Bivins v. Bivins, 37 Ga. 347; Moore v. O'Barr, 87 Ga. 205, 13 S. E. 464.

2. There is much conflict in the evidence on the issue as to whether the title to and possession of the strip of land in question was in the plaintiff, or whether it had been used by the city as a public street or alley. But this question has been settled by the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff, and any discussion of the evidence on this issue would be profitless. Irrespective of this question, it may be conceded that the defendants, as officials of the city had no right arbitrarily and summarily to take possession of the strip of land in question and to remove therefrom the fence which the plaintiff had put around it. The law provides for an orderly procedure appropriate to such matters, and municipalities, as well as individuals, must adopt this procedure, and not assert their rights, even if they have any, vi et armis. If in fact one or more of the defendants were guilty of the wrongs complained of, the plaintiff, as the owner of the premises described in her petition (and the jury, under the evidence, found that she was the owner), was entitled to recover damages as compensation for the injury done. If special damages resulted from the tortious act, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover this class of damages, if she alleged and proved them.

General damages may be recovered without proof of any amount. Civ. Code, § 3910. This does not mean that the jury, in giving general damages for a tortious act, shall be permitted to act arbitrarily in the matter, and find any amount; but they must observe the cardinal rule of law, which is that damages are given only as compensation for the injury done. "If the injury be small, or the mitigating circumstances be strong, nominal damages only are given." Civ. Code, § 3905. In the case now under consideration there was no evidence of any actual injury to the land, or any diminution in value by reason of the trespass. The only actual injury shown by the evidence was the cost of restoring the fence which the defendants had removed from around the property. The property still belonged to the plaintiff. Neither her title nor her right to possession of the property was in the slightest affected by the tortious acts complained of, and there is nothing to prevent her from retaking possession, with or without legal procedure. She has a right to recover general damages, even without proof of any amount of injury; but, unless she proves some actual injury, or if the injury be small, these general damages should be only nominal in amount. As said by the Supreme Court in Swift v. Broyles, 115 Ga. 885, 42 S. E. 277, 58 L. R. A. 390: "Proof of a tortious invasion of one's property rights cannot, unless supplemented by evidence disclosing the extent of the loss thereby inflicted upon the injured party, afford a basis for the recovery by him of more than nominal damages." One whose property rights have been invaded by a tortious act can, without proof of any amount of damage, recover a nominal amount for the purpose of vindicating his right. If he seeks to recover more than this nominal amount as general damages, he must show by evidence some actual injury.

Now, in this case, as has been stated, the only actual injury shown is the cost of restoring the fence. A verdict for $350 general damages as compensation for this injury would, under the law, be excessive. Under the facts and the law applicable thereto, this is a case for the recovery of nominal damages, as the jury believed that there had been an illegal invasion of property rights, although the actual damage resulting therefrom was insignificant. What would be the proper amount as nominal damages is not a question for this court, but is a question for the jury under all the facts and circumstances of the case, bearing in mind the definition given by the Supreme Court of what is meant by nominal damages—"some small amount sufficient to cover and carry the costs." Ransone v. Christian, 58 Ga. 351 (6).

What we have said applies only to the question of damages compensatory in character. "In every tort there may be aggravating circumstances, either in the act or the intention, and in that event the jury may find additional damages either to deter the wrongdoer, or as compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff." Civil Code of 1895, § 3906. This character of damage is called "punitive," and, if aggravating circumstances are proved, may be given, even where the actual injury is small. It is always exclusively a question for the jury to determine when such additional damages should be allowed, as well as the amount of such damages. The jury in this case found punitive damages in addition to general damages, and it is earnestly insisted that there was no evidence authorizing a finding of punitive damages. As there will be another trial, we do not care to consider and decide that question. We leave it for the determination of the jury, under the evidence that may be submitted on the subject at the second trial.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 784*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Where, on a trial for carrying a concealed weapon, witnesses swore that defendant had a pistol, and that for a portion of the time it was so concealed that they could not see it, and defendant testified that he had no pistol, an instruction on circumstantial evidence was properly refused.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Elles, Judge.

Fred Bailey was convicted of carrying a concealed pistol, and brings error. Affirmed.

C. B. Rosser, Jr., for plaintiff in error. C. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., D. K. Johnston, and Lowry Arnold, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Bailey was convicted in the criminal court of Atlanta of carrying a pistol concealed. He sued out a certiorari in the superior court of Fulton county, which was overruled. There are six assignments of error in the petition for certiorari.

The first is that the verdict of the jury is contrary to law, contrary to the evidence, decidedly and strongly against the greater weight of the evidence, and without evidence to support it. Except as involving the consideration of the evidence, the assignment that the verdict is contrary to law is not sufficiently specific to present for our consideration any error of law which may have been prejudicial to the plaintiff in error. After considering the evidence in the case, it is plain that the testimony amply supports the conviction of the defendant; for several witnesses testified that they saw the defendant approaching his store with a pistol, and that he concealed the pistol in his pocket until he was almost immediately in their presence, when he took it from his pocket and handed it to a negro woman. We cannot concur in the argument of the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error that this testimony is intrinsically so improbable and unreasonable as that the jury should have classed it with such statements as that "a cow jumped over the capitol," or "a jack rabbit whipped an English bulldog." The acts of the defendant, in connection with the pistol, as stated by the witnesses, were possible. The probability or actual fact of the occurrence was for the determination of the jury.

In the second assignment of error it is alleged that the court intimated an opinion that the defendant had a pistol at the time in question; and it was argued that the ruling in Jenkins v. State, 2 Ga. App. 626, 58 S. E. 1063, is directly in point and requires a reversal. So far from the trial judge intimating the opinion that the defendant had a pistol, and that the only question was whether or not he had it concealed, the charge in the record appears to be to the contrary. The court told the jury explicitly that "the defendant sets up the plea, not that he had the pistol openly and exposed to view, but that he did not have it at all."

The third exception is that the evidence required a charge on the law of circumstantial evidence. The evidence introduced by the state was all direct. The witnesses swore that the defendant had a pistol, and that for a portion of the time it was so concealed that they could not see it. The testimony of the defendant was to the effect that he had no pistol. In such a case, as we held in Bivins v. State, 5 Ga. App. 434, 63 S. E. 523, the judge should not have charged upon the subject of circumstantial evidence.

The fourth and fifth exceptions to the charge of the court are eliminated by the answer of the trial judge.

The sixth is not sufficiently specific to point out any error.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 881*)—REVIEW—CONSTRUCTION OF VERDICT.

A verdict is to be given a reasonable intendment, and, when ambiguous, may be construed in the light of the issues actually submitted to the jury under the charge of the court; and if, when so construed, it expresses with reasonable certainty a finding supported by the evidence, it is to be upheld as legal.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 878*)—VERDICT—CONSTRUCTION.

An accusation contained four counts not numbered. The second and third counts were abandoned, and the jury informed that no testimony would be submitted under them. The court charged on the remaining two counts, and a verdict was returned as follows: "We, the jury, find the defendant * * * guilty on the second count." Held, that "second count," as used in the verdict, referred to the second count submitted.

Russell, J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Andrew Barbour was convicted of violating the liquor law, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Robt. L. Colding, for plaintiff in error. W. O. Hartridge, Sol. Gen., for the State.

POWELL, J. The accusation contained four counts. The first charged the sale of liquor; the second, the giving away of liquor to induce trade; the third, the keeping and furnishing of liquor at a public place; the fourth, the keeping on hand of liquor at the defendant's place of business. These counts, though set out in separate paragraphs, were not numbered. On the trial, and before the introduction of any of the testimony, state's counsel abandoned the second and third counts as they are set out above, and the jury was informed that no testimony would be submitted under these counts. The court, in his instruction to the jury, told them that the state had abandoned the charges as to giving away liquor, and as to keeping it at a public place, and further instructed them that only two counts of the accusation remained in issue before them—the one charging the sale, the other the keeping on hand at the defendant's place of business. The judge did not refer to these various counts by numbers, but by subject-matter. However, in instructing the jury as to the charges in issue before them, he always spoke first of the count charging the sale, and then of the count charging the keeping on hand. The verdict was in the following form: "We, the jury, find the defendant, Andrew Barbour, guilty on the second count." Primarily, such a verdict would be construed as finding the defendant guilty of the offense charged in the count of the accusation which came second in order as originally set out. If the counts had been actually numbered, this would probably have been the only fair construction. But as the counts were not numbered, and as the count which came second in order in the accusation as drawn had been formally abandoned by state's counsel, and as the jurors did not have this count before them for consideration, the expression "Second count," as used in the verdict, manifestly referred to the second count that was submitted to them by the judge. A verdict is to be given reasonable intendment, and, when ambiguous, may be construed in the light of the issues actually submitted to the jury under the charge of the court; and if, when so construed, it expresses with reasonable certainty a finding supported by the evidence, it is to be upheld as legal. Error from Superior Court, Emanuel County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by Mrs. M. C. Stephens against W. J. McNaughton. A justice's judgment for plaintiff was reversed on certiorari, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Williams & Bradley, for plaintiff in error.
Saffold & Larsen, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Mrs. Stephens caused a distress warrant to be issued against McNaughton. He replevied. To an adverse verdict in the justice's court the defendant brought certiorari. No complaint was made that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. The petition in certiorari contained only two specific assignments of error: (1) That the court erred in not dismissing the levy for insufficiency of description; and (2) that the justice of the peace, over objection of the defendant, put upon him an illegally impaneled jury and forced him to trial. The judge of the superior court sustained the certiorari and ordered a new trial in the justice's court, and to this ruling plaintiff excepts. There being in the certiorari no assignment of error that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, the first grant of a new trial by the judge of the superior court is reviewable, and stands without the aid of any presumption dependent upon the breadth of judicial discretion. The case must stand or fall upon the legal sufficiency of the two assignments made. When the defendant in distress warrant replevies the property, the levy becomes functus, and the proceeding is converted into an ordinary action for rent, with the bond standing as security in the event of a judgment for the plaintiff. At the trial of the issue thus raised, a motion to dismiss the levy will not lie, for the very plain reason that the levy has already become functus.

2. The real point in the case is as to the method of selecting the jury. A jury was drawn and served for the regular court day, which was February 8th, but the case was not tried on that day, as by consent of the parties it was continued until February 13th; and the court was adjourned until that date. Of the jurors regularly drawn and summoned to attend on February 8th, only three responded on that day, and two of these, being related to the parties in the case, were excused from further attendance. It seems that each of the parties to the suit had a great many relatives in the district. Seeing that on this account it would be difficult to get a qualified jury, the justice of the peace retained on the panel the single qualified juror who had responded, and directed the constable to summon talesmen to fill the panel. He also took the list of jurors for the district, and went through it, and ascertained that, of the jurors whose names were on this list, there were only 16 who were qualified, the rest of them being related to one or the other of the parties. He gave this list of 16 to the constable, and told him to summon them to be present on the 13th, the day to which the case had been continued. On the 13th only nine qualified jurors responded, and, this being the exact number required by law for the panel in a justice court, the justice of the peace ordered that they be impaneled, and caused the parties to strike from the list thus made up. There is no suggestion that there was any irregularity so far as the original drawing of the jury was concerned. Indeed, it is stated in the record that 9 men were regularly drawn and summoned to be present on February 8th, the day on which the court met. Section 4143 of the Civil Code of 1895 provides that if there should be a deficiency of jurors at the trial in a justice's court, "from cause or absence," the constable, by direction of the court, shall complete the jury by talesmen. It is undoubtedly regular that the justice of the peace should not in advance tell the constable what particular persons to summon, the discretion in this respect being vested in the constable, and not in the justice of the peace. However, it is not improper that the justice of the peace should exhibit to the constable the list of the jurors of the district, or that he should tell him not to summon disqualified jurors. When the justice gave the list of 16 men to the constable, he had no right to tell him which 8 of these 16 he should summon in order to fill the panel. But as he did not choose among them, but told the constable to summon all of them, and as the constable did summon all of them, and only 8 attended, so that the panel was thus exactly filled, it is plain that no injustice resulted to either party; for if the constable had served only 8 originally, and some of these had not attended, it would have been his duty to keep serving others of the qualified jurors of the district until he did complete his panel, so that it should number 9. In other words, the court seems to have reached indirectly the same result that would have been reached directly, and to have reached it by a perfectly fair method that worked no harm to either party. The doctrine that there must be injury as well as error to authorize the grant of a new trial applies with special force to these small cases tried in justice's courts. The judge of the superior court should not have granted a new trial on certiorari.

Judgment reversed.

HILL, C. J. Judgment affirmed.

(8 Ga. App. 28)

WILBURN v. STATE.
(No. 2,492.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 5, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 223*)—OFFENSES—PROSECUTIONS—ALLEGATIONS AND PROOF.

The verdict was supported by the evidence. Nor was there a fatal or even a material variance between the allegations of the indictment and the proof. Proof of the sale of corn liquor is sufficient to support an allegation that the defendant unlawfully sold alcoholic, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 265, 271; Dec. Dig. § 223.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§§ 223, 224*)—ILLEGAL SALE—PROSECUTING—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—"LIQUOR"—"CORN LIQUOR."

The word "liquor" is collective, and its significance includes the plural as well as the singular. A conviction may be supported by proof of the sale of liquor which is either alcoholic, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating in its quality, without proof of the fact that it possesses more than one of these qualities. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, "corn liquor" will be presumed to be an intoxicating liquor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 265, 271, 275; Dec. Dig. §§ 223, 224.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4180-4182.]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 223*)—ILLEGAL SALE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

While it is true that where the sale of intoxicating liquor is alleged to have been made by an individual, the proof must correspond in this respect with the allegation, nevertheless evidence that another person furnished part of the money with which the intoxicating liquor in this case was paid for did not create any variance between the allegation and the proof; for the reason that the jury were authorized to infer that if any money was furnished by a person other than the alleged buyer, it might have been a loan of money; and for the further reason that there was no evidence tending to show that the seller had any knowledge of the participation of any other person than the alleged buyer, or that any other than he participated in the actual purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. § 223.*]

Error from City Court of Monticello; A. S. Thurman, Judge.

Alice Wilburn was convicted of selling intoxicants, and she brings error. Affirmed.

Eugene M. Baynes, for plaintiff in error. Greene F. Johnson, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant in the court below was convicted of the offense of misdemeanor. In the presentment it was charged that she had sold and bartered, for valuable consideration, alcoholic, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquor to Croff Brewer. The sale was alleged to have taken place on the 15th of December, 1908, and the presentment was returned to the August term, 1909, of the Jasper superior court. The case was transferred to the city court of Monticello for trial; and it is insisted that the judge of the city court erred in overruling the motion for new trial. Special assignments of error complain that the court erred in stating to the jury the contentions of the state, in that he did not limit the time to which the evidence of the alleged sale should be confined nor limit the inquiry to the person to whom the liquor was sold, and particularly that the instructions of the judge made it appear to the jury that the indictment charged the sale of different kinds of liquors, whereas the indictment charges the sale of only one kind of liquor, to wit, alcoholic, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquor. Exception is also taken to the charge of the judge upon the subject of reasonable doubt, wherein the judge told the jury that "a reasonable doubt is just what the words themselves mean—a reasonable doubt—a doubt that grows out of the testimony or out of the want of testimony." It was contended that this was error because doubt might arise, not merely from testimony or the want of testimony, but from the defendant's statement, which the judge failed to refer to, and that what the judge said upon the subject limited sections 986, 987, of the Penal Code of 1895 to the prejudice of the defendant. It is also insisted that the court erred in charging that the jury would be authorized to convict in case they should find and believe that the defendant sold any of the liquors named in the indictment. There is no merit in the exceptions to the charge upon reasonable doubt. The succinct definition given by the trial judge was much less apt to confuse the jury than a labored attempt to elaborate a term which is more easily understood when considered from the standpoint of its ordinary significance in the everyday affairs of life.

Treating all the other exceptions together, they really raise but two points for our consideration, or, rather, the single point that there was a fatal variance between the allegation of the presentment and the proof submitted in its support, and that this variance existed as to two material matters necessary to be established. It is contended that the instructions to which exceptions are taken were not authorized, because not in harmony with the evidence, when considered with a view to its applicability to the presentment. For instance, it is insisted that the verdict is contrary to evidence, and also that the judge erred in charging the jury that if they found any of the liquors were sold to Croff Brewer, as alleged in the indictment, the jury would be authorized to convict, and that the evidence shows that the sale was not made to Croff Brewer alone, as alleged in the presentment, but to Croff Brewer jointly with Phenie Benton. Upon this subject it is only necessary to say that the record shows that Phenie Benton testified that she never bought any intoxicating liquor from the defendant, and Croff Brewer testified that he purchased the liquor in question, and that he himself handed over the money with which to pay for it. It is true he also testified that Phenie helped him to pay for it, he contributing 25 cents and Phenie 10 cents, but he does not testify that Phenie participated in the purchase. Though Phenie may have loaned him 10 cents of the money, or may have contributed 10 cents to the purchase price, this does not prevent Croff Brewer from being the sole purchaser. So far as the defendant is concerned, the sale was made by the defendant to Croff Brewer without any knowledge of Phenie Benton's interest in the matter. Certainly there is no evidence tending to show that Phenie did more than furnish a part of the money, and none to show that she personally participated in the direct purchase. It is insisted that there is a fatal variance between the allegation of the presentment and the proof, in that the only evidence tending to show that the liquor purchased was alcoholic, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating was that of the state's witness, who testified that he bought corn liquor from the defendant. We think that this was sufficient, in the absence of anything to the contrary, to authorize the inference on the part of the jury that the liquor sold was corn whisky and intoxicating. Considering the nature of the case being tried, as well as the ordinary acceptance of the term "corn liquor," it would hardly be reasonable to assume that the jury could have inferred that the witness meant anything else than corn whisky when he stated he bought "corn liquor." In Carswell v. State, 7 Ga. App. 198, 66 S. E. 488, this court held that the testimony of the witness to the effect that he bought "liquor" from the defendant was sufficient to authorize the inference, in the absence of any testimony to the contrary, that the liquor in question was intoxicating, and in the present case, while recognizing the fact that the word "liquor" has a generic as well as a specific meaning, we are compelled to hold that as there is nothing to show that the liquor alleged to have been sold was blood or buttermilk, or other nonintoxicating liquid, the stating of the case was such as to attach to the word "liquor" its specific meaning, and in this sense it refers only to intoxicants. It was insisted that inasmuch as the accusation alleged the sale of "liquor," instead of "liquors," the charge could only refer to one kind of liquor, and, therefore, that the conviction was not authorized, unless the proof showed that the liquor sold possessed all of the qualities ascribed to it in the presentment; that is, that it must have appeared that the liquor sold was alcoholic, and also that it was spirituous, and malt, and intoxicating. If the word "liquor" could only refer to a single liquid, the point might be well taken. But it must be borne in mind that the word "liquor" is collective in its significance, and may include in its broader meaning any number of liquids. It includes the plural as well as the singular, and, for that reason, to charge that one has sold alcoholic, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquor is to charge that he has sold "liquor" of each of these kinds. If we are correct in this view, then, under the ruling in Eaves v. State, 113 Ga. 749, 39 S. E. 318, and Hubbard v. State, 123 Ga. 17, 51 S. E. 11, proof of the sale of liquor of any one of the kinds described would be sufficient to authorize the conviction. It certainly cannot be said that if the indictment had charged that the defendant sold an intoxicating "liquor," the indictment would be defective; for the Code requires that the statute shall be so interpreted as that the singular shall include the plural, and vice versa. And though the word "liquors" is employed in the general prohibition law of 1907, certainly an indictment cannot be held to be defective which charges the sale of a certain intoxicating liquor as such (using the singular number in the charge), instead of using the exact phraseology of the statute. If an indictment charging that the defendant sold an intoxicating liquor would be good, and would be supported by proof that the defendant sold corn liquor, then, under the ruling in the Eaves and Hubbard Cases, supra, in a case in which the defendant was charged with the sale of alcoholic liquor, and spirituous liquor, and malt liquor, and intoxicating liquor, proof of the sale of any one of these liquors would authorize a conviction.

Judgment affirmed.

JOSEPH GOLDSMITH & CO. v. M. MARCUS & BRO. (No. 2,047.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 5, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 410*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—WRITTEN CONTRACT.

While a written instrument, although not signed, will, if orally assented to by the parties, constitute the agreement, and its terms not be subject to be varied by parol evidence, still, to dispense with the signature of the party sought to be charged thereby, it must first be made to appear that the terms of the writing were understood and assented to as containing all of the stipulations of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1846-1854; Dec. Dig. § 410.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 410*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—UNSIGNED WRITTEN AGREEMENT.

The evidence in the present case authorized the conclusion that the defendant did not assent to the contract as written. In a case in which there is conflict as to whether an unsigned writing truly represents the agreement of the parties, parol evidence as to the terms and conditions of the alleged contract is properly admissible and may be considered, if it is found that the writing was not in fact assented to by one of them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1846-1854; Dec. Dig. § 410.*]

3. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The evidence authorized the verdict rendered, and the assignments of error which were not abandoned on the argument were not of sufficient materiality to authorize the grant of a new trial.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; A. M. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by Joseph Goldsmith & Co. against M. Marcus & Bro. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Smith, Hastings & Ransom, for plaintiffs in error. Walter W. Visanska, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiffs in error brought a suit upon an open account against the defendants in error. The defendants admitted the purchase of the bill of goods sued on, but pleaded that the goods were bought under special parol contract, made with the plaintiffs at the time of the purchase; that they were bought by sample, upon the positive assurance of the seller that the goods to be shipped were to correspond with the samples; that the clothing in question was sold and purchased in separate lots, and that it was verbally agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants that the defendants would have the right to retain all goods that came up to sample, and return those which did not come up to sample, provided they were returned in unbroken lots; that upon receipt of the goods certain lots were found not to come up to the samples; that in compliance with the agreement the defendants immediately returned to the plaintiffs, in unbroken lots, those that did not come up to the samples; and that the lots that did come up to the samples were retained by the defendants, and the amount due upon the lots so retained was tendered to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs admitted the return of goods as claimed by the defendants, in unbroken lots, and the tender of payment for the lots retained by the defendants, but denied that any such contract as that insisted upon by the defendants was made, insisting that the memorandum of the order taken by their salesman contained all of the agreements or undertakings of both parties.

The decision in the case really turns upon whether the memorandum order written by the salesman of Goldsmith & Co., the plaintiffs, should have been treated as a written contract, the terms of which would not be subject to be varied by parol evidence, although it was not signed by the defendants, who were sought to be charged thereby. The gravest exception among the numerous assignments of error in this case is that the judge erred in admitting parol evidence which was contradictory to the terms set out in the order prepared by Goldsmith's salesman. We think the judge ruled correctly. It is, of course, true that if the conduct of the parties shows that a particular writing was expressly adopted as their contract signature thereto becomes unnecessary, for signature is merely evidence of assent. This rule is thus expressed by Wigmore: "If a single document is finally drawn up to replace them [the prior negotiations] and to embody their net effect, and is signed or otherwise adopted by the parties, this document will now alone represent the terms of the act." 4 Wigmore on Evidence, 3409.

The doctrine that a signature is not essential to bring a contract within the parol-evidence rule is also stated in 17 Cyc. and in 21 American and English Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 1119. In Farmer v. Gregory & Stagg, 78 Ky. 475, the specific question was passed upon, and it was ruled that an unsigned contract which had been adopted by the parties could not be varied by parol testimony; and this case was cited with approval in Cohen v. Jackobice, 101 Mich. 409, 59 N. W. 665, and there are few other cases in which the same ruling has been made. In both of these cases, however, there was no dispute as to the fact that both parties expressly agreed to the terms of the unsigned writing and treated it as the embodiment in writing of the conclusion of their negotiations. In the present case, however, it is not admitted that the parties agreed to the terms of the order, and certainly not admitted that the memorandum contained all of the material agreements, stipulations and conditions of the contract of purchase. It does not bear on its face evidence that there were no other conditions which were not reduced to writing, such as are adverted to in the case of Imperial Portrait Co. v. Bryan, 111 Ga. 99, 36 S. E. 291. As appears from the record, the copy handed to the defendants is not identical with the original, as produced by the plaintiffs.

For these reasons the trial judge was confronted with a case in which it was his duty first to pass upon the admissibility of the writing as evidence of the contract between the parties. Instead of admitting it as a contract, the effect of his rulings was to hold primarily (we think, correctly) that the paper in question was a mere sales memorandum taken down by the seller for his own convenience to which the buyer was no party. This placed upon the plaintiffs the burden of proving by parol that the defendants assented to the terms of the contract, and likewise permitted the defendants to deny that they assented. Under the ruling in Delaware Insurance Co. v. Penna. Insurance Co., 126 Ga. 389, 55 S. E. 330, it is doubtful whether a paper which has not been signed by either party interested in the subject-matter can be held, in this state, to be such a writing as cannot be explained or varied by parol. But even under the rule stated by Chief Justice Simmons in Kidd v. Huff, 105 Ga. 209, 31 S. E. 430, the trial judge was not required to exclude parol evidence as to the terms and conditions of the present contract of purchase when it had not been shown that the terms of the writing were assented to by Marcus & Bro. "A written instrument, although not signed, will, if orally assented to by the parties, constitute the agreement. Such instrument, however, will not be admissible in evidence until it is shown prima facie that the terms were assented to." Kidd v. Huff, supra. The execution of a writing which has been signed must, except in certain instances, be proved; and proof of the signature supplies proof of assent to the terms of the instrument. Certainly proof of assent to a writing by which it is sought to bind one who has not even signed it, should be express and manifest. If, in the present case, the trial judge had been satisfied, from the proof, that the writing submitted by the plaintiffs was expressly assented to by the defendants, as containing all of the terms of the contract, we might, perhaps, not be prepared to rule that he erred, but it is very plain, from the subsequent rulings of the judge, as well as from his charge, that he was not satisfied that the defendants assented to the written order, which they had not signed; and we concur with him in this opinion. In any case where it is insisted that a writing which is not signed by the parties sought to be charged thereby does not embody the contract, and that it does not contain the stipulations and mutual agreements of the parties, it would seem to be the correct rule to allow the jury to pass upon the issue, as the judge did in the present case.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 148*)—APPEAL—JUDGMENT BY CONFESSION.

In cases in a justice's court where an appeal will lie, the appeal can be made from a confession of judgment without any formal entering up of judgment by the justice on the confession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 502; Dec. Dig. § 148.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by Whitner, Manry & Co. against W. E. Huff. An appeal from a justice court judgment for plaintiff was dismissed, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson and E. D. Thomas, for plaintiff in error. J. Caleb Clarke, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was an appeal from a confession of judgment in a justice's court. The judge of the superior court sustained a motion to dismiss the appeal, because it did not affirmatively appear that the appeal was entered within four days from the confession of judgment by the defendant, and this judgment of dismissal constitutes the only error assigned. The appeal was from the following confession of judgment: "Whitner, Manry & Co. v. W. E. Huff. No. 19935, Fulton Superior Court. Suit on account in J. P. Court, 1362 district G. M. Amount, $52.50. Comes now the defendant in the above-stated case, and, in pursuance to § 5361 of the Code of 1895, enters this his confession of judgment, and, as provided in said section, enters this his appeal to a jury in the superior court, and, being dissatisfied with said judgment, and having paid all the costs which have accrued in the case up to the time of entering this appeal, and within the time allowed by law, enters this his appeal to a jury in the superior court. And the said W. E. Huff, as principal, and J. D. Sisson, as security, hereby acknowledge themselves bound unto the appellee herein for the eventual condemnation money in said cause. Witness our hands and seals this 6th day of November, 1909. [Signed] W. E. Huff, Principal. J. D. Sisson, Security, J. N. Langston, J. P. Approved and filed, 11/6/09." "Now comes the defendant, after paying cost and making bond, appeals to jury in superior court. Appeal entered. Nov. 6. 1909. J. N. Langston, J. P."

Section 5361, supra, provides that either party has the right to confess a judgment without the consent of his adversary, and to appeal from such confession without reserving the right so to do, in cases where an appeal is allowed by law. It is manifest from the date of the confession of judgment and the date of the appeal from such confession that both the confession of judgment and the appeal were entered the same day. But it is insisted that this confession of judgment is not a judgment of the court, from which an appeal could have been entered. The statute above quoted expressly provides that an appeal can be entered from a confession of judgment. There is no law requiring a justice to enter up a formal judgment on a confession of judgment before the right of appeal would accrue. In fact it is well settled that an appeal by consent may be entered without any judgment whatever and this is the general practice. We therefore conclude that the judge of the superior court erred in dismissing the appeal on the ground that it was insufficient in law. We think the confession of judgment and the appeal set forth are in exact compliance with the statute. See, also, sections 4138, 4453.

Judgment reversed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Berkeley County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

Action by W. M. Dennis against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Plaintiff had judgment in a magistrate's court which was affirmed on appeal to the circuit court, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Octavus Cohen, for appellant. E. J. Dennis, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. This action was begun before a magistrate in Berkeley county to recover of defendant damages for the negligent killing of a cow by an engine of the defendant in Charleston county. Defendant appeared and contested the case upon its merits, and, so far as appears, raised no question as to the jurisdiction of the magistrate.

On appeal to the circuit court exception was taken that the magistrate was without jurisdiction, the cause of action arising in Charleston county, and the magistrate of Berkeley county had no power to compel the attendance of witnesses from such county. This contention was overruled by the circuit court and the judgment of the magistrate was affirmed, because the railroad line of defendant lies through Berkeley county and defendant maintains an agent and transacts its business in Berkeley county.

Appellant's exception to this judgment is without merit:

First. Because magistrates have jurisdiction of an action for damages for injury to rights pertaining to the person, or the personal or real property, if the damages claimed do not exceed $100. Section 71, subd. 2, Civ. Code Proc., pursuant to article 5, § 21, of the Constitution. This necessarily involves suits against corporations. If the defendant is a domestic corporation the suit may be brought in any county where it maintains an agent and transacts its corporate business. Tobin v. Railroad, 47 S. C. 387, 25 S. E. 283, 58 Am. St. Rep. 890; McGrath v. Insurance Co., 74 S. C. 69, 54 S. E. 218; Nixon & Danforth v. Insurance Co., 74 S. C. 440, 54 S. E. 657. Magistrates may have jurisdiction even in a suit against a foreign corporation. Best v. Railway, 72 S. C. 497, 52 S. E. 223, and in such cases the plaintiff may elect in which county to sue under section 146 of the Code of Procedure. The methods proper to secure testimony of witnesses in magistrate's court cannot be the test of jurisdiction.

Second. The question of jurisdiction relates to the person, which is waived by general appearance and contest on the merits, as in this case. Jenkins v. Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co., 84 S. C. 348, 66 S. E. 409.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

HYDRICK, J., did not hear this case.

KELLY et al. v. TINER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 28, 1910.)

INJUNCTION (§ 175*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—MOTION TO DISSOLVE.

Where a temporary injunction has been granted without notice, it is error to refuse to entertain a motion to dissolve, based on the answer of the defendant and his proposed affidavits; but they should be considered in determining whether the injunction was reasonably essential for the protection of defendant's rights pending the litigation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. § 388; Dec. Dig. § 175.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Darlington County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Suit by Elias Kelly and another against John Tiner. From an order refusing to dissolve a temporary injunction, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Miller & Lawson, for appellant. McLaughlin & Tatum, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve a temporary injunction. The question raised by the exceptions, upon which the others are dependent, is whether his honor, the circuit judge, erred in ruling, that, under the case of Cudd v. Calvert, 54 S. C. 457, 32 S. E. 503, he was without authority to entertain the motion to dissolve the injunction.

In the case of Cudd v. Calvert, 54 S. C. 457, 32 S. E. 503, upon which the circuit judge based his ruling, the court uses this language: "It seems to us that where, as in this case, the action is brought solely for the purpose of obtaining an injunction, and where, if the facts alleged in the complaint are found to be true, a proper case for injunction would be presented, it is error to dissolve a temporary injunction upon a mere motion, heard upon affidavits, as that would deprive the plaintiff of his legal right to have the facts determined in the manner provided by law, instead of by affidavits—a most unsatisfactory mode of eliciting the truth." Section 246 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 is as follows: "If the injunction be granted by the court, or a judge thereof, without notice, the defendant, at any time before the trial, may apply upon notice to the court, or a judge thereof, in which the action is brought, to vacate or modify the same. The application may be made upon the complaint and the affidavits, on which injunction was granted, or upon affidavits upon the part of the defendant, with or without the answer."

The rule is thus stated in Marion Company v. Tilghman Company, 75 S. C. 220, 55 S. E. 337, and affirmed in Boyd v. Trexler, 84 S. C. 51, 65 S. E. 936: "When the sole purpose of an action is for an injunction, and a temporary injunction is essential to the assertion and preservation of a legal right, if established as alleged in the complaint, it would be error to refuse or set aside a temporary injunction. Alderman v. Wilson, 69 S. C. 159, 48 S. E. 85, and cases cited therein. This, however, does not mean that a right to a temporary injunction pendente lite follows automatically, if the complaint states a cause of action for injunction. The court should consider the showing made in opposition thereto, and must determine, in view of all the circumstances, subject to review by this court, whether the injunction is reasonably essential to protect the legal right of plaintiff pending the litigation, as was done in Northrop v. Simpson, 69 S. C. 554, 48 S. E. 613." Thus showing that the circuit judge should have entertained the motion, and should have considered the answer of the defendant and his proposed affidavits in determining whether the injunction was reasonably essential to the protection of the plaintiff's rights pending the litigation.

It is the judgment of this court that the order of the circuit court be reversed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Thos. S. Sease, Judge.

Action by J. L. McCallum against Kate B. Grier. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. D. Jennings, for appellant. Lee & Moise, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The facts are thus stated in the decree of his honor the circuit judge: "This action was brought for specific performance of an alleged contract of sale, by McCallum Realty & Insurance Company, as agent of the defendant, through its secretary and manager, D. R. McCallum, Jr., to J. L. McCallum, the president of the company, the same bearing date September 12, 1907. And the court is asked to require the defendant, to specifically perform the alleged contract. The case was referred to the master upon all of the issues, and the master found that the contract was binding, and should be enforced. This brings up the case upon all the evidence in the cause. The evidence shows that D. R. McCallum, Jr., acting for his company, requested the defendant to list her property for sale with his agency. She was about to leave the city of Sumter, for the benefit of her health, was exceedingly feeble and in a nervous condition, and sent for the said D. R. McCallum, Jr., for the purpose of having her property insured in his company. After the insurance was arranged, the agent requested the defendant to allow him to list her property with the company for sale, which she did, claiming, however, to have signed a blank authority with nothing written thereon. The paper obtained at the time, authorizing the sale of the property, is a printed form filled out and witnessed by D. R. McCallum, Jr. He left no copy with the defendant. No sale was made in fact, until after the return of the defendant from Charleston. She left her home for Charleston on the 19th day of August, 1908, and returned about September 2d, at which time Mr. D. R. McCallum, Jr., called upon her in the interest of the plaintiff, and with instructions from the plaintiff, 'to try and get her to take less than twelve hundred and fifty dollars,' and with instructions to offer less. His first offer was eleven hundred dollars, which the defendant declined. He then stated, 'I think I have about found a man who will give you twelve hundred.' The defendant declined the offer. Further negotiations were carried on by the agent of the company with the defendant, all resulting in a refusal of the defendant to make the sale. Without repeating all of the testimony it is sufficient to say that it appears therein that when the defendant returned to her home in September no sale of her property had been effected, and she declined to allow the McCallum Realty & Insurance Company to make the sale of the land referred to in the contract, except upon certain terms, which the company did not agree to, in consequence of which disagreement there was a clear abrogation of the authority to make the sale of the land in accordance with the contract. It further appears from the testimony that the McCallum Realty & Insurance Company, acting through its secretary and manager, acted in a dual capacity in undertaking to negotiate a sale with the president of the company at a price less than that fixed by the defendant. It further appears from the testimony that the agent of the defendant undertook to bind the defendant to a sale of property referred to to its own president, and this without disclosing the name of the purchaser to the seller."

The first of the appellant's exceptions raises a question of practice, and is as follows: "It is respectfully submitted, that his honor erred in overruling the plaintiff's exceptions to the master's report, and in not holding that the master should have sustained the plaintiff's motion to strike from the complaint all of the allegations referred to in the plaintiff's motion to strike out, all of which are referred to in this exception and made a part hereof, and it is respectfully submitted that his honor erred in not sustaining the motion, on each and every ground therein stated."

In the first place, the cases of Jumper v. Bank, 89 S. C. 296, 17 S. E. 990, Holtzclaw v. Green, 45 S. C. 494, 28 S. E. 515, and Tucker v. Ry., 51 S. C. 306, 28 S. E. 943, show that the exception is not in proper form, as it does not contain within itself the proposition of law to be reviewed. But, waiving such objection, it cannot be sustained, for the reason that the appellant has failed to satisfy this court that the ruling of the presiding judge was prejudicial to his rights. It must be remembered that greater latitude is allowed in stating the issues in equitable than in legal actions. Smith v. Smith, 50 S. C. 54, 27 S. E. 545.

The appellant filed exceptions to the findings of fact hereinbefore set out, but these exceptions must be overruled, as the findings of fact are fully sustained, not only by the testimony introduced in behalf of the defendant, but by the testimony of D. R. McCallum, Jr., a witness for the plaintiff.

The next question that will be considered is whether the defendant had the power to revoke the authority of her agent during the time fixed for the continuance of her contract with the agent. "As between principal and agent, authority is revocable at any time, if not coupled with an interest. The authority of an agent to represent the principal depends upon the will and license of the latter. It is the act of the principal which creates the authority; it is for his benefit, and to subserve his purposes, that it is called into being; and unless the agent has acquired with the authority an interest in the subject-matter, it is in the principal's interest alone that the authority is to be exercised. The agent, obviously, except in the instance mentioned, can have no right to insist upon a further execution of the authority, if the principal himself, desires it to terminate. It is the general rule of law, therefore, that as between the agent and his principal, the authority of the agent may be revoked by the principal at his will at any time, and with or without good reason therefor, except in those cases where the authority is coupled with sufficient interest in the agent. And this is true, even though the authority be in express terms, declared to be 'exclusive' or 'irrevocable.' But although the principal has the power thus to revoke the authority, he may subject himself to a claim for damages, if he exercises it, contrary to his express or implied agreement in the matter. An agency is sometimes said to be irrevocable, when it is conferred for a valuable consideration. It is believed, however, that this is only another form of stating the general rule, that it must be coupled with an interest." Mechem on Agency, § 204.

"A power of attorney constituting a mere agency, is always revocable. It is only when coupled with an interest in the thing itself, or the estate which is the subject of the power, it is deemed to be irrevocable, as where it is a security for money advanced, or is to be used as a means of effectuating a purpose necessary to protect the rights of the agent or others. A mere power, like a will, is in its very nature revocable, when it concerns the interest of the principal alone, and, in such case, even an express declaration of irrevocability will not prevent revocation. An interest in the proceeds, to arise as mere compensation for the service of executing the power, will not make the power irrevocable. Therefore, it has been held, that a mere employment to transact the business of the principal is not irrevocable without an express covenant founded on sufficient consideration, notwithstanding the compensation of the agent is to result from the business to be performed, and to be measured by its extent. In order to make an agreement for irrevocability, contained in a power to transact business for the benefit of the principal, binding on him, there must be a consideration for it, independent of the compensation to be rendered, for the services to be performed." Blackstone v. Buttermore, 53 Pa. 268.

"It is not denied by the plaintiff that, in this case, it was within the power of the defendant to put an end to his agency by revoking his authority. Indeed, this is a doctrine so consonant with justice and common sense, that it requires no reasoning to prove it. But he contends that it is a maxim of common law that every instrumentality must be revoked by one of equal dignity. It is true an instrument under seal cannot be released or discharged by an instrument not under seal or by parol, but we do not consider the rule as applicable to the revocation of powers of attorney. The authority of an agent is conferred at the mere will of the principal, and is to be executed for his benefit; the principal, therefore, has the right to put an end to the agency, when the confidence at first reposed in him is withdrawn." Brookshire v. Brookshire, 30 N. C. 74, 47 Am. Dec. 341.

As a broker is a special agent a third party deals with him at his peril. Therefore, after the defendant revoked the authority of her agent, D. R. McCallum, Jr., could not enter into a contract binding on her for the sale of the land, even though the plaintiff was not then aware that the agent's authority had been revoked. The foregoing authorities dispose of all the exceptions, relative to the power of revocation.

The next question is whether the relations existing between the defendant, the plaintiff McCallum Realty & Insurance Company, and D. R. McCallum, Jr., were such as to prevent the latter from entering into a contract with J. L. McCallum for the sale of the land that would be binding upon the defendant against her wishes. The McCallum Realty & Insurance Company was the agent of Mrs. Grier, and of course J. L. McCallum, its president, and D. R. McCallum, Jr., its manager, also sustained towards her a fiduciary relation, yet we find that one fiduciary (J. L. McCallum) not only seeks to purchase the property from the other fiduciary (D. R. McCallum, Jr.), but that the plaintiff constituted D. R. McCallum, Jr., his agent to negotiate the purchase of the property from the defendant, although her interests were antagonistic to those of the plaintiff.

"A broker cannot act as the agent of both parties, where their interests are conflicting. Thus, a broker employed to sell cannot act at the same time as the agent of the purchaser, for in that case the duty he owes to one principal to sell for the best price obtainable is essentially inconsistent with, and repugnant to, the duty he owes to the other to buy at the lowest price possible, and there would, necessarily, be danger that the right of one principal would be sacrificed to promote the interests of the other. A broker employed to sell goods for his principal cannot buy them for himself, nor can a broker employed to buy, buy his own goods unless the principal, with full knowledge of the facts, assents to the transaction. This rule is inflexible, and it is immaterial that the broker acts in good faith, and works no injury to his principal, or even that the transaction is more advantageous to the principal than if had with a stranger. The reason of the rule is that, if the broker were permitted to buy from or sell to himself, there would be combined in him the incompatible relation of purchaser and seller, and an interest adverse to that of his principal would be created such as would ordinarily lead to a violation of his duty as agent." 4 Enc. of Law, 966; 19 Cyc. 207.

"It is a well-established principle that a trustee cannot buy at his own sale. He cannot be the vendor and vendee at the same time of trust property; that is, he cannot make a binding contract with himself in the purchase of the trust property under his control. On the contrary, all such purchases are subject to be vacated and set aside by the cestui que trust at his option, and this, too, without regard to the fact whether said purchase was made in good faith, at full price, or was fraudulent and delusive. This doctrine has been long settled, both in England and in this country, and it is a wise and wholesome principle. It strikes, at once, at the root of danger, and destroys it. It removes from the trustee the temptation to do wrong, and guarantees the faithful execution of his trust in the sale of the property of his cestui que trust." This language is quoted with approval in Mortgage Co. v. Clowney, 70 S. C. 229, 49 S. E. 569. See, also, Verner v. Simpson, 68 S. C. 459, 47 S. E. 729, and Duncan v. City Council, 60 S. C. 558, 39 S. E. 265.

These authorities conclusively show that it was a violation of the plaintiff's duty to attempt to purchase from an agency of which he was a member, and that he is not in a position to demand specific performance of his contract, which was voidable, at the option of the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

LANE et al v. HYAMS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 21, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

JUDGMENT (§ 743*)—RES JUDICATA—MATTERS CONCLUDED.

A person having a policy of insurance on his own life, payable to himself, "his executors, administrators, or assigns," sought to sell it; and an agent or broker for him procured a purchaser, had the insured to make an assignment, blank as to the name of the assignee, filled this in, received $4,768 from the assignee, and paid $695.22 to his principal. After the death of the insured, his executors claimed the proceeds of the policy, and, under a bill of interpleader filed by the insurance company in the federal court, pleaded that the assignment was a wagering contract, contrary to public policy, and void, and obtained a decree for the balance of the proceeds of the policy after reimbursing the transferee for the amount paid for the assignment and his expenditures for premiums and on account of a loan by the company to the insured (they conceding that such reimbursement should be made). Held that, in a subsequent suit by the executors to recover balance received by the agent or broker from the assignee over and above what he had paid to his principal, and which should have been so paid, the plaintiffs were not debarred from recovering by the litigation and decree in the United States court.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by M. B. Lane and others, executors, against M. Hyams, Jr. There was a directed verdict for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

John R. Young held an insurance policy on his own life for the sum of $50,000 in the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, on which policy he had borrowed $4,000. M. Hyams, Jr., was an employé in the office of the agent of the insurance company at Savannah. Young expressed a desire to sell his policy, and Hyams undertook to negotiate the sale. Hyams testified that he told Young that he could obtain $695.22 net for him, and Young signed an assignment in blank, which recited the consideration to be $1 and other valuable considerations. Hyams completed the assignment to one Alexander, receiving from him $4,768, of which he paid to Young $695.22 and retained the balance for himself as a "commission." After Young died both his executors and Alexander claimed to be entitled to the amount of the insurance due. The company filed a bill of interpleader in the United States court. In their answer the executors of Young averred "that said alleged assignment to said Max Alexander was and is null, void, and of no effect; that the taking and procuring thereof by said Max Alexander was a wager and speculation, and a wagering and speculating contract; that said Max Alexander, at the time of said alleged assignment, had no insurable interest of any sort whatever in the life of said John R. Young, and does not now claim to have any such insurable interest; that said alleged assignment was immoral, contrary to public policy, and void." The executors recovered a decree. In the opinion filed by the presiding judge it was stated that the executors admitted that Alexander might equitably recover such sums as he had paid out for or on account of the policy, with interest on the same, and that, "in view of this concession, decree will be taken accordingly," which was done. The executors then brought suit against Hyams in the superior court of Chatham county to recover the balance of the $4,768 which Alexander had paid to him for the assignment of the policy, less $695.22 which Hyams had paid to Young. On the hearing counsel for each of the parties moved that the court direct a verdict for the side represented by them, respectively. The judge directed a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiffs excepted.

Hitch & Denmark, for plaintiffs in error.
Osborne & Lawrence, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. In the equity case tried in the United States court a decree was rendered reimbursing Alexander for the various amounts expended by him, including the amount paid to Hyams, as representing the insured, for the assignment of the policy, the amount of premiums paid by the assignee for keeping up the policy, with interest thereon, and certain other amounts paid by him on account of the loan made by the company to the insured. It is true the presiding judge, in the opinion filed by him, stated that counsel for the executors conceded that Alexander should be repaid for such expenditures, and said: "In view of this concession, decree will be taken accordingly. He will, therefore, suffer no loss. He will have his whole outlay, with 7 per cent. interest." We do not understand, however, that it was thereby held that these amounts were not properly allowable to Alexander. Whether placed in the decree by virtue of a concession, or by virtue of a view that they should properly be allowed, the fact is that Alexander has under the decree received out of the proceeds of the policy the amount which he paid therefor to Hyams, and which was thus treated as paid to Young so far as Alexander was concerned. The judge of the superior court took the view that, as it was declared that the assignment of the policy of insurance was contrary to public policy and void, it was entirely void; that the executors of Young were not obliged to repay the amount thus paid on a wagering contract; and that if, from motives of expediency, they conceded such repayment, they did not have any right of action against Hyams. As to the premiums necessary to keep the policy in force, which were paid by Alexander, the judge stated in the opinion filed by him that he could see a difference, as they were necessary to keep the policy in life and produce the fund which was in controversy after the death of the insured.

If the right of an assignee of a policy to have returned to him his expenditures in keeping the policy in life were placed by the courts of the United States, not on the partial validity of the assignment, but on the ground that one thus producing or aiding to produce a fund for distribution in a court of equity should be reimbursed for his expenditures in so doing, or that if beneficiaries of a policy go into a court of equity and seek to have the assignment set aside, they should do equity and reimburse the assignee, the position of our learned Brother of the superior court bench would have weight. The United States District Judge, presiding in the Circuit Court, who passed upon the equity cause involving the assignment and distribution of the proceeds of the policy, relied to a considerable extent upon the decision in Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. Ed. 924. In that case a person, on procuring an insurance upon his life, entered into an agreement with a firm whereby the latter was to pay all fees and assessments payable to the underwriters on the policy, and to receive nine-tenths of the amount due thereon at his death. Pursuant to the agreement, he executed an assignment of the policy, and the firm paid the fees and assessments. On his death they collected from the underwriters nine-tenths of the amount due on the policy, and his administrator sued the firm therefor. It was held that the administrator was entitled to the money so collected, with interest thereon, less the sums advanced by the firm. In the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Field it was said: "To the extent in which the assignee stipulates for the proceeds of the policy beyond the sums advanced by him, he stands in the position of one holding a wager policy." Again he said: "It was lawful for the association to advance to the assured the sums payable to the insurance company on the policy as they became due. It was also lawful for the assured to assign the policy as security for their payment. The assignment was only invalid as a transfer of the proceeds of the policy beyond what was required to refund those sums, with interest." Still further, referring to the issuing of a policy to one having no insurable interest in the life of the assured, and the assignment of a policy to such a person, he said: "The same ground which invalidates the one should invalidate the other—so far, at least, as to restrict the right of the assignee to the sums actually advanced by him." In discussing the decision in Cammack v. Lewis, 15 Wall. 643, 21 L. Ed. 244, he said: "The case being brought to this court, it was held that the transaction, so far as the creditor was concerned, for the excess beyond the debt owing to him, was a wagering policy, and that the creditor, in equity and good conscience, should hold it only as security for what the debtor owed him when it was assigned, and for such advances as he might have afterwards made on account of it; and that the assignment was valid only to that extent." These excerpts indicate that an assignment of a life insurance policy is not deemed by the Supreme Court of the United States to be necessarily wholly void because it includes a wagering element, but that it may be treated as valid for the amount of an indebtedness existing when it was made, or for advances made on account of it afterwards, with interest thereon, and only void as to the excess over and above such amounts.

In Manhattan Life Insurance Co. v. Hennessy, 99 Fed. 64, 70, 39 C. C. A. 625, Judge Shelby, speaking for the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit, referred to this subject, and his decision was cited in the opinion of the United States judge in the case arising under the bill of interpleader. In that case the question of the right to recover the amount paid for the policy, if the assignment were held void generally, was not discussed. In Russell v. Grigsby, 168 Fed. 577 (9), 94 C. C. A. 61, the question was directly involved. The policy was payable to the executors, administrators, and assigns of the insured. Before the third premium fell due, having met with financial misfortune, he was unable to meet it. He also needed a surgical operation, but was without means to obtain the services. In this condition he assigned the policy to another in consideration of $100 in money and an engagement by the assignee to pay the premium then past due and future premiums, which the latter did. At the time of the assignment the assignee was neither a relative nor creditor of the insured. It was held by the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States for the Sixth Circuit that the assignment was void for want of an insurable interest in the assignee, and that he was only entitled to receive from the proceeds of the policy the amount actually paid and advances for subsequent premiums. Judge Lurton, who has since been elevated to the Supreme Bench, after a full discussion of the case, said: "The conclusion of the whole matter is that the assignment is valid to the extent of the money actually paid for it as well as for all advances for premiums subsequently made. Beyond this it is a gambling contract and not enforceable." Thus the amount of money paid to the insured, and thereby inuring to his benefit, seems to have been considered as standing on a like basis with a debt already existing or one subsequently arising by virtue of advances afterward made. Apparently it was not thought to make any material difference whether the money was loaned before the assignment, or at the time of the assignment, or agreed to be and actually advanced after the assignment, or paid to the assignor for the assignment, so far as the right of reimbursement and the partial validity of the assignment for that purpose was concerned.

We are not now considering the question of the assignability of the policy as an original proposition, either on principles of general law or with reference to a construction of a section of our Code. See, in this connection, Rylander v. Allen, 125 Ga. 206, 53 S. E. 1082, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 128. Neither are we discussing the question of dealing with a single assignment as infected with a wagering element, yet good in part and bad in part. The rights of the executors of the insured and of the assignee have been decreed by a court having jurisdiction of the parties on the subject-matter. Under that decree the assignee was reimbursed the amount paid for the policy, treating the payment by him to Hyams as equivalent to a payment to Young, the insured. The question we have to deal with in the present case, so far as it is affected by the litigation and decree in the United States court in the former case, is: What is the status between the executors of the insured and Hyams, whom they claim was the agent of the insured, received money for him, and unlawfully retained a portion of it? If, under the decisions of the United States courts (in one of which that case was tried), the assignment was not absolutely void, but was valid to the extent of the money paid for it and subsequent advances, and if Hyams received such money as the agent of the assured, and the executors of the insured have had to account for the amount so paid, it is not easy to see why he should be allowed to illegally retain a part of it from his principal or the executors of the latter. Hyams was not a party in the former litigation; but it was claimed that he was the agent of the insured, whose executors were parties, and that through him the contract was made. If an agent received money for his principal, and such payment was in law a payment to the principal, and the resulting assignment of the policy was valid to the extent of the amount of such payment and other advances, and the principal accounted for it under a decree in a litigation with the other party to the contract, the agent ought not to be allowed to pocket a portion of the money thus received and defend himself on account of the decision declaring the assignment generally void. If we have correctly apprehended the decisions of the United States courts, as above discussed, then the executors of Young did not merely give away this sum to Alexander, or concede it to him as a matter of grace, but as matter of right under such adjudications; and in that event their concession did not operate as a release to Hyams, as indicated in the opinion filed by the judge of the superior court.

It is not necessary to deal with the evidence of Hyams as to what his real relation to the insured was, or in regard to his conduct in the transaction, or as to the agreement of Young in regard to receiving a "net" amount. The presiding judge directed a verdict for the defendant because of the former litigation and its results. We cannot concur in the view that such a verdict was demanded.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

DAUGHARTY v. S. L. & C. O. DRAWDY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 23, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 124)—POWERS UNDER WILL—EXECUTION—EXECUTOR'S DEED.

The plaintiffs filed their equitable petition to enjoin the defendant from cutting the timber on certain land, and to recover damages and the possession of such land, attaching to the petition an abstract of title. In this abstract, and upon the trial of the case in October, 1908, the plaintiffs relied, as one of the links in their chain of title, upon a deed dated May 11, 1878, made by an executor. Upon the trial it appeared that the testator in his will gave his executors power to sell, publicly or privately, certain lands, including the tract undertaken to be conveyed in the executor's deed referred to, and that another besides the maker of the deed qualified as executor. Held:

(a) Under the power in the will authorizing the executors of the testator to sell at private sale, both of the executors should have joined in the deed made under such power. Board of Education of Glynn County v. Day, 128 Ga. 156, 57 S. E. 359; Hosch Lumber Co. v. Weeks, 123 Ga. 336, 51 S. E. 439; Dowdy v. McArthur, 94 Ga. 577, 21 S. E. 148; Civ. Code 1896, § 3317.

(b) Where a deed by one of such executors was offered in evidence, it was error, over appropriate and timely objections, to admit it in evidence as conveying title to the property described therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 496-507; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 191*)—EVIDENCE (§ 383*)—ANCIENT DEED—EFFECT OF ADMISSION—INSTRUCTION ASSUMING DISPUTED FACT.

The plaintiffs introduced in evidence a deed purporting to have been executed more than 30 years prior to the time of trial, and the court charged the jury in reference thereto as follows: "I charge you that this deed that purports to have been made from Smith to White, and being what is called an ancient document, being over 30 years old, the presumption of law is that it is genuine, and, when that deed is attacked as a forgery, the burden is upon the party attacking it to satisfy you that it is a forged instrument. If they have carried that burden, and satisfied you that it is a forgery, then you would find in favor of the defendant Daugharty in this case." Held:

(a) As the defendant, who contended and offered testimony to show that the alleged deed was a forgery, introduced evidence that the alleged deed was not 30 years old, it was error to instruct the jury in the words "Being what is called an ancient document" and "being over 30 years old."

(b) The fact that a deed is admitted in evidence under Civ. Code 1896, § 3610, does not prevent the jury from finding that it is a forgery, from the face of the deed and the entries thereon, without resort to aliunde evidence. Pridden v. Green, 80 Ga. 737, 7 S. E. 97; 1 Enc. Ev. 884, 885.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-431; Dec. Dig. § 191.* Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1660-1677; Dec. Dig. § 383.*]

3. DEPOSITIONS (§ 64*)—SUBJECT-MATTER OF EXAMINATION—INTERROGATORIES AS TO ATTACHED AFFIDAVITS.

Defendant sued out interrogatories for non-resident witnesses, to obtain their testimony to be used upon the final trial of an application for injunction and other relief, and attached thereto affidavits made by the witnesses to be used upon the hearing before the presiding judge for an interlocutory injunction. In such interrogatories questions were propounded to the witnesses, wherein they were asked if they made such affidavits, and if the statements therein contained were true, to which questions the witnesses answered in the affirmative. When the interrogatories were submitted to opposing counsel, they made thereon and signed, as counsel for the plaintiffs, objections that "the attached affidavits cannot be rendered admissible in evidence upon the trial of said case by proving the execution of same and that the statements made therein are true," and "all questions propounded to either of said witnesses based upon the statements made in said affidavits are likewise illegal, irrelevant, and inadmissible in evidence." Held, that the court upon the trial committed no error in refusing to allow the answers to such questions to be admitted in evidence for the defendants. *Richardson v. HOLTON et al. v. CITY OF CAMILLA et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 14, 1910.)(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 82, 87, 278)—POWERS OF MUNICIPALITY—PROPERTY RIGHTS—DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

The act of the General Assembly (Acts 1907, p. 505) chartering the city of Camilla provided in the twenty-eighth paragraph of section 21 that the city should have the power "to acquire by purchase or otherwise, own and equip ice plants and cold storage plants, in connection with waterworks system of said city or otherwise, and to do and perform all acts in connection with ownership and operation of and conduct of same, ordinarily incident to the operation and conduct of the same, and to issue bonds of said city, for the purpose of acquiring, owning, and equipping or operating said plants."

An ordinance passed by the municipal authorities calling an election for the purpose of having determined the question whether or not bonds of the municipality should be issued provided: "Said bonds to be issued for the purpose of procuring the sum of $12,000, which sum is to be used as follows: The same to be used in acquiring, equipping, enlarging, and repairing the electric and waterworks plant and system, and acquiring additional real estate upon which to locate and operate said plant; and in acquiring, establishing, equipping, and operating an ice plant in connection with the waterworks and electric lights and other public utilities of the city of Camilla." Held, the operation of an ice plant by the municipal authorities of the city of Camilla, in connection with the electric light and waterworks plant, for the purpose of furnishing ice to the inhabitants of the city, is not in violation of paragraph 2, § 1, art. 1, or of paragraph 3, § 1, art. 1, or of paragraph 25, § 1, art. 1, of the Constitution of this state, or otherwise illegal; and the issuance of bonds by such municipality to raise money to establish and operate such ice plant was not illegal, where the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters of the city had been obtained at an election held for the purpose of determining whether or not such bonds should be issued.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 917*)—BONDS—VALIDATION—ATTACK ON JUDGMENT.

After a judgment was rendered confirming and validating the issuance of the bonds in proceedings had under the validation act of 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 82), citizens and taxpayers of the municipality could not for the first time attack the judgment on the ground that the money to be raised from a sale of the bonds was to be used for different purposes, and "neither said ordinance, nor the published notice of the election published in pursuance thereof, provided or gave the voters of said city any opportunity to vote for or against the bonds for each of said specified purposes separately, and hence said ordinance and said notice did not call and give notice of respectively as to each of said debts and purposes of an election 'for that purpose,' as required by the Constitution of the state of Georgia, embodied in Code, § 5893."

3. PREVIOUS CASE REAFFIRMED.

Upon a review of the case of Lippitt v. Albany, 131 Ga. 629, 63 S. E. 33, the rulings therein made are reaffirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by S. J. Holton and others against the City of Camilla and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The plaintiffs in error, as citizens and taxpayers of the city of Camilla, filed their equitable petition against the city and its mayor and aldermen to enjoin the issuance and sale of certain bonds which had been authorized to be issued at an election held for that purpose. A judgment confirming and validating the issuance of the bonds had previously been rendered in proceedings had under the act of 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 82). In the equitable petition for an injunction the plaintiffs attacked the constitutionality of this act. They further contended that the judgment validating the bonds was illegal for various reasons, even if the act of 1897 was constitutional. To the order of the court refusing an interlocutory injunction, the plaintiffs excepted.

The ordinance calling the election for the purpose of having determined the question whether or not bonds should be issued provided: "Said bonds to be issued for the purpose of procuring the sum of $12,000 which sum is to be used as follows: The same to be used in acquiring, equipping, enlarging, and repairing the electric and waterworks plant and system, and acquiring additional real estate upon which to locate and operate said plant, and in acquiring, establishing, equipping, and operating an ice plant in connection with the waterworks and electric lights and other public utilities of the city of Camilla." One of the grounds upon which the plaintiffs sought to enjoin the issuance and sale of the bonds was that the city could not engage in the enterprise of operating an ice plant. The defendant contended that the city had such power under the act of the General Assembly approved August 27, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 505), under the provision of paragraph 28 of section 21, appearing on page 512; that in this paragraph and section of the city's charter the Legislature expressly gave it authority to engage in the business of operating an ice plant and to levy a tax for that purpose, and that the act giving this authority was constitutional and valid, especially as the city was only undertaking to operate an ice plant in connection with the plant operating its waterworks and electric light system, and merely as an incident thereto, and not as an independent business.

This ground on which an injunction was sought against the issuance and sale of the bonds is more elaborately set out in the petition, as follows: "Because one of the purposes for which said bonds are to be issued is 'to acquire, establish, equip, and enlarge an ice plant in connection with the waterworks and electric light plant and system and other public utilities of the city of Camilla, and such purpose is illegal, for the reason that the said city has no right to embark in a purely private and commercial business of manufacturing or dealing in a common commodity of commerce, such as ice, and therefore the use of public funds raised by taxation for that purpose will be illegal, and it does not appear how much of the proceeds of said bonds shall be used for that illegal purpose, and how much for other purposes which might be legal, and therefore the whole issue will be illegal, as said purposes are inextricably commingled and confused; petitioners contending that subsection 28 of section 21 of the new charter of Camilla, embraced in Acts 1906, p. 505 et seq., said subsection purporting to authorize said city to purchase or otherwise own and equip an ice plant and cold storage plants, etc., is unconstitutional and void, because in contravention of paragraph 2, § 1, art. 1, of the Constitution of Georgia (Civ. Code 1895, § 5699), because by said paragraph the right of private property and the paramount duty of the government to impartially and completely protect the same are recognized and guaranteed, and the right to apply public funds, raised by taxation, to the carrying on of an ordinary business of manufacturing and dealing in an ordinary commodity of commerce, in connection with the right of eminent domain, need not be exercised—a business in no wise in the nature of a public utility—is inconsistent with the complete and impartial protection of private property, inasmuch as such right to raise by taxation and so apply public funds could be applied not only to the purposes of government, and to matters properly coming into the scope of public affairs, but also to every private business and every business of every nature, and thereby the government could take upon itself the conduct and control of all manufacturing, commercial, and other private businesses, and the form of government would be transformed from its present basis of individual ownership of property to the socialistic basis, wherein private property could not exist. And said subsection of said charter of said city is also unconstitutional as being in contravention of paragraph 3, § 1, art. 1, of the Constitution of Georgia (Civ. Code 1895, § 5700), inasmuch as its effect is to permit a citizen to be deprived of his property other than by due process of law, to wit, by taking such property under the guise of taxation and applying the same to the carrying on of a common private manufacturing and commercial enterprise, wholly unrelated to any governmental purpose. And said subsection of said charter is in contravention of paragraph 25, § 1, art. 1, of the Constitution of said state (Civ. Code 1895, § 5722), inasmuch as its effect is to deprive citizens of the United States resident in Georgia of the full enjoyment of the rights, privileges, and immunities due to such citizenship, and especially the right of private property existing under the republican form of government established by the Constitution of the United States, with the right of private property as one of its basic and fundamental features. And said subsection of said charter is in contravention of other provisions of the Constitution of Georgia and of the United States."

The defendants, in their answer, set up, among other allegations, the following: "That it is not intended that said money shall be used simply to embark the city in a purely private and commercial business of manufacturing and dealing in ice, independent of said city's other businesses; but said city has already established and in operation a waterworks and electric light plant, operated by steam power, and that, by reason of the large power generated in said plants, and the large amount of water constantly distilled in the boilers of said steam plant, it will be profitable to said city to operate, not as an independent enterprise, but solely in connection with, and as an incident to, the operation of said electric lights and waterworks plant, an ice machine and plant, for the reason that much of the labor and machinery necessary for the operation of such ice plant are already owned by said city in the operation of its electric light and waterworks plant, and must necessarily be continued by said city in the operation of said electric light and waterworks plant, and said ice plant could be operated largely with the same labor already used in the waterworks and electric light plants, the same labor being able to attend to said ice plant between the intervals of its employment in said electric light and waterworks plant, and said operation of said ice plant will require only a small additional expense in the form of labor and machinery, not more than one-half of what the expense of labor and machinery would cost to operate an ice plant independently, and therefore said city is in a position peculiarly advantageous for operating said ice plant in connection with its said waterworks and electric light plants, at a much less expense than such ice plant could be operated by any one else and independent of such plants as said city's waterworks and electric light plants; and said city proposes to operate said ice plant solely as an incident to its said waterworks and electric light plants and at a small additional expense, and with large profits to said city and its taxpayers. In addition to the foregoing, these defendants say that in the hot climate in which said city is located ice is, for several months in each year, almost a necessity for persons who use the water from the pipes of said city's waterworks system, they being a great majority of the citizens of said city, and a great deal of ice has to be used by the said citizens in the water and other beverages which they drink, and it is highly important that such citizens use ice that is free from disease-producing germs, and there is danger to the citizens of said city in using ice manufactured outside of said city, by private individuals, free from any inspection by the public, in that such ice may be made of water not properly purified, and may contain dangerous disease germs; whereas, the ice proposed to be manufactured by the city of Camilla in connection with its said electric light and waterworks plant, will be carefully manufactured, under public inspection and proper and sanitary rules, and it will tend to preserve the health of the citizens of said city for the ice used by them in connection with said city's waterworks system to be thus manufactured under public supervision in a proper sanitary manner."

The judgment validating and confirming the issuance of the bonds showed on its face the purpose for which the election was held and the bonds were to be issued.

Pope & Bennet, for plaintiffs in error. M. C. Bennet, for defendants in error.

HOLDEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. One of the grounds upon which the plaintiffs sought to enjoin the issuance and sale of bonds of the municipality was that one of the purposes for which the money arising from the sale was to be used was the establishment and operation of an ice plant, which plaintiffs contended would be illegal, for reasons set forth in the preceding statement of facts. In 1 Cooley on Taxation, 217, the author says: "The propriety and necessity of provision by taxation for a supply of water for the extinguishment of fires, and for the general use of the inhabitants of large towns, is not disputed. * * * Cities may also be authorized to construct gasworks in order to furnish their citizens with light as well as to supply the corporate needs." And in 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 865, it is said: "It is generally agreed that the Legislature has the power to authorize a municipality to own and operate an electric light plant, which shall furnish not only the lights needed by the municipality for lighting the streets and public places, but lights to the inhabitants for their private purposes." There are decisions of many courts to the effect that municipal corporations have the right to furnish to their inhabitants in their homes and places of business water and electric lights. In Pond on Municipal Control of Public Utilities, p. 28, it is said: "The courts are of the opinion that it is not only within the power of but that it is their duty to keep themselves free to accept for their own use and to provide for their inhabitants new inventions and superior agencies as they arise, and that cities are not to be restricted to the providing for the strict necessities of their citizens, but that they may also administer to their comfort and pleasure."

In Hequembourg v. City of Dunkirk, 49 Hun, 550, 2 N. Y. Supp. 447, the court stated: "What is or what is not a municipal purpose is, in many cases, doubtful and uncertain, and it is the duty of the court in such cases to give weight to the legislative determination, and not to annul its acts, unless it clearly appears that the act was not authorized. * * * Light in dwellings is as important and essential as upon the streets, and promotes the general comfort, safety, and welfare of the inhabitants; and when it is supplied in connection with that which is furnished by the municipality, under its duty to the public, we think it may be regarded as an incident thereto, and one of the purposes for which the municipality may properly contract." In the case of Sun Publishing Ass'n v. Mayor, 8 App. Div. 230, 238, 40 N. Y. Supp. 607, 611, affirmed 152 N. Y. 257, 46 N. E. 499, 37 L. R. A. 788, the court employed the following language: "The true test is that which requires that the work shall be essentially public and for the general good of all the inhabitants of the city. It must not be undertaken merely for gain or for private objects. Gain or loss may incidentally follow, but the purpose must be primarily to satisfy the need or contribute to the convenience of the people of the city at large. Within that sphere of action, novelty should impose no veto. Should some inventive genius by and by create a system for supplying us with pure air, will the representatives of the people be powerless to utilize it in the great cities of the state, however extreme the want and dangerous the delay? Will it then be said that pure air is not so important as pure water and clear light? We apprehend not."

In the case of State ex rel. v. City of Toledo, 48 Ohio St. 112, 134, 136, 137, 138, 140, 26 N. E. 1061, 1066-1069 (11 L. R. A. 729), the court said: "Taxation implies an imposition for a public use. * * * But what are public purposes is a question that must be left to the Legislature, to be decided upon its own judgment and discretion. Water, light, and heat are objects of prime necessity. Their use is general and universal. It is now well settled that the Legislature in the exercise of its constitutional power may authorize cities to appropriate real estate for waterworks. * * * What we have said in reference to waterworks is for the most part applicable to the erecting and maintaining of natural or artificial gas works. Heat being an agent or principle indispensable to the health, comfort, and convenience of every inhabitant of our cities, we do not see why, through the medium of natural gas, it may not be as much a public service to furnish it to the citizens as to furnish water. It is sufficient if every inhabitant who is so situated that he can use it has the same right to use it as the other inhabitants. The establishment of natural gas works by municipal corporations, with the imposition of taxes to pay the cost thereof, may be a new object of municipal policy; but in deciding whether in a given case, the object for which taxes are assessed is a public or a private purpose, we cannot leave out of view the progress of society, the change of manners and customs and the development and growth of new wants, natural and artificial, which may from time to time call for a new exercise of legislative power. And in deciding whether such taxes shall be levied for the new purposes that have arisen we should not, we think, be bound by an inexorable rule that would embrace only those objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied." In this connection, see Gray on Limitations on Taxing Power & Public Indebtedness, §§ 173, 176, 177, 178.

If a city has the right to furnish heat to its inhabitants because conducive to their health, comfort, and convenience, we see no reason why they should not be permitted to furnish ice. The object in bringing, by means of a waterworks system, water in pipes from a distance for use in supplying the needs of a city, is not alone to obtain a sufficient quantity, but also to secure that which is freer from impurities than it is possible to obtain in the city itself. If, in the hot season of the year, the inhabitants of the city must, for sanitary reasons, relinquish the cool draught from the well because, as has been demonstrated, wells of pure water cannot be maintained in populous communities, surely the city would have the right, were it practicable, to cool the water which it delivers through pipes as a substitute, and which oftentimes is scarcely drinkable in its heated condition. If not practicable to cool it in the pipes, and if it be necessary to the welfare, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants that its temperature be lowered before being used for drinking purposes, why cannot the city provide for the delivery of a part of it in a frozen condition, to be used in cooling such part of the balance as is used for drinking purposes? Is the difference between water in a liquid and in a frozen condition a radical one? Upon what principle could the doctrine rest that liquid water may be delivered by the city to its inhabitants by flowage through pipes, but that water in frozen blocks cannot be delivered by wagons or otherwise? If the city has the right to furnish its inhabitants with water in a liquid form, we fail to see any reason why it cannot furnish it to them in a frozen condition. The answer of the defendant, which was introduced in evidence and considered upon the trial, states that in the hot climate in which the city of Camilla is situated ice is necessary for the comfort, health, and convenience of its inhabitants. If this is true, why should not the city be permitted to furnish ice to its inhabitants? And if the furnishing of ice to its inhabitants is conducive generally to their health, comfort, and convenience, it is certainly being furnished for a municipal or public purpose. It is a well-known fact that one of the main uses to which ice is put is the cooling of water for drinking purposes; and when it is used for this purpose, if impure, it is as apt to be deleterious to the consumer as any other impure water. Why, then, in the exercise of its police power, may not a city guard against impurities in the ice, as well as the water, used by its inhabitants.

Nor do we see any rational objection on the idea that the city will be engaging in a manufacturing enterprise. The city might perhaps equally as well be said to be manufacturing when by the use of a filtering process it changes impure water into that which is pure. When, in connection with its waterworks system; it produces ice, it merely, by certain processes, changes the form and temperature of a part of the water supplied by that system. We do not think the operation by the city of Camilla of an ice plant in connection with its waterworks system, for the purpose of furnishing ice to its inhabitants, is in violation of the sections of the Constitution referred to in the plaintiff's petition, or that it is illegal for any reason.

2. The ordinance calling the election, and in pursuance of which it was held, to determine whether or not bonds should be issued, provided: "Said bonds to be issued for the purpose of procuring the sum of $12,000, which sum is to be used as follows: The same to be used in acquiring, equipping, enlarging, and repairing the electric and waterworks plant and system, and acquiring additional real estate upon which to locate and operate said plant, and in acquiring, establishing, equipping, and operating an ice plant in connection with the waterworks and electric lights and other public utilities of the city of Camilla." One of the grounds upon which an injunction was sought states: "Each of said purposes being entirely separate, foreign, and distinct from the others, and neither said ordinance, nor the notice of the election published in pursuance thereof (a copy of which is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit B'), provided or gave the voters of said city any opportunity to vote for or against the bonds for each of said specified purposes separately, and hence said ordinance and said notice did not call and give notice of respectively as to each of said debts and purposes of an election 'for that purpose,' as required by the Constitution of the state of Georgia, embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 5893; and said ordinance, and the notice of this election published in pursuance thereof, were and are each illegal and void for the reason that neither of them permitted the voters to express their opinion on each of said questions as to authorizing and incurring of each of said debts separately, but required the voters by one ballot to express their opinion upon all said separate and distinct questions at once, precluding the voters from voting on each of said questions submitted to them, so that they might pass upon each freely and untrammelled by any other consideration as to each of said debts than the question as to whether said debt should be incurred for the separate purpose named, and, as to each of said debts and purposes, so combined and mingled with the question of assent thereto with other questions wholly foreign to the same, as to make the whole illegal."

In Rea v. La Fayette, 130 Ga. 771, 61 S. E. 707, it was ruled: "Where several distinct and independent propositions for the issuing of bonds by a municipality are submitted to the qualified voters of a town or city, provision should be made in the submission for a separate vote upon each. They cannot be lawfully combined and submitted to the voters as a single question." In that case the election was held under a municipal ordinance providing that the election was to be held "to determine the question whether said city will issue bonds in the aggregate sum of forty thousand dollars, * * * said sum to be expended as follows, to wit: For the purpose of establishing and maintaining a system of waterworks, twenty-five thousand dollars. For the purpose of establishing and maintaining a system of electric lights, ten thousand dollars. For the purpose of extending and improving the public school of said city, and providing adequate accommodations for school patrons and children of said city, five thousand dollars." The questions ruled upon in that case were made by the plaintiffs at the hearing in the proceedings to validate the bonds had under the validation act of 1897. It appears from the record in the case of Lippitt v. Albany, 131 Ga. 629, 63 S. E. 33, that this identical question was raised in that case, where an injunction was sought against the issuance of the bonds under the judgment of the court validating them; and it was there held that objections of this character to the issuance and sale of bonds could not be raised after a judgment validating and confirming them was had under the act of 1897, and the judgment of the court below refusing an interlocutory injunction was by this court affirmed. In the case of Cain v. Smith, 117 Ga. 902, 44 S. E. 5, there was under consideration an act of the Legislature providing for the submission to the voters of two questions. One was whether or not they would adopt a charter for the town; the other, whether they would incur a debt for the purpose of purchasing sites and erecting schoolhouses thereon. It was held that under the provisions of the Constitution hereinbefore referred to, embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 5893, the act was void. It was there held that the constitutional provision above referred to contemplated that the question as to whether or not a debt should be incurred for a particular purpose should not be submitted to the voters in such way that they could not vote for or against it without voting for or against another separate and distinct proposition foreign to the question as to whether or not they would incur a debt for a specified purpose.

The ordinance under which the election was called in the case which we are considering did not provide that the voters should pass upon any question except the one of incurring a debt for a specified amount. It is true that the ordinance provided that the money raised from the issuance of the bonds was to be used in connection with the electric light and waterworks plant and system, and in establishing, maintaining, and operating an ice plant in connection therewith and other public utilities of the city; but there was no question submitted to the voters, except that of incurring a bonded debt in one specified amount for this purpose. There was no effort to provide for an issue of bonds, except for one fixed sum, though the money arising from the sale thereof was to be used for the purposes above stated; the amount to be used in connection with the electric light and waterworks system and the amount to be used in connection with the ice plant not being specified. The electric light and waterworks system appears to be operated from one power house by steam, and as one plant, and the manufactory for ice is to be operated in connection with and as a part of the waterworks plant. Whether the mode of having the question in regard to the issue of bonds voted upon was a proper one was one of the questions to be determined upon the hearing before the court as to whether or not the bonds should be validated. Jurisdiction of the subject-matter of validating bonds was conferred on the court by the general validating act of 1897. The court, having jurisdiction of such subject-matter under this general act, had power to determine, on proper proceedings, whether a given municipality seeking to issue bonds had complied with all of the prerequisites for that purpose. Included among the matters which it could determine was whether or not the proper method of submitting to the voters the question as to whether or not the bonds would be issued had been pursued. Such a matter does not affect the jurisdiction of the court over the subject of validating bonds, and this was a question to be determined by the court, in the exercise of that jurisdiction, upon the hearing on the question of validation. Even if the method provided for having the question of whether or not bonds should be issued voted upon was an irregular and an improper method, we do not think the plaintiffs could take advantage of this after the judgment of validation was rendered in proper proceedings under the act of 1897 by injunction proceedings to prevent their issuance and sale. See, in this connection, Baker v. Cartersville, 127 Ga. 221, 56 S. E. 249. If after a hearing has been accorded to persons interested, and a formal judgment confirming an issue of bonds has been obtained pursuant to the provisions of the act, questions of this kind were permitted to be raised, the main purpose of the act would be defeated.

3. There were grounds other than those hereinbefore specially named upon which an injunction was sought. Some of them involved attacks upon the constitutionality of the validation act of 1897. Others involved attacks on the judgment by which the bonds were declared validated, and on the regularity of the proceedings upon which such judgment was based. These attacks are set forth at length in the record; but we deem it unprofitable to here repeat them, as all of the questions there made are controlled by former adjudications of this court. We are asked to review and overrule the decision in the case of Lippitt v. Albany, supra; but after careful consideration we decline to do so. The court committed no error in refusing the interlocutory injunction.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WARD v. WARD et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 30, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)NEW TRIAL (§ 132)—DISMISSAL OF MOTION—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

Under the facts disclosed by the record, the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in dismissing the motion for new trial, upon the ground that no brief of evidence had been duly filed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

Error from Superior Court, Walker County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action between F. M. Ward and J. A. Ward and others. From the judgment, F. M. Ward brings error. Affirmed.

Payne & Payne and R. M. W. Glenn, for plaintiff in error. Jas. P. Shattuck and L. W. Copeland, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. This case was tried at the August term, 1908, of the superior court of Walker county, and a verdict rendered in favor of the defendants. During the same term the plaintiff moved for a new trial, and an order was passed setting the hearing of the motion for the first Monday in October, 1908, and giving the movant "until the final hearing of the motion to prepare and present for approval of the court a brief of the evidence in said case." On October 5, 1908, the hearing of the motion was continued until November 10, 1908, to be then heard at Rome. For some reason the motion was not heard at that time, and it was called, in its order, on March 5, 1909, at the February term, 1909, of the court. Counsel for defendants then moved to dismiss the motion for a new trial, upon the ground that no brief of evidence had been filed. Movant's counsel insisted that the brief of evidence could not be prepared, because there were some interrogatories which were used upon the trial which he could not get from the clerk of the court. After argument upon this motion to dismiss, the judge withheld his decision thereon until April 20, 1909, when the case came up for final order. Movant's counsel then tendered a brief of evidence for approval, stating that a brief could not be completed earlier, for the reason that the clerk of the court, who had had possession of certain interrogatories used on the trial, had declined to deliver them to counsel for movant; that all the other portions of the brief had been completed for presentation prior to the February term, 1909, but a complete brief could not be made until April 19, 1909, the clerk not having delivered the interrogatories to counsel until Saturday, April 17th.

It will be seen, from the above statement of facts, that the last order, continuing the hearing of the motion for a new trial until a later date than that which had been previously fixed, was passed on October 5, 1908, and continued the hearing until November 10, 1908. As the motion was not heard on the last-mentioned date and no order setting the hearing for a later date was then passed, and it does not appear that the failure to hear the motion at that time was attributable to laches on the part of the movant, the motion went over, by operation of law, to the next term of the court, to be then called in its order and passed upon. Civ. Code 1895, § 5485. The next term of the court was the February term, 1909. On March 5th, during this term, the motion was called in its order, and no order was passed continuing the hearing until a later date, but a motion was made to dismiss the motion for a new trial, upon the ground that no brief of evidence had been filed, and this motion was argued, and, after argument, the judge simply withheld his decision upon the same until a later date, to wit, April 20, 1909, when he announced his decision sustaining the motion to dismiss. No brief of evidence was presented for approval until April 20, 1909, the date upon which the judge was to announce his decision upon the motion to dismiss. It is obvious that the time allowed the movant in the motion for a new trial in which to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence, which was "until the final hearing of the motion" for a new trial, had then expired. The final hearing for the motion for a new trial was on March 5, 1909, when it was regularly called, in term, for a hearing, and no order of continuance or postponement was passed. The mere holding up of the decision of the court upon the motion to dismiss could not have the effect of continuing the hearing of the motion for a new trial from the time when it was regularly called, in its order in open court, for determination until a later date. The time for the final hearing of the motion for a new trial had arrived, and had passed when the brief of evidence was presented. When it was presented, the court was not sitting for the purpose of hearing the motion for a new trial, but merely for the purpose of announcing its decision upon the motion to dismiss. The mere failure or refusal of the clerk of the court to deliver to counsel for movant in the motion for a new trial certain interrogatories, which had been used upon the trial of the case, afforded no legal reason which required the court to further postpone the final hearing of the motion, in order to give the movant more time in which to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence. *Boatright v. Where a tract of 10 acres of land was levied upon and sold under two tax executions aggregating $5.60, and at the time the tax deed made in consummation of such sale was offered in evidence, upon the trial of a case involving the title to such land, no testimony had been introduced in regard to the value of such land at the time of the sale, and from the pleadings and evidence there was enough to be drawn to indicate that the land was not readily capable of division, it was error to exclude such deed from evidence, on the ground of excessiveness of the levies. This is true, although, at a later stage of the trial, a witness testified that in the year in which the sale took place the land was worth $25 or $30 per acre.

A fire policy on a storehouse recited that it was made subject to the following stipulations and conditions, among others: That the entire policy should be void "if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership; or if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple; or if any change, other than by death of the insured, take place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance (except change of occupants without increase of hazard), whether by legal process or judgment, or voluntary act of the insured, or otherwise." When the policy was issued the insured was the sole owner, in fee, of both the building and the land upon which it was situated. Subsequently, and without the consent of the insurance company, he sold and conveyed, in fee, to another, an undivided one-half interest in the land upon which the building was situated; the deed reciting that the grantor reserved "full title to the storehouse now on said lot, with the right to remove the same without let or hindrance from" the grantee. Such was the status of affairs when, during the life of the policy, the building was destroyed by fire. Held, that such sale and conveyance constituted such a change in the interest of the insured in the building as voided the policy.

EXECUTION (§ 143*)—LEVY—CLAIM OF THIRD PERSON—INSUFFICIENT DESCRIPTION.

Although an entry of a levy on a fi. fa. standing alone would be insufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss the levy because of the lack of definiteness and certainty in the description in the entry of levy of the property levied upon, the defects in the entry of levy will be aided by the description of the property set forth in a claim affidavit, and, where the defects in the description contained in the entry of levy are cured by the aid afforded in a claim affidavit, the levy will be saved from dismissal.

Error from Superior Court, Gilmer County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by Mahala Shelton against Wesley Shelton. Judgment for plaintiff, and, on a levy of execution, John W. Shelton filed claim. Levy dismissed, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

An execution in favor of Mahala Shelton against Wesley Shelton was levied upon certain real estate to which John W. Shelton filed a claim. Upon the trial, on motion of counsel for the claimant, the levy was dismissed upon the ground that the officer's entry did not sufficiently describe the property levied on, and the plaintiff excepted. That entry was in the following language: "Georgia, Gilmer County. I have this day levied the within fi. fa. on parts of land lots #51 & 22 in 11th Dist. 2nd. Sect. of Gilmer Co. (80 a. of #51, more or less, 47 a. #22), as the property of Wesley Shelton, to satisfy a fi. fa. issued from the superior court in favor of Mahala Shelton and against Wesley Shelton." The claim affidavit was in the following language: "Georgia, Murray County. Personally appears before the undersigned officer John W. Shelton, who on oath says that 80 acres more or less of the west side or half of lot of land number 51 in the 11th district and 2nd section of Gilmer county, Georgia, and 47 acres more or less of the northeast side of the west half of lot of land number 22 in the 11th district and 2nd section of Gilmer county, Georgia, the same being all of said west half of said lot of land except 33 acres more or less sold to M. B. Smith and described in a deed to said Smith, levied on by R. A. Pinson, deputy sheriff of Gilmer county, Georgia, by virtue of an execution issued from the superior court of Gilmer county, Georgia, in favor of Mahala Shelton against Wesley Shelton, as the property of said Wesley Shelton, is not the property of said Wesley Shelton, but is the property of affiant," etc.

J. Z. Foster and A. H. Burtz, for plaintiff in error. Wm. Butt, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). While the description of the property levied upon as set forth in the entry of levy made upon the execution was so wanting in definiteness and certainty that a dismissal of the levy would have been proper had that description remained unaided, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff in execution could invoke the description contained in the claim to complete and make certain the defective description. In the case of Walden v. Walden, 128 Ga. 129, 57 S. E. 324, it is said: "The entry of levy was also objected to when offered in evidence. It was in these words: 'Levied the within fi. fa. on a tract or parcel of land lying in Jefferson county, Georgia, 79th district, G. M., containing one hundred acres, more or less; levied on as the property of Thomas E. Walden, and legal notice given to tenant in possession. This December 7th, 1904.' This levy, standing alone, is plainly insufficient in description. It has two aids to help it: First. It is the levy of a mortgage fi. fa. which could only be lawfully levied on the mortgaged property, and it is possible that some presumption as to the officer doing his duty may arise; the description, as far as it went, corresponding with that in the mortgage. Connolly v. Atlantic Contracting Co., 120 Ga. 213 [47 S. E. 575]. Second. The real saving aid to this levy, as between the parties litigant, is that the present plaintiffs interposed to such levy claims, in which they stated that the land had been levied on, and described it as in the mortgage, which description we have held above to be sufficient. The principle that, as between the parties, a defective entry of levy will be aided by the allegations or description of a claim affidavit, and that the claimant will be estopped from denying such allegations, has generally been applied to levies on personality. Pearce v. Renfro, 68 Ga. 194; Drawdy v. Littlefield, 75 Ga. 215 (5); Cohen v. Broughton, 54 Ga. 296 (1); Smith v. Camp, 84 Ga. 117 (7) [10 S. E. 539]. But it has also been applied to levies on real estate. Scolly v. Butler, 59 Ga. 849; Hollis v. Lamb, 114 Ga. 740, 742 [40 S. E. 751, 752]." And in the case of Hollis v. Lamb, supra, it was said: "It is entirely immaterial, under the facts of the present case, whether the levy showed that the lands levied on were or were not in Taylor county. The entry of levy was made by 'M. L. Riley, sheriff,' and described the lands as being in the '12th district of said county.' The claim affidavit made by Lamb, and which was a part of the record of the case, shows on its face that it was made in Taylor county, Ga. It recites that Riley, sheriff of said county, had levied on these lands, which were in the Twelfth district of said county. Therefore this defect in the levy was cured by the recital in the claim which was filed, and rendered certain the locus of the land, and the county of which Riley was sheriff, even if the levy was not properly amendable."

Giving to the defective entry of levy the aid of the description of the property in the claim affidavit, we think the levy was saved from dismissal and the court erred in sustaining the motion to dismiss.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

AKEN v. BULLARD et al.

REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 32*)—LACHES.

A petition by a plaintiff who seeks to reform a deed executed 23 years prior to the institution of his suit, on the ground of mutual mistake of the parties as to the meaning and effect of the terms of the deed, wherein the plaintiff's knowledge of the terms of the deed at the time of its execution is not negatived, nor any reason given as an impediment to an earlier prosecution of his claim, or to excuse his laches, is properly dismissed on demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 119-121; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

Error from Superior Court, Jasper County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by R. H. Aken against J. H. Bullard and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

In 1872 the will of James Aken was duly admitted to record. He devised a certain tract of land to his grandchildren, Ransom H. Aken and Ellen Geiger, to be equally divided between them. The devise to R. H. Aken was in fee simple, and that to Ellen Geiger was in fee, defeasible upon her death without issue, with limitations over in that event to the other devisees in the will. Prior to his death, James Aken had indicated how he wished the land divided between R. H. Aken and Ellen Geiger, and had put R. H. Aken in possession of that half which he desired him to have. In 1885 R. H. Aken and Ellen Geiger (who had intermarried with one Pendergrass) executed to each other their respective deeds intended to carry into effect an agreement of partition between them in ratification of the division as indicated by their grandfather. The deed from the plaintiff to Ellen Pendergrass recited for its consideration the partition of the land, and purported to convey the land therein described to Ellen Pendergrass in fee simple, with warranty of title. On February 23, 1885, Ellen Pendergrass, upon a consideration of $275, conveyed to J. H. Bullard her life estate in the land described in the partition deed; and subsequently, on March 18, 1899, she conveyed by deed to J. H. Bullard a fee-simple title to the same land. Copies of both deeds were attached to the petition, and it appeared that both had been recorded, the former on February 2, 1886, and the latter on March 24, 1899. In 1908 R. H. Aken brought a petition against Ellen Pendergrass and J. H. Bullard, alleging the foregoing facts, and further alleging that the deed from plaintiff to Ellen Pendergrass failed to carry out the intention of the parties thereto; that, instead of the words "forever in fee simple," which were inserted therein, the words, "to be held under the limitation and conditions in the will of James Aken," should have been inserted, and the failure to insert these words was the result of an accident and a mutual mistake under which each party labored as to the meaning of the terms used in the deed; that at the time Bullard obtained the deed from Ellen Pendergrass, purporting to convey the fee-simple estate described in the deed from plaintiff to Ellen Pendergrass, he well knew that the deed under which Ellen Pendergrass held the land was merely a deed of partition, and that she did not claim any greater interest in the land than that which she acquired under the will of her grandfather, and he well knew the purpose for which the deed from plaintiff to Ellen Pendergrass was executed, and that it was not the intention of either of the parties to the deed that the paper should have the effect of a release by plaintiff to Ellen Pendergrass of any interest in the land contingent upon her dying childless; and that Ellen Pendergrass had no children, and is now 65 years of age, and, in the event of her death without children, the plaintiff is one of the devisees under the will of his grandfather, who was to share in the land devised to Ellen Pendergrass upon the contingency of her death without children. The prayer was for the reformation of the deeds and for general relief. The court dismissed the petition on general demurrer, and this judgment is now under review.

A. S. Thurman and Cobb & Erwin, for plaintiff in error. Greene F. Johnson, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). The doctrine of laches is founded upon the maxim, "Vigilantibus non dormientibus subveniunt leges." It rests on reasons of public policy, and its aim is intended for the repose of society by discouraging the assertion of antiquated claims. "The principles upon which courts of equity proceed in such cases," says Judge Nisbet, "is that the lateness of the demand, arising from lapse of time, is presumptive evidence against its justice." Adkins v. Hill, 7 Ga. 573. Equity will relieve against mutual mistake, but only at the instance of a complainant who moves with reasonable diligence. What is a reasonable time must necessarily depend upon the peculiar facts and environments of the particular case. The deed asked to be reformed was executed 23 years before the institution of the suit to reform it. The petition does not disclose the name of the scrivener, nor is it negatived therein that the plaintiff knew of the precise terms of the deed from the date of its execution. He alleges that Bullard knew of the mistake at the time he took his second conveyance from Mrs. Pendergrass in 1899. This deed was spread upon the public records a day or two after its execution, and yet the plaintiff waited more than nine years before he aroused himself from his lethargy. No excuse is given for the plaintiff's long delay. The witnesses to the partition agreement may be dead, the scrivener may have passed away, for aught that appears in the deed. The memory of the parties may be dimmed after the lapse of a quarter century. It is incumbent on the plaintiff, in order to repel the presumption of unreasonable delay, to allege in his petition the impediments to an earlier prosecution of his claim. 12 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 834. This was not done. The laches of the plaintiff is so palpable from the petition that its dismissal on demurrer was proper. Gould v. Glass, 120 Ga. 51, 47 S. E. 505; McWhorter v. Cheney, 121 Ga. 541, 49 S. E. 603; Basch v. Frankenstein, 68 S. E. 75.

In an action by a servant against a master for alleged failure of duty on the part of the latter in not giving to the servant warning of a danger incident to his employment, it must appear that the master knew or ought to have known of the danger, and that the servant injured did not know and had not equal means with the master of knowing such fact, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have known it. If the danger be obvious and as easily known to the servant as to the master, the latter will not be liable for failing to give warning of it. Civ. Code 1896, §§ 2611, 2612; *Commercial Guano Co. v. 2. DEMURRER TO PETITION.

Applying these principles to the allegations of the petition in the present case, no cause of action was set forth, and the court properly sustained a general demurrer to the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by B. J. Hendrix against the Vale Royal Manufacturing Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The substance of the petition, now material, was as follows: The plaintiff, 27 years of age, without experience in the operation of saws, was employed by defendant to operate a "bolting" saw in a shingle mill, and was instructed by defendant in its use. He continually operated the "bolting" saw for two weeks, when he was directed by defendant to operate a "shingle" saw. Being unfamiliar with the operation of a "shingle" saw, he so informed the defendant and asked to be instructed as to its operation. Defendant replied that instructions were not necessary, and directed the plaintiff to proceed to use the saw. He therefore began the operation of the "shingle" saw, "and, while making the first attempt to remove waste product remaining from the making of shingles, had his left hand caught by the machinery of the shingle saw," and three of his fingers thereby cut off. It was alleged, that a "bolting" saw is operated by hand, its purpose being to cut blocks of timber into suitable widths for shingles, while the "shingle" saw "is run by machinery, works very rapidly, and is dangerous to one not accustomed to its operation, its purpose being to split into shingles the blocks as they are delivered from the bolting saw," and therefore that the plaintiff's experience in the operation of the "bolting" saw could not aid him in the operation of the "shingle" saw. "The saw of the shingle is stationary, working in a horizontal plane." It "is fed from a carriage or superstructure, upon which is placed the shingle block. The carriage, working in a plane parallel with the saw, brings the block to the edge of the saw and at the height necessary to insure the proper thickness of the shingle, dropping the shingle into a chute, returns, and again brings the remaining portion of the block to the edge of the saw, cutting off another shingle. The carriage works from left to right; operator, facing the saw, adjusts the block upon the carriage and removes the waste or portion of the block from which no shingle could be cut. The carriage moves rapidly; and it is impossible for one not accustomed to judging such matters to determine from inspection the speed at which the carriage is moving, the carriage moving more rapidly than it appears." "Said shingle saw was dangerous in its operation to one without experience, and the danger was not apparent, and the petitioner did not know of the danger, and could not have known in the exercise of ordinary care; it being necessary, to operate said saw safely, to understand and appreciate that the carriage moved more rapidly than was apparent, which knowledge could only have been obtained from experience or proper training; and, further, that the proper time for the operator to move the waste product was when the carriage was moving from right to left, and not, as did your petitioner attempt to move the same, while the carriage was moving from left to right. * * * This difference was not apparent to an inexperienced man, and could not have been known in the exercise of ordinary care. * * * These dangers were known to the company, as was * * * petitioner's inexperience and unfamiliarity with the use of the machine. * * * It was the duty of the company to have instructed * * * petitioner in the operation of the saw, and to have warned him of the dangers incident to such operation."

Action by the Barton-Price Company against Murphy & Co. A demurrer to the petition was sustained, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The Barton-Price Company, a Kentucky corporation, brought an action for damages against Murphy & Co., of Richmond county, Ga. The substance of the allegations of the plaintiff's petition was as follows: Murphy & Co. brought an attachment proceeding in a justice's court against the Atlas Hay & Grain Company and the Barton-Price Company to recover the amount of an account alleged to be due to plaintiffs by defendants, the ground of the attachment being that defendants were nonresidents. A summons of garnishment was issued against the Irish-American National Bank, and one was also issued against C. A. Doolittle & Son. The bank answered that it had in its possession "bill of lading for car S. A. L. No. 19464, which said bill of lading was made out to the Atlas Hay & Grain Company, consignor and consignee," and that at the time of the service of the summons of garnishment an assignment, dated July 6, 1905, was in its hands, and it held the bill of lading subject to the order of the Barton-Price Company. Attached to the answer of the bank was the original assignment or transfer of the bill of lading by the Atlas Hay & Grain Company to the Barton-Price Company, from which it appeared that it was executed in Louisville, Ky., on July 6, 1905. C. A. Doolittle & Son answered, that, at the time of the service of the summons of garnishment upon them, they had in their possession "a car S. A. L. No. 19464, upon storage, said car having been stored with [them] by the Georgia Railroad." By consent of the parties, the hay with which the car was loaded was sold and the proceeds arising from the sale deposited with C. A. Doolittle & Son, to await the final determination of the case. Murphy & Co., plaintiffs in the attachment proceedings, filed their declaration, in which they claimed that defendants were indebted to them in the sum of $58.07, as per itemized statement of account thereto attached; but the itemized account attached to the declaration was made out against the Atlas Hay & Grain Company only. The suit was defended only by the Barton-Price Company, the other defendant not entering an appearance in the justice's court. Upon the trial the magistrate awarded judgment in favor of the plaintiffs against both defendants for the principal amount sued for and interest, and then rendered judgment against C. A. Doolittle & Son, as garnishees, "for the contents of car S. A. L. No. 19464." The case was repealed to the superior court by the Barton-Price Company. In the superior court this company reduced its plea to writing and filed the same, wherein it denied that it was indebted to the plaintiffs; that it had ever been jointly associated with the Atlas Hay & Grain Company; and that it had any property that was legally subject to attachment under any claim of the plaintiffs. Upon motion of the plaintiffs, in the superior court, "the attachment against the appellant, the Barton-Price Company," was dismissed. After the dismissal of the attachment as to the Barton-Price Company, Murphy & Co., "without warrant of law, but under an illegal and void execution, unlawfully and illegally seized and took possession of the proceeds of petitioner's said hay, and with full knowledge of the fact that said proceeds were the property of said Barton-Price Company, and converted the same to their own use." The execution issued by the justice of the peace against the defendants in the attachment proceeding in the justice's court "was a nullity and utterly void and invalid, said Atlas Hay & Grain Company being nonresidents of Georgia, and said attachment proceedings having been dismissed by Murphy & Co. as to Barton-Price Company," and no property of the Atlas Hay & Grain Company having been "brought into court so as to confer jurisdiction over it," and there being "none over the property of the Barton-Price Company." The title to the hay was in the Barton-Price Company at the time of the issuance and levy of the attachment, which ownership was well known to Murphy & Co. The attachment proceedings were not sued out in accordance with law, do not set forth any grounds upon which an attachment could be issued, and as to the Barton-Price Company had no basis in fact, and were a deliberate invasion of its rights. The unlawful action of Murphy & Co. was a trespass upon the property and property rights of petitioner; and the appropriation by them of petitioner's property, under and by virtue of said illegal and void execution, was an aggravation and an additional trespass. By reason of these acts of Murphy & Co. petitioner has been damaged in the sum of $1,000 for which it prays judgment. Copies of the various papers or documents and the judgments referred to in the petition were attached thereto as exhibits.

The defendants filed a general demurrer to the petition, which was sustained by the court, and the petitioner excepted.

P. C. O'Gorman and Sidney Smith, for plaintiff in error. Julian J. Zachry, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). When Murphy & Co. dismissed the attachment as to the Barton-Price Company, a foreign corporation, the case stood just as if it had been originally brought against the Atlas Hay & Grain Company alone, and the judgment rendered in the justice's court against the Atlas Hay & Grain Company, as defendant, C. A. Doolittle & Son, as garnishees, and the property in the hands of the latter, did not render such property subject to the judgment, if the property belonged to the Barton-Price Company. As the petition in the present case alleged that the Barton-Price Company, the plaintiff, owned the property which was in the possession of C. A. Doolittle & Son, and that Murphy & Co. appropriated it to their own use, under an execution issued upon the judgment above referred to, it is apparent that the petition, as against a general demurrer, set forth a cause of action for trespass. The failure of the Barton-Price Company to claim the property did not affect its right of action, since the remedy by claim is merely cumulative.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

O'FARRELL v. VONDEREAU.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 29, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 11*)—DESCRIPTION—ADJACENT LAND.

When the boundary given in a deed is the land of a named person, the description of this particular boundary will be sufficient, although the title of such third person may be defective, if it be made to appear that the maker of the deed recognized him as the owner and as claiming the land, and the boundary line of the adjacent tract is established by competent extraneous evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. § 92; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. EXCESSIVE TAX LEVY.

The evidence was sufficient to support the finding of the jury against the contention of the plaintiff that the levy of a tax fi. fa., which was the foundation of a tax deed to claimant's predecessor in title, was void because excessive.

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Action by K. C. O'Farrell against one Ficklin. Judgment for plaintiff, and on a levy of execution, E. H. Vondereau, administrator, filed a claim. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. M. Smith, Henry C. Tuck, and Cobb & Erwin, for plaintiff in error. T. S. Mell, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Mrs. O'Farrell, who was transferee of a mortgage fi. fa. against one Ficklin, had the same levied upon a tract of land embracing 25 acres, to which Vondereau filed a claim. Upon the trial of the issue thus made the jury returned a verdict in favor of the claimant. Vondereau purchased the land in question from one Davis, who purchased it at a tax sale under and by virtue of a tax fi. fa. against Ficklin. The following is a description of the land in the levy of the tax fi. fa. referred to, and substantially the same description of the land is contained in the deed from the sheriff to Davis, and in the deed from Davis to Vondereau: "The tract or lot of land lying in the 216 district, G. M., said county, containing twenty-five acres, it being a part of the W. H. Ficklin lands, bounded on the west by Sandy creek bridge road; on the north by part of the Ficklin lands; on east by unknown street; on south by lands owned by Loan Association of Henrico County, Va., Thomas Potts, Treasurer." For a more detailed statement of the facts, see Moody v. Vondereau, 131 Ga. 521, 62 S. E. 821. The verdict being in favor of the claimant, and the court having overruled a motion for a new trial, the plaintiff in the mortgage fi. fa. excepted. While the motion contains several grounds, in substance the attack upon the verdict is based upon two contentions only. The first is that the sheriff's deed to Davis is void because of insufficiency in the description of the land sold—that is, the tract of land in controversy—and the second ground of attack is that this deed was void because of the excessive levy by virtue of which the tax sale at which Davis was purchaser was made.

1. An examination of the levy under which the tax sale was made, and of the deed to Davis, the purchaser at the sale, discloses that the western and eastern boundaries of the tract of land in question are, respectively, a road and a street; and while the street is described as an unknown street, and the character of the road which constituted the western boundary of the land is somewhat in question, both road and street are sufficiently fixed and certain as boundaries of the tract of land on the western and eastern sides. Now, if the southern boundary can be determined and is susceptible of exact location, then, as the deed calls for a definite acreage, the determination of the northern boundary becomes merely a matter of mathematical calculation. The southern boundary calls for the land "owned by Loan Association of Henrico County, Va., Thomas Potts, Treasurer." A tax deed from Weir, sheriff, to Thomas Potts, was introduced in evidence. This deed conveyed "about 25 acres of land, more or less, in Clarke county, Georgia, in the corporate limits of the city of Athens, and bounded as follows: On the west by Sandy creek bridge road, on the north by other lands of W. H. Ficklin, on the south and east by streets, said land being in a triangular shape." In the case of Moody v. Vondereau, supra, it was said: "Any description will suffice which identifies the land with such certainty that the specific parcel intended to be granted can be ascertained, either by the calls of the instrument as applied to the land, or by aid of the descriptive portions of the grant." And in the same case it was said that even if it be conceded that the deed from Weir, sheriff, to the Loan Association of Henrico County was invalid because of its indefinite description of the land, it would not follow from this circumstance that the call for the loan association tract as a southern boundary could not furnish a line of boundary between the parcel of land claimed to be owned by the loan association and that sold to Davis. "The call of the Davis deed for the southern boundary therein described is not for the deed to Potts, treasurer, or any lines fixed in that deed, but for the line of another tract of land, viz., that of the Loan Association of Henrico County, Va. Where the line of another tract is called for in the description of a deed as one of the boundaries of the land conveyed, the line must be run to such boundary line. If the boundary is given as the land of another, the description of this particular boundary will be sufficient, although the name of the person given as an adjoining owner may be incorrect, if it be made to appear that the maker of the deed recognized him as the owner, and as claiming the land at the time the deed was made. 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 1014. The designation of another tract as a boundary is part of the description of the land conveyed, and extrinsic evidence is admissible to show its location. When this is done, the line of such tract becomes the boundary line of the land called for by the deed." Moody v. Vondereau, 131 Ga. 525, 62 S. E. 821. And we are of the opinion that on the last trial of this case there was sufficient evidence from which the jury would be authorized to find that the northern boundary of the tract of land referred to as Potts land (that is, the land sold to the loan association) had been surveyed and located so as to be capable of ascertainment at the time of the levy of the tax fi. fa. under which the tax sale of the land in controversy to Davis was made. We do not think that the fact that the loan association of which Potts was treasurer may never have had any title to the land known as the Potts land, because of the defect in the sheriff's deed to the loan association, affects the question under consideration. It is not a question as to who was the actual owner of the land, the northern boundary of which is called for as the southern boundary of the tract of land conveyed by deed from Davis to Vondereau; but the question is whether that northern boundary of the first tract of land had been located and surveyed and so known at the time of the levy under which the tax sale was made to Davis; and, if the boundary of the Potts land had been surveyed and located, then the oral testimony of those who knew of the location and survey, together with the description in the deed from the sheriff to Davis, could render the identification of the lands conveyed at the tax sale to Davis complete, and the deed from the sheriff to Davis was not void for want of sufficiency in description, and the deed from Davis to the claimant likewise was not so wanting in sufficiency of description as to be invalid.

2. The question as to whether or not the levy of the tax fi. fa. by virtue of which at a tax sale the property in controversy was sold and conveyed to Davis was excessive and the sheriff's deed to Davis void was submitted under the court's instructions (to which the plaintiff in error takes no exception) to the jury, and there was sufficient evidence to uphold their finding.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§§ 19, 65*)—
"SET-OFF" — DISMISSAL AFTER SET-OFF FILED.

After a plea of set-off is filed, the plaintiff cannot dismiss his action so as to interfere with the plea, unless by leave of the court, on sufficient cause shown, and on terms prescribed by the court. Civ. Code 1895, § 3754. A plea of set-off is a cross-action, and, after it is filed, the defendant is entitled to prove his case, and, if the evidence authorizes it, he is entitled to a judgment. A plaintiff cannot defeat this right by dismissing the original action in vacation, nor can the court on its own motion dismiss or nonsuit the case, and thus deprive the defendant of the benefit of his cross-action. Lewis v. Wall, 70 Ga. 649.

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 19*)—GROUNDS.

The defendant having been served in the county in which the suit was filed, and having filed an answer pleading a set-off, without protest as to the jurisdiction of the court, and there being no evidence to the effect that the defendant was not a resident of that county, the plaintiff had no ground for dismissing its suit or for complaining of the judgment rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 33-36; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

3. CONTINUANCE (§ 20*)—GROUNDS—ABSENCE OF COUNSEL.

It appearing that the plaintiff was notified that its case, in which the plea of set-off had been filed, had been set for trial upon the calendar for a certain day, and was, by the notice, informed that the defendant was insisting upon this plea of set-off, and it further appearing that neither the plaintiff nor its counsel (though the plaintiff had more than one attorney) was present to prosecute the action, and the only reason assigned by the plaintiff for failure to be present being the absence of one of its attorneys, and the showing for his absence being insufficient; held, that the trial judge did not err in proceeding with the trial, nor in refusing to grant a motion for a new trial, based upon the ground that a continuance should have been granted.

Error from City Court of Polk County;
F. A. Irwin, Judge.

Action by E. E. Forbes Piano Company against Will Hixon. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

F. W. Copeland and Geo. A. H. Harris & Sons, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Tison, W. H. Trawick, and E. S. Ault, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The E. E. Forbes Piano Company brought a suit against Hixon in the city court of Polk county for $528.46. To this petition the defendant filed a plea of set-off, admitting the plaintiff's claim, but exhibiting a larger counterclaim in his own favor, and asking a judgment against the plaintiff for the excess, amounting to $118.61. Attached to the plea was a statement in which there purported to be very minutely detailed every transaction between the plaintiff and the defendant during the period in which the defendant was employed by the plaintiff. The defendant's answer was filed June 19, 1909, and on December 11, 1909, the general manager of the plaintiff company undertook to have the suit dismissed, without the consent of the company's attorneys, and, so far as appears from the record, without the knowledge of the court. The case coming on regularly for trial at the January term, 1910, the defendant testified to the correctness of the various items of the statement attached to his plea of set-off, and that the amount in excess of the plaintiff's demand, for which he asked judgment, was correct and due; and a verdict and judgment were rendered in his favor. Before the adjournment of the court the plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial, which was refused; and exception is taken to the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial.

It appears that the plaintiff not only did not have the consent of the defendant, which was essential, in order to enable it to dismiss the suit, but that it paid the costs, and attempted to withdraw the action without regard to the plea of set-off, without leave of the court, and over the protest of the attorneys who had filed the suit. Under the provisions of the Civil Code of 1895, § 3754, after a plea of set-off is filed, a plaintiff cannot dismiss his action so as to affect the plea of set-off, unless by leave of the court on sufficient cause shown, and on the terms prescribed by the court. While, therefore, the plaintiff had the right to dismiss the suit, or at least to abandon the hope of a recovery against the defendant, it could not prevent the defendant's recovering against it, unless the defendant failed to prove his claim or the plaintiff disproved it to the satisfaction of the jury. The court therefore did not err in proceeding with the trial, even after the attempt of the plaintiff to dismiss the action.

The court went to the trouble of having the plaintiff notified that the case had been set down for trial upon the calendar fixed for the January term. It was not required that this should be done. The counsel who filed the plaintiff's petition also notified its general manager that the case had been set for trial. And yet there was no appearance on the part of the plaintiff company, either by its general manager or any other representative of the company, or by either of its counsel. The contention is made that the court erred in refusing a new trial, because the case should have been continued on account of the absence of one of the attorneys. We do not think the court erred in not continuing the case. The court was not required to continue it on his own motion without any showing whatever. We do not say that there are not instances in which it may sometimes be proper to give a case this direction, but certainly, under the facts appearing in this record, the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in not granting a continuance. The only reason given by the general manager for his absence is that one of his attorneys was unable to attend at that term of the court. The absence of the attorney did not afford any legal reason for the absence of the plaintiff's agent. He should have been present to supply the necessary proof as to the absence of his counsel, the fact that such counsel was employed, and to show the court why he could not safely go to trial in the absence of such counsel. The plaintiff had more than one attorney. Only the absence of the leading counsel would, in any view of the case, have required a continuance; and it was for the plaintiff in the first instance to let the court know upon which attorney he most relied. Certainly the absence of the attorney under the circumstances we have mentioned afforded no excuse for the absence of the client, and, if it did, the court had no information upon the subject. Taking the affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney to be true, no reason is shown why the court was not informed of the facts to which the absence of counsel was due; and, furthermore, the facts stated did not present a sufficient reason for a continuance of the case, because it does not appear that Mr. Copeland (the absent attorney referred to) was the sole attorney, or that there was any reason why his presence was more necessary in Chattooga county court than in the city court of Polk county. We are clear that the judge did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial. The showing made authorized the inference that the plaintiff was so extremely negligent of its interests that it cannot ask relief. The fullness with which the facts are stated, in connection with the rulings in the second and third headnotes, render any further elaboration unnecessary. Judgment affirmed.

Error from City Court of Nashville; R. Eve, Judge.

Action by J. W. Sutton and others against S. T. Tygart. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hendricks & Christian, for plaintiff in error. J. P. Knight and W. G. Harrison, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiffs sued for damages resulting from an alleged breach of contract. The jury found a verdict in their favor for the full amount of the suit, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled. The case made by the plaintiffs may be stated in substance as follows: They bought from the defendant a gasoline engine with express warranties. After a trial of the engine, it failed to fulfill these warranties, and they so informed the defendant, who then agreed with them that if they would give him two promissory notes, aggregating the sum of $625, he would furnish them, in lieu of the gasoline engine, a steam engine and boiler, and that the two notes would be a payment by them on the steam engine and boiler, to be furnished in the early autumn; that relying upon these representations, and with the understanding that he was to furnish to them a steam engine and boiler and that the notes were to be accepted as a payment thereon, they executed and delivered to him two promissory notes; that, after getting possession of these two notes, he transferred them for value, before due, to an innocent purchaser, and, as they had no defense to the notes, they being negotiable notes in the hands of an innocent purchaser, they were compelled to pay them to the holder. They charge that the defendant acted in bad faith in his representations made to them when they executed the notes; that he did not intend to furnish the steam engine and boiler in pursuance of his agreement and promise; and that although they frequently demanded that he comply with his contract and furnish the steam engine and boiler, tendering to him the gasoline engine, he refused to do so; and the suit is to recover as damages the amount of the two notes. Their petition contained also a count for other damages resulting to them from the failure of the defendant to comply with his contract, but that count was stricken on demurrer, and the suit was tried alone on the count to recover the amount of the two notes as damages. The defendant denied the allegations of the plaintiffs, and contended that they bought from him the gasoline engine under an express warranty, that the engine fulfilled the warranty, and that the notes were given by the plaintiffs in payment of the gasoline engine. He denied specifically that any rescission was made of the first contract, or that he agreed to take back the gasoline engine and to furnish a steam engine and boiler. On the issues thus made in the pleadings and the proof, the jury settled the conflict in favor of the plaintiffs, and, as the evidence of the plaintiffs fully supports the verdict, this court is not authorized to interfere, unless the trial court committed some material legal error prejudicial to the defendant.

The principal ground of defense relied upon, presented both by the general demurrer and by exceptions to the evidence, was that the notes sued on were unconditional contracts in writing, and that the plaintiffs were attempting to set up an additional or verbal contract at variance therewith. We do not think that this well-settled principle of law is applicable to the facts of this case as shown by the evidence of the plaintiffs and as found true by the jury. According to this evidence, there was a mutual rescission of the first contract, and another contract was made, which was breached by the defendant. Of course, the parties had the right to mutually rescind the first contract. Civ. Code 1895, § 3710.

The defendant insists that the purchasers could not have defended against the notes for the purchase money of the gasoline engine, and, inasmuch as they had paid the notes, they could not recover for the breach of the contract. Even under this test, we think the purchasers of the engine could have defended against the notes if they had been sued by the payee, for in such a suit they could have inquired into the consideration of the notes, and, under a plea of a breach of express warranty, which is substantially equivalent to a plea of failure of consideration, could have shown that the consideration had failed because the warranties made at the time of the purchase had not been satisfied. Therefore, if the notes were given for the purchase of the gasoline engine as claimed by the defendant, this did not preclude an inquiry into the consideration, and proof of the failure of consideration, because the express warranties had not been fulfilled. See the recent case of Pryor v. Ludden & Bates Southern Music House, 134 Ga. —, 67 S. E. 654, where the court fully discusses what is known as the "parol evidence rule," and cases in which it is applicable, and also cases in which it is not applicable. But, as before stated, the jury found that the contentions of the plaintiffs were true, that the sale of the gasoline engine had been rescinded by mutual consent, and that the notes were not given in payment of the gasoline engine, but were to be credited by the defendant on the new steam engine and boiler which he agreed to furnish them in lieu of the gasoline engine, which had not come up to the express warranties and which had proven unsatisfactory. Under these facts, it is clear that the particular phase of the parol evidence rule is not applicable. The ruling on this point disposes of the main defense set up, and of the different views of the defense presented to this court by demurrer, and the majority of the grounds contained in the motion for a new trial as amended, and really leaves in the case only one material question for the decision of this court, to wit, whether the amount of the notes was, under the evidence, the correct measure of damages.

It is insisted by plaintiff in error that the only measure of damages was the difference between the purchase price of the gasoline engine and its value on the day of the breach of the contract, if any breach was shown, and that, as the plaintiffs did not attempt to show the value of the gasoline engine, the verdict was without any evidence to support it. We do not concur in this opinion. The verdict of the jury, finding the contentions of the plaintiffs to be the truth of the case, eliminated the gasoline engine entirely. The notes which the plaintiffs had to pay in the hands of an innocent holder were given in pursuance of the new agreement entered into, and were to be credited on the steam engine and boiler. This steam engine and boiler were never furnished to the plaintiffs by the defendant. They were therefore entitled to recover from him the amount of the notes which they had been compelled to pay, and the consideration of which, so far as the defendant was concerned, had completely failed. They got nothing for these notes, and, as the defendant had breached his contract, according to the verdict of the jury, they were entitled to be paid the amount of the notes. From the amount of the notes, if the defense had been made and the evidence had supported it, the rental value of the gasoline engine during the time it had been used by the plaintiffs should have been deducted, and the difference would have constituted the true measure of damages under the facts of this case. But, as no such defense was made, the jury did not err in finding as the true measure of damages the amount of the notes with interest thereon.

In our opinion no error of law was committed by the trial court, and there is sufficient evidence in the record to support the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§§ 179, 192*)—LIEN FOR SERVICES—NATURE.

The statutory lien given to an attorney at law arises upon his employment, and is perfected by the ultimate recovery of the judgment for his client. As between the attorney and the client, or as between the attorney and other creditors of the client, it is not essential to the validity of the lien that it should be filed or recorded, or enforced by foreclosure.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Dec. Dig. §§ 179, 192.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 538*)—PETITION—TIME FOR FILING—WAIVER BY DEFENDANT—EFFECT.

The defendant can waive the time of the filing of the petition, so as to authorize the rendition of a judgment binding upon him at a term earlier than that at which the case would be in order for trial according to statute, but the judgment so rendered would not affect the interests of third persons. Except as to the defendant himself, his waiver neither enlarges nor diminishes the jurisdiction of the court. If such consent is entered, but the case is not tried until the court has acquired jurisdiction regularly, the judgment then rendered is within the usual statutory jurisdiction of the court and is as binding as ordinary judgments. The delay in trying the case and entering judgment until the court has acquired jurisdiction according to law makes the waiver as to the time of filing the petition wholly immaterial.

4. EXECUTION (§ 324*)—PREFERRED CLAIMS.

Under Civ. Code 1895, § 2814, par. 3, giving an attorney a lien upon property recovered in suits for recovery of personalty for his fees, superior to all liens except those for taxes, which may be enforced by the attorney or his representative as liens upon personalty and realty, by mortgage and foreclosure, attorneys are entitled to have their liens for services paid out of the fund arising from execution sale of defendant's property which they have recovered as attorneys.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Proceedings for distribution of a fund in a sheriff's hands realized from an execution sale. From the order of distribution, Burgin & Sons Glass Company and others bring error. Affirmed.

Wm. W. Gordon, Jr., for plaintiffs in error.
Cann, Barrow & McIntire, A. L. Alexander, and Edmund H. Abrahams, for defendants in error.

HILL, O. J. The questions in this case arise on a rule against the sheriff to distribute a fund in his hands realized from the sale of personal property under execution. By consent the questions were submitted to the judge, without the intervention of a jury. The claimants of the fund and the claims thereon were: (1) Burgin & Sons Glass Company, under a judgment dated February 7, 1908. On this judgment an execution had been issued, and the property of the defendant sold by the sheriff, and the fund then in court for distribution realized. (2) Burgin & Sons Glass Company claimed an attorney's fee and costs for bringing this fund into court. (3) A justice's court execution in favor of Bishop & Babcock Company dated November 9, 1907. (4) An execution in favor of Witteman Bros., from the city court of Savannah, dated September 9, 1907. (5) A claim of lien by Cann, Barrow & McIntire for attorney's fees, for recovery of the property of the defendant in execution which had been sold by the sheriff, and from which the fund for distribution had been realized. (6) Costs of court. The fund was not sufficient to pay all the claims, and the court, after hearing the evidence, directed the sheriff to pay it out in the following order of distribution: (1) Cann, Barrow & McIntire, $50; (2) costs of court; (3) execution in favor of Witteman Bros.; (4) execution in favor of Bishop & Babcock Company; (5) the balance of the fund, if any, to Burgin & Sons Glass Company's execution. The court disallowed the fee claimed by Burgin & Sons Glass Company for bringing the fund into court. Burgin & Sons Glass Company and Bishop & Babcock Company except to this judgment of distribution, in so far as it holds that Cann, Barrow & McIntire were entitled to a lien as attorneys, and to the preference of payment awarded to the execution in favor of Witteman Bros., and to the disallowance of an attorney's fee for bringing the fund into court. The specific grounds of objection will sufficiently appear in the course of this opinion.

The evidence pertinent to these grounds of objection, briefly stated, is as follows: Cann, Barrow & McIntire, as attorneys, had recovered from the trustee in bankruptcy the property which had been levied upon by the sheriff and sold under an execution in favor of Burgin & Sons Glass Company against the Kalola Company, and out of which the funds in the hands of the court for distribution had been realized. The contention was that these attorneys had not filed for record in the clerk's office their claim of lien on the property alleged to have been recovered by them, and had taken no steps otherwise to enforce it, but had appeared at the sheriff's sale of the property, and had then given notice that they did claim a lien on the property sold; that they did not in any manner take any steps to assert their lien against the property, and should not now be allowed to come into court, without having complied with any of the statutory requirements for the enforcement of their lien as attorneys, and claim the fund realized from the sale of the property on the mere proof of their services in recovering it; that to have entitled them to a lien on the fund in question they should not only have filed and recorded their lien, but should have perfected it by foreclosure. As to the execution in favor of Witteman Bros., the evidence shows that Witteman Bros. brought suit against the Kalola Company in the city court of Savannah, at the November term, 1906; that the petition was not filed, as required by the statute, 14 days before the return day of the court, but was filed on the first day of the term, and there was no process annexed to the petition. There was a written waiver of the time of filing and of process and service, and an acknowledgment of service by counsel for the defendant. The judgment was rendered on this suit on September 9, 1907, and an execution issued thereon on September 11, 1907.

1. The court did not err in holding that Cann, Barrow & McIntire were entitled to an attorney's lien, and that this lien should be first paid out of the fund arising from the sale of the property of the defendant which they had recovered as attorneys. Civ. Code 1895, § 2814, par. 8. The statutory lien given to an attorney at law arises upon his employment, and is perfected by the ultimate recovery of the judgment for his client. Lovett v. Moore, 98 Ga. 158, 26 S. E. 498. "As between the attorney and his client, or as between him and other creditors of the latter, the filing or recording of his assertion claiming a lien on the property recovered by him is not essential to its validity." To make it good against innocent purchasers of the property it must be filed and recorded, but as against the client and other creditors such filing and recording are not necessary in order to make it a valid lien on the property. Civ. Code 1895, § 2814, par. 4; Coleman v. Austin, 99 Ga. 629, 27 S. E. 763.

2. The court did not err under the facts of the case in holding that the execution in favor of Witteman Bros., which was based on a judgment prior in date to the judgments in favor of the other claims, was entitled to precedence. The validity of the judgment in favor of Witteman Bros. is assailed on the ground that suit was not filed within 14 days of the first day of the term as required by the statute, but was filed on the first day of the term, and because there was no valid process, and it is insisted that these two defects rendered this judgment void as to third parties, whatever might be its validity as to the defendant. In so far as the lack of process is concerned, the defendant would have the right to waive process (Civ. Code 1895, § 4983), and, even without an express waiver, appearance and pleading to the merits as in this case would in law amount to a waiver (Civ. Code, § 4981), and a judgment thereafter rendered would be binding, not only upon the defendant, but upon all persons. We do not think, however, that the statutory period within which the law requires a petition to be filed, can be waived by the defendant, so as to prejudice the rights of third persons. The waiver would be good as to him, but would not confer such jurisdiction upon the court as would authorize it to render a judgment that would be valid against the rights of third persons. The Civil Code, in section 5079, expressly declares that while "parties by consent, express or implied, cannot give jurisdiction to the court as to the person or subject-matter of the suit, it may, however, be waived, so far as the rights of the parties are concerned, but not so as to prejudice third persons." If, therefore, the facts in this case show that the rights of third persons were prejudiced by the waiver of the defendant as to the time of filing the petition of Witteman Bros., the judgment rendered in the case would be invalid as to them. The suit was marked filed as on the first day of the November term, 1906. The statute requires suits to be filed 14 days before the term, and therefore the suit was returnable to the next term of the court, which would have been in January, 1907. The plaintiff did not take a judgment on the suit until September 9, 1907, which was in the third term of the court after the term to which the suit was brought, and the trial judge put his ruling on the ground that the delay in taking the judgment until the third term of the court to which the suit was filed rendered the waiver of filing immaterial and harmless, in so far as the rights of these judgment creditors were concerned. The judgment was not rendered any earlier because of the consent, but was rendered at a term when, without the waiver, judgment was in order.

The case of American Grocery Co. v. Kennedy, 100 Ga. 462, 28 S. E. 241, which is relied upon by plaintiff in error, is distinguished from this case by the fact that the judgment in that case was rendered on the first day of the term, which was the day of the filing of the suit, and because of this fact the judgment was prejudicial to the rights of the other creditors, and therefore was not binding upon them. The determining factor in the case is whether the judgment in any way prejudiced the rights of other creditors of the defendant because of the waiver. The defendant could not waive the time of filing so as to affect prejudicially the rights of third persons; and if this waiver did not and could not have affected prejudicially the rights of third persons, the judgment would be valid as against them. In other words, it is against the policy of the law that a defendant, by waiving the statutory requirement as to the time of filing suits against him, should be permitted to give an advantage to one creditor over others who have obtained their judgments at the time and in the manner prescribed by law. Beach v. Atkinson, 87 Ga. 292, 13 S. E. 591; Georgia R. Co. v. Harris, 5 Ga. 527.

3. Where property is sold under execution, and the fund is before the court for distribution, and the court awards it to a claim other than that of the selling execution, there is no law under which the attorney for the plaintiff whose execution had sold the property would be entitled to a fee out of the fund for bringing it into court.

Judgment affirmed.

CARRIERS (§ 134*)—LOSS OF FREIGHT—EVIDENCE.

No error of law appears, and the verdict is supported by the evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by the Mercantile Claim Company against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Payne, Little & Jones and M. F. Goldstein, for plaintiff in error. Thos. L. Bishop, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The Mercantile Claim Company, as transferee, sued the Central of Georgia Railway Company for the value of 18 boxes of cigars lost in transit. The justice's court rendered a judgment for the plaintiff, and an appeal was taken to a jury in the superior court. On the trial a verdict was found for the plaintiff, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled. The evidence, briefly stated, is as follows: A shipment of seven cases of cigars was made from Ybor City, Fla., on June 12, 1906, consigned to R. F. Wynne, Atlanta, Ga. The cigars were received by the consignee in Atlanta on June 20, 1906. The shipment was checked over by the clerk of the defendant company in connection with the receiving clerk of the consignee. It was found that one case was in a damaged condition. One case had been apparently broken open and was apparently short 18 boxes of cigars, and one of the other boxes had also been broken open and all the cigars taken out of that box except two. The case in which the shortage appeared had been recoopered. The testimony showed that each case when full should contain 100 boxes of cigars, and the recoopered box, when received in Atlanta, contained only 82 boxes. The physical condition of the shipment and the shortage were noted by the agent of the railroad company in Atlanta in the freight bill which was presented to the consignee, and this condition of the shipment was also shown by the testimony of the consignee and his clerk. The clerk of the consignee testified that he did not know how many boxes of cigars had been shipped in the cases, although when full they should contain 100 boxes; that he used the invoice which had been sent to the consignee by the shipper for the purpose of checking the number of cigars or boxes received, and from this invoice there appeared to be a shortage of 18 boxes. The bill of lading, which was not introduced, but the contents of which were proved without objection, called for seven cases of cigars. The defendant objected to the testimony of the receiving clerk as to his having the invoice, when he checked the shipment; the objection being that the invoice was secondary and hearsay evidence, and was not competent for the purpose of showing the number of cigars which had been received by the railroad company. The court admitted the testimony of the receiving clerk that he had the invoice before him when he checked the cases and that from the invoice he discovered that they checked short; but instructed the jury on this point that the testimony relating to the invoice was admitted not for the purpose of showing that what the invoice claimed was actually shipped, but as showing the circumstances surrounding the checking. There are several exceptions made in the amended motion for a new trial, but all of them are really embraced in the general exception that the verdict was without any evidence to support it; it being insisted by the special exceptions that the only evidence of the amount of the shipment and the alleged shortage was shown by the contents of the invoice, which was incompetent evidence for that purpose.

We do not think the court erred in allowing the testimony of the receiving clerk of the consignee that he had used the invoice for the purpose of checking the cigars, and that there appeared to be a shortage. The invoice was not used to show the shipment, nor to show how many boxes each case of cigars contained when received by the defendant company, but the circumstance that the cigars did check short by the invoice was admissible to repel any inference that the consignee got all the cigars that he expected to get. The bill of lading showed that the company had received seven cases of cigars from the shipper. The presumption of law was that these cases were all received in good order. The undisputed testimony was that each case, when full, would contain 100 boxes of cigars. When the seven cases received in good order by the railroad company at the point of shipment were received at the point of destination in Atlanta, it was found that the lid of a case had been broken open, and that this case contained only 82 boxes of cigars, and the case had also been recoopered. It was a reasonable deduction from these facts that this one case had been damaged and the contents thereof lost while it was in the possession of the defendant company. It had been received in good order, and it is fair to presume that it contained the same number of boxes as were contained in the other cases of equal size, ordered at the same time. Seven cases of cigars, containing 100 boxes to the case, were ordered by the consignee. Seven cases apparently in good order were received by the railroad company; and, when the shipment reached its destination in Atlanta, one of the cases had been broken open and there was an apparent shortage of 18 boxes of cigars, and the case had been recoopered. It seems to us that this evidence was sufficient to support the verdict for the value of the shortage, in the absence of any testimony by the defendant company.

Judgment affirmed.

SIMS v. STATE (No. 2,880.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 5, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. STATUTES (§ 161*)—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION.

Repeals by implication are not favored, and a later statute will not be construed as repealing a prior act on the same subject, in the absence of express words to that effect, except where the later act is clearly and indubitably contradictory of and repugnant to the former, so that the two acts cannot be reconciled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 230-234; Dec. Dig. § 161.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 45*)—REGULATION OF SALE—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

The act of the Legislature of 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 1112) making it a misdemeanor to sell what is known as "near beer," without first obtaining a license from the ordinary of the county and the payment of $200 a year for the license, was not repealed by the act of 1909 (Acts 1909, p. 63), increasing the license to $300 a year and restricting the sale of such beverages to cities containing 2,500 inhabitants or more by the last census. The two acts are not repugnant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

Error from City Court of La Grange; Frank Harwell, Judge.

W. F. Sims was convicted of illegally selling near beer, and he brings error. Affirmed.

E. T. Moon, for plaintiff in error. Henry Reeves, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Sims was convicted in the city court of La Grange on an accusation charging him with a misdemeanor, "for that * * * on the 1st day of January, 1910, in the city of West Point, Georgia, a city of less than twenty-five hundred inhabitants according to the last census report of the United States, [he] did then and there unlawfully sell and offer for sale in quantities of less than five gallons one bottle of Cook's malt ale, a 'near beer,' a beverage made in imitation of and intended as a substitute for beer, ale, and malt liquors, without first having obtained and paying for a license so to do for the year 1910, from the ordinary of Troup county, Ga." A demurrer was filed to this accusation on the ground that there was no offense charged under the law of this state.

If the allegations of the accusation are sufficient to constitute a misdemeanor under the statutes of this state, the verdict was demanded, as the defendant admitted the act charged against him in the accusation. So the question for decision is the one raised by the demurrer. In support of this demurrer it is said that the act approved September 5, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 1112), was repealed by necessary implication by the act approved August 16, 1909 (Acts 1909, p. 63). Both acts relate to the manufacture and sale of what is commonly known as "near beer." The act of 1908 (which was passed by the Legislature at an extraordinary session) in section 3 makes it a misdemeanor for any firm, person, or corporation to "sell or offer for sale in quantities of less than five gallons any such beverages, drinks, or liquors as are referred to in the first section of this act" ("in imitation of or intended as a substitute for beer, ale, wine, whisky, or other alcoholic, spirituous, or malt liquors") without obtaining a license so to do from the ordinary of the county wherein such business is carried on, and paying, therefor the sum of $200 for each calendar year or part thereof. The act of 1909 in reference to this subject as contained in the general tax act for the support of the government passed by the Legislature that year provides, in section 7, subsec. 3, that "every person, firm, or corporation who shall sell or offer for sale in quantities of less than five gallons any such beverages, drinks, or liquors referred to in the first paragraph of this section," which describes them in the same language as the act of 1908, shall first obtain a license so to do from the ordinary of the county wherein such business is carried on, and shall pay a license tax of $300 for each calendar year or part thereof for each place where the business is carried on, and provides that "no ordinary shall issue any license to any person, firm, or corporation to do or carry on such business outside of * * * the corporate limits of any incorporated city, town, or village of this state, provided further that no such license shall be issued to any one to do or to carry on such business in any town or city of less than 2,500 inhabitants, same to be determined by the last census report of the United States."

There are three modes in which a law or statute can be repealed, viz., expressly, by necessary implication, or where the last of two acts covers the subject-matter of the earlier one, not purporting to amend it, and plainly shows that it was intended to be a substitute for the earlier act, such latter act will operate as a repeal of the earlier act, though the two are not necessarily repugnant. 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 781; Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Atlanta, 113 Ga. 554, 38 S. E. 993, 54 L. R. A. 294; Thornton v. State, 5 Ga. App. 397, 63 S. E. 301. The first and second modes of repeal is not applicable to this case. But it is insisted that the third mode is applicable, and that the act of 1909 repeals by necessary implication the act of 1908, in so far as it refers to the manufacture and sale of what is commonly known as "near beer." We do not concur in this view of the law. We think the act of 1908 which makes it a misdemeanor to manufacture or sell "near beer" in this state without first obtaining a license to do so from the ordinary of the county is still of force, and is simply restricted by the act of 1909. The latter act limits the right to manufacture or sell "near beer" only to those cities in the state which contain a population of more than 2,500 estimated by the last census. It certainly was not intended by the Legislature that the act of 1909 should authorize the manufacture and sale of "near beer" in the state of Georgia in every place except cities of more than 2,500 inhabitants. The purpose of the law was manifestly to prohibit, even under license, the sale of "near beer" in towns of less than 2,500 inhabitants, or in the county; and, if the act of 1909 should be held to repeal the act of 1908 and permit the sale of "near beer" everywhere except in cities of more than 2,500 inhabitants, it would be clearly in the teeth of the manifest purpose of the Legislature in restricting the right to sell or manufacture as it did under the act of 1909; and at last the supreme test is: What was the intention of the Legislature in passing the subsequent act? If that intention was to restrict, and not to repeal, and the two acts are not in irreconcilable conflict, but can stand together, the court will adopt that construction which is in harmony with the manifest intention of the Legislature.

It is well settled, not only by the Supreme Court of this state, but by all the authorities on the subject, both courts and text-writers, that repeals by implication are not favored, and will never be declared by the courts to exist, except where the latter act is clearly and indubitably contradictory of and repugnant to the former act, and this contradiction and repugnancy are such that the two acts cannot be reconciled. As well expressed by Mr. Black in his work on Interpretation of Laws: "A statute will not be construed as repealing prior acts on the same subject (in the absence of express words to that effect) unless there is an irreconcilable repugnancy between them." See Black on Interpretation of Laws, 56, 112. See, also, Montgomery v. Board of Education, 74 Ga. 41, where a similar ruling is made and supported by many citations of authorities. Indeed, in the Montgomery Case, supra, in the body of the opinion, Mr. Justice Hall declares that the doubt expressed by the Supreme Court in Central Railroad v. Hamilton, 71 Ga. 461, that such a thing as a repeal of a statute by implication did not exist under the Constitution of 1877, was not merely a suggestion of the court in that case, but was an opinion expressed upon mature deliberation, after an able argument by learned and able counsel. Perhaps this question of repeal by implication has never been better expressed than in the quotation from Potter's Dwarfs on Statutes, used by the Supreme Court in the Montgomery Case, supra: "Nor hath a later act of Parliament ever been construed to repeal a prior act, unless there be a repugnancy or contrariety in them, or at least some notice taken of the former act."

so as to indicate an intention in the lawgiver to repeal it. The law does not favor a repeal by implication, unless the repugnance be quite plain. * * * Although, then, two acts of Parliament are seemingly repugnant, yet, if there be no clause of non obstante in the latter, they shall, if possible, have such construction that the latter may not be a repeal of the former by implication."

Applying these general principles, which are well established, to the two acts in question, we think the conclusion is irresistible that the Legislature did not intend that the act of 1909, relating to the manufacture and sale of "near beer," should repeal the act of 1908 on the same subject, but only intended by the act of 1909 to restrict the right of sale under license, given by the act of 1908; that the two acts in this respect are not repugnant or irreconcilable, and both can stand together, harmoniously accomplishing the purpose of the Legislature in both acts, and especially the purpose of the Legislature in the latter act. And we conclude that under these two statutes it is now a misdemeanor in this state to sell what is known as "near beer" or a beverage described in these two acts, with or without license, except in cities of 2,500 inhabitants or more, to be determined by the last census of the United States. We do not think that the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state and of this court holding in effect that indictments or accusations for selling without license, where a license could not be obtained because the county or state prohibited such sale, are analogous or strictly applicable to the situation presented by these two statutes; for in those decisions the underlying principle was that the right to sell or manufacture was absolutely taken away, and under these two statutes the right to sell or manufacture is not taken away, but is simply restricted to certain cities.

The plaintiff in error attacks the constitutionality of both the act of 1908 and the act of 1909, relating to the sale of "near beer," but as these exceptions are not made definitely or specifically, or in proper form for certification to the Supreme Court, this court declines to certify them.

Judgment affirmed.

DAVISON v. BUSH et al. (No. 2,524.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 5, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COURTS (§ 185*)—COUNTY COURTS—APPEAL.

An appeal does not lie from the verdict of a jury in the county court to a jury in the superior court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

Error from Superior Court, Greene County. Action by W. T. Bush and others against C. J. Davison. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jas. Davison, for plaintiff in error. Cobb & Erwin and Miles W. Lewis, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. Bush and others sued Davison in the county court of Greene county. Before the trial the plaintiffs demanded a trial by jury, under the act of 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 41), amending section 4200 of the Civil Code of 1895. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs for $156, and the defendant entered an appeal to a jury in the superior court of Greene county. When the case was reached for trial in the superior court, the plaintiffs moved to dismiss the appeal, upon the following grounds: (1) The law does not authorize an appeal to be entered to the superior court from a verdict rendered by a jury in a county court. (2) Where a trial by jury has been had in a county court, the remedy of the party who is not satisfied with the verdict is certiorari, and not appeal. (3) The defendant, having had a trial by jury in the county court, was not entitled to another trial by jury in the superior court. The judge of the superior court sustained the motion to dismiss the appeal, and this judgment constitutes the sole assignment of error.

Section 4200 of the Civil Code of 1895 provides that all trials in a county court "shall be by the court without a jury in all civil cases." The act of 1908, supra, amended this section as follows: "The trial and judgment in said court (referring to county courts) shall be by the court with a jury of six to be selected from a panel of twelve, each side being entitled to three strikes when demanded by either party ten days before the trial term." Section 4214, providing for appeals from county courts, was left unchanged, and that section provides: "If either party is dissatisfied with the judgment of the county judge, and the principal sum claimed, or damages claimed, exceeds fifty dollars, said party may enter an appeal from such judgment within four days, under the same rules and regulations as are provided for appeals in this Code." It is contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the amendatory act of 1908, supra, was intended to meet the decision of the Supreme Court in De Lamar v. Dollar, 128 Ga. 57, 57 S. E. 85, that as to cases in the county court, where the amount involved was less than $50 there could be no jury trial, and, therefore, the constitutional right of trial by jury was violated by section 4200, and that the Legislature did not have under consideration in the amendatory act the subject of appeals from county courts, and there was no legislative intent to disturb the law of appeals from that court, and if the amendatory act should be construed to take away the right of appeals where the trial was by jury in a county court, that result was inadvertent and unintended. But it is also insisted that the amendatory act of 1908 did not in fact forbid appeal in a county court from the verdict of the jury; that the right to appeal from the judgment of the court means a judgment not only of the court itself without the intervention of a jury, but the judgment of the court rendered on the verdict of a jury; in other words, that although there may have been a verdict of the jury in the county court, the judgment thereon was none the less a judgment of the county court from which an appeal was authorized, although there may have been a verdict upon which the judgment was founded; and it is also insisted by learned counsel that to construe the act of 1908, supra, as taking away the right of appeal in a county court, where there had been a verdict of the jury, would be to repeal section 4214 of the Civil Code of 1895, and that repeals by implication are not favored by the courts, and will not be declared, unless the alleged repealing act is irreconcilably repugnant to the existing statute. We do not think that the act of 1908 was intended by the Legislature to repeal any part of section 4214 of the Code, supra; nor do we think that that act is in any sense repugnant to that section. The act of 1908 was the legislative expression of the policy of our law, which is to give to every litigant at least one trial by jury, if he desires it. Before the act of 1908, in a county court, a trial by jury in a civil case could not be had, and, therefore, where the amount involved exceeded $50, a dissatisfied litigant in the county court was given the right to appeal his case to a jury in the superior court from the judgment of the county judge. By the act of 1908 either party is given the right to a jury trial in the county court, upon timely demand. But if no demand is made in the county for a jury trial, then section 4200 still applies, and the judge would try the case without the intervention of a jury with the right to appeal from his judgment to a jury in the superior court under section 4214. So we think that the purpose of the Legislature in the act of 1908 was simply to give to a litigant his constitutional right of one jury trial. In other words, that under the law as it is now written a litigant in a county court can either demand a jury in that court, or he can appeal from the judgment of that court to a jury in the superior court. Article 6, § 4, par. 6, of the Constitution of this state, provides that "the General Assembly may provide for an appeal from one jury in the superior and city courts to another." But there is no provision made by the Legislature to authorize an appeal from a jury in the county court to a jury in the superior court, and the Legislature has never attempted to grant this right, and the failure of the Legislature to provide a mode of appeal from a verdict of a jury in one court to a jury in another court is an equivalent to a declaration that none exists. It must be borne in mind that the technical right of appeal was unknown to the common law, and exists only by statute or constitutional provision. 2 Amer. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 425; 2 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 15, 16, 17; 2 Cyc. 515, 519. Where no appeal is provided for by statute, it would seem that certiorari would be the proper remedy, for this right is always available, unless taken away by statute, to correct the errors of inferior tribunals, and is a common-law remedy. 6 Cyc. p. 745. In Roser v. Marlowe, R. M. Charlton, 543, it is said, referring to the remedies of certiorari and appeal, that "the nature of the two remedies is well understood, and one of the distinctions which has been drawn between them is that an appeal can only be had when it is expressly given, and a certiorari always lies, unless it has been expressly taken away." See, also, Fontano v. Mosely, 121 Ga. 46, 48 S. E. 707; Riggell v. Sirmans, 123 Ga. 455, 51 S. E. 381. Section 4141 of the Civil Code of 1895 contemplates that an appeal will lie in a justice court to a jury in that court or in the superior court, but denies the right of appeal from a jury in the justice's court to a jury in the superior court, and this seems to be in harmony with the policy of our law, which, as before stated, is to insure to each litigant one trial by jury. Of course, we do not refer to new trials which may be granted on motions filed for that purpose. Section 4215 of the Civil Code of 1895 does not expressly take away the right to certiorari in county courts where the amount involved is more than $50, and section 4634 is probably broad enough to give this right; but even if the right of certiorari was not given by this statute, it would exist under the common law. But it is not necessary to the decision of this case for this court to decide what was the remedy for the plaintiff in error. We are clear that under the law an appeal from a verdict of the jury in the county court to a jury in the superior court was not his remedy, and for this reason that the judgment of the superior court in dismissing the appeal was proper.

WILSON v. BROCK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 347)—CRIMINAL CONVERSATION—PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

In an action by a husband for criminal conversation with his wife, an amendment alleging that the defendant administered drugs to the plaintiff's wife as a means of accomplishing her debauchery, and that as soon as he discovered the illicit relations between his wife and the defendant the plaintiff took his children and separated from his wife, is germane to the original action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 252*)—CRIMINAL CONVERSATION—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

There was no evidence to show connivance and collusion of the husband with the wife's adulterous intercourse, and a request for an instruction relating to the effect of such connivance and collusion was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

3. REQUESTS COVERED BY GENERAL CHARGE.

In so far as the requests to charge relating to acts occurring without the statute of limitation were pertinent and legal, they were covered by the general charge.

4. INSTRUCTIONS PROPER.

Certain instructions are criticised as being without evidence to support them. Upon an examination of the record, we do not think this criticism is meritorious.

5. NEW TRIAL PROPERLY REFUSED.

It was not erroneous to refuse a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, as the showing on this ground did not measure up to the rule as expressed in Berry v. State, 10 Ga. 511.

6. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The evidence authorized the verdict, which has the approval of the trial judge, and his discretion in refusing a new trial will not be interfered with.

MAYO et al. v. HARRISON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. WILLS (§ 600)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES CREATED.

A testator died in 1865, leaving a will which contained the following item: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife Sarah all the remainder of my estate, both real and personal, 405 acres of land whereon she now lives, three head of horses, my stock cattle and one yoke of work steers and cart, and all my hogs, household and kitchen furniture, and all of my farming implements, and any other thing or things that are mine, to be hers and at her own disposal during her natural life or so long as she remains my widow, at the expiration of which term all of my estate then remaining to be equally divided among my remaining children, only the part that may be coming from their grandfather's estate which I desire to be equally divided among my six youngest children." Held, that the will conferred upon the widow of the testator, during her life or widowhood, power to convey in fee any part of his estate, and that a purchaser from her, who took a conveyance of land in fee simple under such power, was not subject to be evicted, after her death, by the children of the testator. The language, "I give and bequeath unto my beloved wife * * * all the remainder of my estate, * * * to be hers and at her own disposal during her natural life or so long as she remains my widow, at the expiration of which term all of my estate then remaining to be equally divided among my remaining children," indicates the intent of the testator to confer an absolute power of sale on the wife so long as she lived and remained a widow, and to exclude the children from any claim on the property so sold, leaving that part of the testator's estate which might remain at the termination of the life estate to be divided among the children. The decision in Broach v. Kitchens, 23 Ga. 515, was based on the fact that the item of the will giving the widow a life estate, and the power to dispose of and enjoy the property so given as she might think fit, was followed by an item inconsistent with power in her to convey the fee in such property.

2. WILLS. (§ 600*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES CREATED.

Where the widow of the testator sold the land mentioned in the will and made a conveyance thereof in fee simple, with warranty of title, and evidence was introduced tending to show that the price paid was the value, not merely of the life estate, but of the fee-simple estate, there was no error, as against those claiming as remaindermen under the will, in charging, in effect, that if the jury found from the facts and circumstances shown by the evidence, taking into consideration the deed in its entirety and all the other facts and attendant circumstances, that the grantor executed the deed in pursuance of and by virtue of the power and authority conferred upon her in the will to sell and dispose of the land, and so intended, the title thus conveyed would be good as against the claim of title by the remaindermen under the will. Terry v. Rodahan, 79 Ga. 278 (1), 5 S. E. 38, 11 Am. St. Rep. 420; Mahoney v. Manning, 133 Ga. 784, 66 S. E. 1082; Roberts v. Lewis, 153 U. S. 367, 14 Sup. Ct. 945, 38 L. Ed. 747; South v. Walker, 62 Ga. 145, to the effect that a conveyance by a life tenant with power to sell would be limited to the conveyance of the life estate, was expressly disapproved in Weed v. Knorr, 77 Ga. 647, 1 S. E. 167.

SALES (§ 472*)—PASSING OF TITLE—CONDITIONAL SALES.

Where A., the secretary of a mining corporation, who is largely indebted to it upon a stock subscription, agrees with B., its president, that he will buy certain machinery needed by the company and sell it to the company for the price he pays for it as a credit on his indebtedness, and A. negotiates with a manufacturer for the purchase of the machinery, informing the manufacturer of his arrangement and agreement to sell it to the mining corporation, and the machinery is selected by A., and inspected and approved by B., and the terms of the sale are that A. is to pay one-third cash and give his notes for the balance, and the manufacturer, at the instance and request of A., ships the machinery to the mining company, which pays the freight and installs the machinery at considerable cost, and which immediately cancels so much of A.'s indebtedness as is represented by the price of the machinery, the title of the mining corporation is superior to a conditional bill of sale signed by A., in which the manufacturer reserves the title to the property until the deferred payments are met, and of which neither the mining company nor its president has notice prior to the time of consummation of the sale. The subsequent record of the bill of sale within the statutory time would not change the rights of the parties.

Error from Superior Court, Cherokee County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by J. E. Wilkes against Thomas C. Crenshaw. There was a directed verdict for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Jane E. Wilkes, doing business as the Mecklenburg Iron Works, at Charlotte, N. C., brought suit to recover of Thomas C. Crenshaw certain machinery in his possession. The case was submitted to the court on agreed statement of facts, so much of which as is material being as follows:

Fred Keener bought from the plaintiff certain machinery. Keener was secretary and treasurer of the Mary Lee Gold Mining Company, a corporation doing business in Georgia. Keener owed the mining company a large amount on stock subscription, and, in settlement of a portion of it agreed with the mining company to purchase certain machinery needed in the operation of its mine and resell same to the mining company. Keener informed the plaintiff of his and the mining company's agreement, pursuant to which Crenshaw, as president of the mining company and representing it, went to the place of business of the plaintiff at Charlotte, N. C., in February, 1905, to inspect the machinery proposed to be purchased by Keener, to ascertain if it was such machinery as the mining company would accept. Keener had arranged with the plaintiff that, if Crenshaw agreed that the company would buy the machinery from him (Keener), the plaintiff would ship the machinery directly from plaintiff's factory to the mining company in Georgia. Crenshaw informed the plaintiff that the company would accept the property from Keener, and so notified Keener by letter and telegram from Charlotte; and of this latter fact plaintiff had knowledge. Keener was to pay one-third cash for the machinery and to give his obligation for the balance; and Crenshaw knew of this. After Crenshaw's departure from Charlotte the deal was closed between Keener and the plaintiff, and in accordance with the agreement the plaintiff shipped the machinery to the mining company; the latter paying the freight. All the parties had knowledge that Keener was to purchase from the plaintiff the machinery on his own responsibility, resell it to the mining company, and be paid therefor by credit on the books of the mining company on stock subscription which he had taken in the mining company. The sale was consummated between Keener and the plaintiff on February 24, 1905, at which time one-third of the purchase price was paid in cash, and Keener executed to the plaintiff a conditional bill of sale to the machinery, wherein title was reserved in the plaintiff until the deferred payments were made. Crenshaw had no knowledge that the plaintiff was to retain title to the machinery, nor did the plaintiff give him any notice that she intended to require a bill of sale from Keener, reserving title to the property. The machinery was received by the mining company the latter part of March, 1905, and installed at considerable cost; and credit was immediately given to Keener on the books of the company for $2,052, the purchase price of the machinery. The conditional bill of sale, dated February 24, 1905, was attested by two witnesses, one of whom was a notary public. Within 30 days it was recorded in the state of New Jersey, in the county of Keener's residence; and on August 4, 1905, it was recorded in Cherokee county, Ga., the county of the place of business of the Mary Lee Gold Mining Company. Crenshaw was notified by the plaintiff, some time in June, 1906, of her claim of title to the property. In March, 1907, a receiver was appointed for the mining company. The property was advertised for sale, and at the sale Crenshaw became the purchaser of the entire property of the mining company, including the property in this suit. Public notice was given, just before the sale, by plaintiff's attorney, of its claim of title. The property is in the possession of defendant, who refuses to deliver it on demand. The court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepted.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, for plaintiff in error. Colquitt & Conyers, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). The Mecklenburg Iron Works sold the machinery to Keener with knowledge that Keener was purchasing it for resale to the mining company. The vendor knew that Keener was to accept, in payment for the machinery, a pro tanto discharge of his indebtedness to the mining company, and shipped the machinery at the request of Keener to the mining company. The vendor, Keener, and the mining company, were aware of the various inducements of the parties influencing each one's participation in the transaction. The entire transaction, while not constituting a tripartite agreement, did involve two sales—that is, a sale and a resale—so intimately connected and interwoven in negotiation, consideration, and execution that it would be a fraud to inject an element unknown to one of the participants in the transaction, and which would have the effect to impose upon that participant a liability not contemplated nor disclosed in the original transaction, and antagonistic to its general tenor and effect. If the vendor intended to reserve title to the machinery sold to Keener, she should have informed the mining company of such intention. Her consent to sell to Keener, with a knowledge that Keener intended an immediate resale to the mining company, and the shipping of the machinery to the mining company on Keener's request, was an assurance to the mining company of Keener's right to convey an unincumbered title. Otherwise it would be allowing the vendor to induce and accomplish the trade upon her apparent assent that Keener had full title to convey, and then allow her and Keener to secretly contract to the contrary. The circumstance that the consideration of the sale from Keener to the mining company was an existing debt does not change the complexion of the transaction. The mining company may have preferred to buy elsewhere, or machinery of a different type or of less value. It did cancel its debt against Keener, paid the freight, and installed the machinery at considerable cost. The case is not that of a creditor who simply takes additional security to an antecedent debt. Relatively to the vendor the mining company was a bona fide purchaser.

A vendor may make either an absolute or conditional sale of his goods. He cannot reserve the title, and at the same time empower his vendee to sell. His authorization of a sale by his vendee is inconsistent with the reservation of title in himself, which forbids a sale. If A. buys personalty of B., and gives to B. a note for its purchase price, with the stipulation that the title to the personalty shall remain in B. until the note is paid, and B. authorizes A. to sell the personalty and bring him the proceeds, a sale by A. to an innocent purchaser conveys a good title, although A. may not account to B. for the proceeds, and the reservation of title note may have been duly recorded. Tucker v. Mann, 124 Ga. 1003, 53 S. E. 504, Clarke v. McNatt, 132 Ga. 610, 64 S. E. 795. The principle decided in these cases is applicable to the case at bar; and we think the court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff upon the agreed statement of facts. We will not discuss the question of registration and constructive notice, so ably and elaborately argued in the briefs, because we are of the opinion that, even though the conditional bill of sale was properly executed and recorded in time, under the facts the plaintiff could not legally prevail.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

COWART v. W. E. CALDWELL CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 14, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. GARNISHMENT (§ 58*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT.

A fund in the hands of a trustee in bankruptcy, which the referee has ordered him to pay to a named person, cannot be reached by a creditor of such person by a summons of garnishment directed to and served upon the trustee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Cent. Dig. § 113; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

2. GARNISHMENT (§ 58*)—DISMISSAL OF ATTACHMENT—LEVY BY IMPROPER SUMMONS OF GARNISHMENT.

It is not erroneous to dismiss an attachment when the only levy of the same is by the service of such a summons of garnishment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 17*)—GENERAL DEMURRER TO PETITION—DISMISSAL—EFFECT.

Although an attachment may be dismissed because of its invalidity, the plaintiff is entitled to proceed for a verdict and general judgment on his declaration, if the defendant has appeared and made defense.

(a) The filing of a general demurrer to the declaration is equivalent to pleading to the merits of the case.

Error from Superior Court, Early County; W. C. Worrill, Judge.

Action by J. S. Cowart against the W. E. Caldwell Company. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

On October 18, 1907, J. S. Cowart sued out an attachment against W. E. Caldwell & Co., to recover the amount of a debt alleged to be due the plaintiff, the ground of the attachment being that "the said W. E. Caldwell & Co. resides out of this state." The proceeding was returnable to the April term, 1908, of the superior court of Early county, and upon it summons of garnishment was issued against D. W. James, individually and as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of T. A. Bailey. On October 25, 1907, James, in response to the summons of garnishment, filed an answer in which he stated that he had been served with summons of garnishment in the case of J. S. Cowart v. W. E. Caldwell Co., that he "owed the defendant nothing, and had no property, money, or effects of it at the time of the service of said summons, and that between that time and the date of this answer had neither owed the defendant anything, nor received nor gotten possession of any property, money, or effects belonging to it, except that at the time of such service he, as trustee in bankruptcy of T. A. Bailey, had in his hands five thousand dollars," the same being the net proceeds of the sale of certain lumber, which sale was made by him under an order of the referee before whom the bankruptcy proceeding was pending, in which order he was directed to pay the net proceeds of the sale to the Caldwell Company or its attorneys. On the same date the W. E. Caldwell Company gave a bond to dissolve the garnishment. On April 6, 1908, Cowart filed in the superior court his declaration in attachment against "W. E. Caldwell Co." On August 8, 1908, the W. E. Caldwell Company entered what it termed "its first and special appearance" before the court. In this pleading it was stated that the "special appearance" was made for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the court the following facts, which the pleader stood ready to prove: (1) "There is no such concern as the 'W. E. Caldwell & Co.' named as defendants to the above-stated action and alleged to be a resident of Louisville, Ky., but that is the place whereat the 'W. E. Caldwell Co.' resides and conducts business." (2) From the allegations in the declarations in attachment "the movant herein has gathered the impression that the plaintiff's intention was to sue out attachment proceedings against movant, but, not knowing the correct name by which movant should be styled, used the misnomer, 'W. E. Caldwell & Co.,' in naming the defendant to the * * * suit, and in referring to the defendant in the attachment proceedings." (3) "Movant is interested in bringing about a conclusion and determination of this attachment suit, inasmuch as the property and funds now in the hands of" the garnishee belong to it, and it is unjustly deprived of the use and benefit thereof, as the garnishee declines to turn over the same to movant pending the attachment proceedings. (4) Movant "is unwilling to voluntarily submit itself to the jurisdiction of this court and voluntarily appear and defend said attachment suit, which is a nullity, because: (1) Said proceeding is not brought against any legal entity, the said named defendant being neither a natural nor an artificial person; (2) the attachment bond is void, and the writ of attachment issued on said bond and accompanying affidavit made by the plaintiff is a mere nullity, because there is no such person as the 'W. E. Caldwell & Co.'; and (3) this court has not, by virtue of said attachment proceeding, acquired jurisdiction over either the person or property of movant herein." There was a prayer to be allowed to enter a special appearance for the purpose of proving the facts above alleged, that "upon due proof made thereof * * * said attachment proceeding be dismissed at the cost of the plaintiff, and that the gar-nishee be authorized and required to surrender possession of the property levied upon to movant." On the same day, the W. E. Caldwell Company "before pleading to the merits," but without referring to its "special appearance," filed a general demurrer, and also several special demurrers to the declaration in attachment. On the same date, subject to the motion to dismiss the plaintiff's proceedings and to the demurrers, it filed an answer to the declaration in attachment. The plaintiff, by leave of the court, amended his pleadings by striking the words "W. E. Caldwell & Co." wherever they occurred, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "W. E. Caldwell Co., a corporation," alleging that the words stricken were inserted in lieu of the correct name of the corporation by mistake and were a mere accidental misnomer. This amendment was allowed over the objection of the W. E. Caldwell Company; and the court thereupon overruled the motion to dismiss the plaintiff's proceedings, based upon the grounds above indicated. The defendant then made an oral motion to dismiss the proceedings, upon the ground that the "court had not acquired jurisdiction in rem over any property belonging to the defendant, and that the defendant had not, by its filing of a bond to dissolve the garnishment, or by pleading without reservation to the merits, or otherwise, voluntarily submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the court, and personal service had not been perfected on said defendant." This motion the court sustained by dismissing the entire attachment proceeding, including the declaration in attachment. The plaintiff thereupon excepted and sued out a writ of error. No cross-bill of exceptions was filed by the defendant.

L. M. Rambo and Pope & Bennet, for plaintiff in error. Pottle & Glessner, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The question whether the court erred in allowing the amendment to the plaintiff's proceedings, by which the words "W. E. Caldwell Co., a corporation," were inserted in lieu of the words "W. E. Caldwell & Co." wherever the latter occurred, is not before this court, as no exception to this ruling was taken. For a like reason the overruling of the "special appearance" motion to dismiss is not before us. This last-mentioned ruling, of course, naturally followed the other, as after the amendment was allowed the proceedings were clearly against the W. E. Caldwell Company as a corporation. We must treat the case, therefore, as if the proceedings were originally against the W. E. Caldwell Company, a foreign corporation. So treating it, did the court err in sustaining the defendant's oral motion to dismiss the entire proceedings, upon the grounds that the court had acquired no jurisdiction in rem over any property belonging to the defendant, and nothing had occurred by which the court had acquired jurisdiction to render a personal or general judgment against the defendant? The judgment of the court was partly right and partly wrong. As to the attachment and garnishment proceeding, it was right; as to the declaration in attachment it was wrong. The untraversed answer of the garnishee showed that at the time of the service of the summons of garnishment he, as an individual, owed nothing to the defendant in attachment, the W. E. Caldwell Company, a nonresident corporation, and had nothing in his hands belonging to that corporation, and had not since such service become indebted to that company or received any of its property or effects; but that as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of T. A. Bailey he had in his hands $5,000, the net proceeds of certain lumber, which had come into his possession as such trustee, and which he had sold under an order of the referee in bankruptcy, which directed him to make such sale and to pay over the net proceeds thereof to the W. E. Caldwell Company. The general rule is that while property or money is in custodia legis, the officer holding it is the mere hand of the court; his possession is the possession of the court; to interfere with his possession is to invade the jurisdiction of the court itself; and an officer so situated is bound by the orders and judgments of the court whose mere agent he is, and he can make no disposition of such money or property without the consent of his own court, express or implied. Among the legal custodians to whom these principles have been applied are trustees or assignees in bankruptcy. Rood on Garnishment, § 27, and citations. It has been so held in Georgia in regard to receivers. Zorn v. Wheatley, 61 Ga. 437 (2), 441; Lowe v. Stephens, 66 Ga. 607; Fountain v. Mills, 111 Ga. 122, 36 S. E. 428; Fulghum v. Williams Co., 114 Ga. 643, 647, 40 S. E. 695, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1055, 88 Am. St. Rep. 48. It has been held that even after the bill has been dismissed the receiver is still the officer of the court and not subject to garnishment. Field v. Jones, 11 Ga. 413.

It is contended, however, in the present case that, inasmuch as the order of the referee directed the trustee to pay over the net proceeds of the sale to the W. E. Caldwell Company, it was thereby segregated and became a direct indebtedness or amount due to that company, and hence was subject to garnishment by its creditor. If a garnishment is served, a judgment rendered upon it against the garnishee must be upon it either against him in his individual capacity or in his official capacity, either against his personal funds or against the funds in his hands as trustee. This was not a transaction between James individually and the

Caldwell Company, nor an individual indebtedness by him to that company, even though the company might have a right to proceed against him if he failed to pay it in accordance with the order of the court; for such right would arise out of the fact that he had not carried out such order. The garnishment recognizes the action of the court ordering the sale and the payment of the net proceeds as a valid order and is founded upon it. Without that order there would have been no sale and consequently no proceeds to pay. The garnishment proceeding, therefore, is necessarily against the trustee in his representative capacity, and is an effort to subject funds which he holds in that capacity under an order of the referee or bankrupt court. That court has exclusive jurisdiction in matters of bankruptcy; the state court has none. In the regular order of proceedings, after distribution has been made, the bankrupt will seek a discharge, and the trustee, upon filing his report and account and vouchers, will also apply for a discharge. The court of bankruptcy will hardly grant him a discharge from his trust so long as he had money in his hands arising under an order of the court, not finally paid out or disposed of as the court had directed. If a state court could garnishee a trustee in bankruptcy, to catch funds in his hands which had been ordered paid by the court to which he was directly amenable, but which he had not actually paid out, and could compel him to withhold the payment, regardless of the order of the court of bankruptcy, it will be readily perceived that confusion and conflicts of jurisdiction would at once arise, and that a state court, by means of a garnishment, could indefinitely delay the final winding up of the matter in bankruptcy and the final discharge of the trustee. It has accordingly been held that a garnishment will not lie from a state court to a trustee or assignee in bankruptcy, to catch dividends which have been declared in favor of certain creditors or the amount which will be going to them under a composition. In re Cunningham (Dist. Court of Iowa) 9 Cent. Law J. 208; Loveland on Bankruptcy (3d Ed.) § 268, p. 782; 2 Remington on Bankruptcy, §§ 224, 225, p. 1363. As the garnishment, in so far as it was directed to and served upon James as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of Bailey, was without authority of law and void, and in so far as it was directed to and served upon him in his individual capacity it failed to reach and fasten upon any property or asset belonging to the defendant, no lawful levy of the attachment was made; and consequently the court was without jurisdiction of the attachment proceeding, and therefore properly dismissed it.

The error which the court committed was in also dismissing the declaration in attachment. The Civil Code of 1895, § 4575, declares: "When the defendant has given bond and security, as provided by this Code, or when he has appeared and made defense by himself or attorney at law, or when he has been cited to appear, as provided by this Code, the judgment rendered against him in such case shall bind all his property, and shall have the same force and effect as when there has been personal service." Section 4557 provides that where notice in writing has been given, as therein provided, to the defendant of the pendency of the attachment and the proceedings thereon, "the judgment rendered upon such attachment shall have the same force and effect as judgments rendered at common law; and no declaration shall be dismissed because the attachment may have been dismissed or discontinued, but the plaintiff shall be entitled to judgment on the declaration filed, as in other cases at common law, upon the merits of the case." These two sections of the Code have been construed together; and it has been accordingly held that under their provisions, although the attachment may be dismissed because of its invalidity, still the plaintiff is entitled to proceed for a verdict and a general judgment on his declaration, if the defendant has appeared and made defense (Joseph v. Stein, 52 Ga. 332 [2]), or if he has replevied the property levied upon under the attachment (Camp v. Cahn, 53 Ga. 558 [2]), or if he has been duly cited to appear (McAndrew v. Irish American National Bank, 117 Ga. 610, [2], 43 S. E. 858.)

In the present case the defendant filed a general demurrer to the declaration in attachment. It is well settled that the filing of a general demurrer is equivalent to pleading to the merits of the case. Lyons v. Planters' Bank, 86 Ga. 485 (1), 12 S. E. 892, 12 L. R. A. 155; Savannah Ry. Co. v. Atkinson, 94 Ga. 780, 21 S. E. 1010; Southern Ry. Co. v. Cook, 106 Ga. 451 (3), 32 S. E. 585; Paulk v. Tanner, 106 Ga. 219 (1), 32 S. E. 122; Dykes v. Jones, 129 Ga. 99, 103, 58 S. E. 645.

Counsel for defendant in error, however, contend that the demurrer was filed subject to the motion for which the defendant made its "special appearance." There was no express reservation to this effect in the demurrer; but admitting that the demurrer was so filed, and that, being so filed, it did not, when it was filed, amount to pleading to the merits or to appearing and making defense in the case made by the declaration in attachment; still when this written motion to dismiss was overruled by the court, and no exception was taken by the defendant to this ruling, the general demurrer stood permanently uncovered; it was stripped of the protection afforded by the motion under cover of which it was made and thenceforth stood as the equivalent of a plea to the merits without reservation.

Being made subject to the final determination of the motion to dismiss which preceded it, and this motion having been finally decided against the defendant, the demurrer was, of course, no longer subject to this motion. In other words, the demurrer was made for the purpose of being considered in the event that the precedent motion to dismiss should be overruled, and, when this motion was overruled, the demurrer stood as unconditional pleading in the case.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

ALEXANDER v. BARRETT et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 24, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 138*)—DISMISSAL OF MOTION—GROUNDS.

The fact that service of the motion for a new trial and the rule nisi upon the opposite party was made, not by an officer, but by the movant, is not a valid ground for a dismissal of the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 278, 280; Dec. Dig. § 138.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 155*)—DISMISSAL OF MOTION—GROUNDS.

Retention by the trial judge of a motion for a new trial for more than 90 days after the hearing before passing upon the same will not work a dismissal of the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 315; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 132*)—PROCEEDINGS TO OBTAIN—APPROVAL OF BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

Where an application for a new trial was made, and an order was duly passed, in which it was provided that "movant is allowed until the hearing of the motion, whenever that shall be, to amend and perfect the motion and to prepare for approval and file a brief of the evidence in said case," and where at the time of the hearing the movant submitted a brief of the evidence, it was within the power of the judge to approve the brief; and, he having done so, it was not error to refuse to dismiss the motion for a new trial on the ground that no approved brief of evidence had been filed. Malsby v. Young, 104 Ga. 206, 30 S. E. 854.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 275; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

4. MOTIONS (§ 56*)—ENTRY OF ORDER NUNC PRO TUNC—APPROVAL OF BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

Where the judge, having before him the brief of evidence as submitted on the hearing of the motion for a new trial, approved the same as correct and granted the new trial, but failed to enter the order approving the brief of evidence, it was competent for him subsequently, and before the bill of exceptions was sued out, to pass an order reciting that the brief of evidence "was approved January 4, 1909," that being the date upon which the motion for new trial was passed upon, and that "this order is made now for then." Such nunc pro tunc order had the effect of an approval duly entered before passing upon the motion for a new trial.

1. BANKRUPTCY (§ 398*)—RECEIVERS—APPOINTMENT—RIGHT TO REMEDY.

Where, in equitable proceedings to obtain injunctive relief and the appointment of a receiver to take charge of funds which had been set apart to the bankrupt under his claim of homestead, and for a judgment in rem against the same, the petitioner asserted the right to subject the funds to his demand on the ground that the notes which were the basis of the same contained a waiver of homestead, and the debtor, against whom the proceedings were instituted, in his answer set up that another creditor held a mortgage which constituted a lien upon the funds in question, the mortgage being for a greater amount than the funds involved in the controversy, and where the lienholder filed an intervention setting up the fact of the existence of the lien by mortgage in his favor, and the priority of the lien thus set up was not disputed, as appears from the pleadings and evidence in the case, a denial of a judgment in rem (that is, to subject the funds to the demand of the petitioner), and of the injunctive relief and the receivership, necessarily resulted, although in his intervention the lienholder did not pray for a decree subjecting the funds to his lien, or for other affirmative equitable relief. Collins v. Myers & Marcus, 68 Ga. 530; Barnwell v. Wofford, 87 Ga. 50; Atlanta Brewing & Ice Co. v. Bluthenthal & Bickart, 101 Ga. 541, 28 S. E. 1003.

Action by the Fidelity Produce Company against A. L. Perdue. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

while crossing the car track, in her effort to reach the usual place for boarding the car, she was struck and killed by the car. At the trial two witnesses testified that they witnessed the fatal injury—the son of the deceased and a passenger upon the car. According to the son's version of the occurrence, he and his mother left their home and were proceeding up Pine street, when he observed the car just beyond Willow street. At that time he and his mother were about 20 yards from the car tracks. The South Decatur line is double-tracked. He observed the car, and estimated (on the trial) that it was running at about the same speed at which it was running at the time it struck his mother, 25 miles per hour. He ran across the track in advance of the rapidly approaching car, passing over the track as the car was about 60 yards away, and as he crossed the track he waved his hand in signal just as the car passed. His mother was following him, and he saw her just as he waved at the car. She was then north of the south track—in between the tracks—and was struck just as she stepped over the first rail of the north track. The passenger testified that he was on the front seat of the car, and he noticed that the motorman, in approaching Pine street, "had what we call the power on full," and did not check the speed of his car. He saw the deceased and her son when the car was between 200 and 300 feet from the crossing, and they were about 50 feet from the track. They were running, and when the car was from 100 to 200 feet from the crossing, and the deceased was in about fifteen feet of the tracks, he thrice exclaimed in a loud tone, "Stop this car!" The son had crossed the track when he called to the motorman to stop the car. He did not know that the motorman heard him. The deceased was wearing an old-fashioned sunbonnet, and the witness did not see her look towards the car as it approached the crossing. The evidence was sufficient to authorize an inference of negligence on the part of the defendant's agent.

The next question is whether the deceased was so clearly guilty of a want of ordinary care, by the exercise of which she could have avoided the injury, as to authorize a nonsuit. The injury was done by an electric car running through the streets and suburbs of Atlanta. Such a car stops at numerous points, at short intervals apart, to take on passengers. It is not altogether like a train propelled by steam, which only stops at certain stations. From the nature of the business and the frequency of the stops, and from the fact that its purpose is to transport passengers in densely populated communities, electric street cars are equipped so as to stop readily, to meet the requirements of the character of the business in which they are engaged. The place of the injury was a crossing of a street or a public road. It was a custom to stop when signaled. The son of the deceased ran toward the place where it was usual to board the car, closely followed by his mother. He ran across the track to the side where it was customary to give the signal to stop the car for the purpose of boarding it. The mother was following the son, and was wearing a sunbonnet. It does not appear that she actually saw the rapidly approaching car. At one point in the son's testimony he said he saw the car when he crossed the track, and it was about 60 yards distant. Other evidence indicated that it might have been even further. After crossing the track, he at once signaled for the car to stop; but it did not do so. It passed directly after he gave the signal, and just as the deceased stepped on the track it struck her. Considering the character of the car, the fact that the son and his mother could have been seen approaching the track, that he got across and gave a signal for the car to stop, and that she was wearing a sunbonnet, which might have to some extent interfered with her seeing the near approach or speed of the car, we think it should have been left for the jury to say whether she was so wanting in the use of ordinary care in stepping on the track, or in not stopping, rather than to have determined it as a matter of law. Whether she thought the car could and would be stopped in obedience to her son's signal before reaching the place where she attempted to cross, and, if so, whether she was wanting in ordinary care, or whether she merely attempted to outrun the street car and knowingly sought to cross directly in front of it, whether she was guilty of a want of ordinary care, would better be left to the determination of the jury under the evidence.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

HULL v. WATKINS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 344*)—APPLICATION TO SELL LAND—CLAIM AFFIDAVIT—JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURT.

Where an administrator advertises that it is his intention to apply for leave to sell any real estate as the property of his intestate, and an affidavit is filed under the provisions of section 4630 of the Civil Code of 1895, before the order is passed granting leave to sell, and the claim affidavit so filed is duly transmitted to the superior court of the county where the property is situated, that court has jurisdiction, under the issue made up as prescribed in the Code section last referred to, to try the "right of property," and the issue submitted on the trial should not be so restricted as to determine the single question as to whether the property is held adversely to the administrator, but, under the issue made up under the circumstances stated above, the right of the administrator to have an order granting leave to sell and the necessity for such an order should be determined, as well as whether the property is held adversely to the administrator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1442, 1443; Dec. Dig. § 344.*]

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

J. L. Hull, administrator of M. G. Watkins, advertised his intent to apply for leave to sell realty alleged to belong to the estate, and Lizzie Watkins and others filed a claim asserting title to the property. There was a directed verdict for claimants, and the administrator brings error. Reversed.

Hull, as administrator of M. G. Watkins, deceased, having advertised in the official gazette of Clarke county that it was his intention, as administrator as aforesaid, to apply to the court of ordinary at the January term, 1908, for leave to sell certain real estate, which, as he claimed, belonged to the estate of the said Watkins, Lizzie Watkins, in her own behalf and as agent of her sisters, Charity Watkins, Sarah Watkins, and Margaret Watkins, filed a claim, asserting title to the property. On the trial T. W. Mabry testified: "I know the land in question in this case. M. G. Watkins was in possession of said land at the time of his death, which I think occurred in 1891. Since that time his children, the claimants, or some of them, have been in possession, and are still in possession. T. G. Watkins was a son of M. G. Watkins, and married my daughter. T. G. Watkins died in October, 1906, leaving no children, but leaving a wife, and she died a few days afterwards during the same month." J. L. Hull testified: "As the administrator of M. G. Watkins, there are debts existing against M. G. Watkins, of which I have been given notice. Dr. I. H. Goss holds a note for $51, less a credit of $19. This credit was paid by T. G. Watkins, and his estate holds that claim against the estate of M. G. Watkins. There is no other property out of which to pay these debts belonging to the estate of M. G. Watkins, except the land, for which an order has been applied to sell, and which is involved in this claim case. I have never been in actual possession of the land in question, nor have I ever taken possession, or demanded it. I was appointed administrator some time in 1907, and made application for order to sell land now in question." The foregoing is all of the evidence appearing in the record. The judge directed a verdict in favor of the claimants. Judgment was entered that the property in dispute was not subject to sale by the administrator. He excepted to the refusal of a new trial.

John J. Strickland and J. L. Hull, for plaintiff in error. Geo. C. Thomas and Cobb & Erwin, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). Civ. Code 1895, § 4630, provides that, "when an executor, administrator, guardian, or other trustee shall advertise that it is his intention to apply for leave to sell any real estate as the property of his testator, intestate, ward, or cestui que trust, or having obtained such order, it may be lawful for any person claiming such real estate, either by himself, his agent, or attorney, to file in the court of ordinary an affidavit claiming said property, a copy whereof shall be served on such executor, administrator, guardian or trustee, as the case may be, previous to the day of sale." Under the provisions of this section the children of the administrator's intestate, before the order was obtained for leave to sell the land in controversy which the administrator was seeking to obtain, filed in the court of ordinary an affidavit claiming the property, and, as required by law, the ordinary transmitted the claim affidavit to the next term of the superior court of the county where the land is situated, and the issue was there made up in the same manner as in the trial of claims to property levied on by execution, following the directions relative to the making of such issue laid down in Civ. Code, § 4631. The section last referred to provides that, when the issue has been made up as prescribed, "the right of property shall there be tried." If the claim had been filed after the granting of an order conferring upon the administrator the right to sell, the only question to be tried under the issue, according to the decision in the case of Hall v. Armour, 68 Ga. 449, would have been whether or not the property was subject to sale; and in case it should appear that some one held adversely to the administrator a verdict for the claimant would necessarily result. But we are of the opinion that where parties shown to be in possession of the property decide to contest the right of the administrator to an order granting leave to sell in limine, and before the passing of such order in the court of ordinary, the right to have an order granting leave to sell, and the necessity for such an order, as well as whether the property is held adversely to the administrator, can be contested and settled. When evidence was introduced showing that M. G. Watkins died in possession of the land sought to be sold, that the persons in possession were heirs of the deceased, that there were debts of the estate still unpaid, and that there was no other property than that involved in this controversy with which to pay the same, a prima facie case was made entitling the administrator to the order which he was seeking to obtain.

We think the "rights of property" between the persons engaged in this controversy can all be settled in the superior court, which has ample jurisdiction to determine the questions that may arise in this case. Those questions relate to the right of the administrator to an order for the sale of the land which he was seeking to obtain, to the title to the property in controversy, and the right of the claimants to hold it as against the representative of the estate of their deceased father. And inasmuch as the statute provides that the issue between the administrator and the claimants in this case is to be tried as other claim cases, we see no reason why, by an equitable amendment to the joinder of issue, in aid of the proceedings upon the part of the administrator as they stood at the time of the trial, the administrator might not set up his right to recover the property for the purpose of bringing the same to sale, where the prima facie right to an order for the sale of the property in this cause is not overcome by evidence in favor of the claimants' right to retain possession. And should such an amendment be filed, all questions springing out of proceedings to bring the property to sale, and the claim filed in resistance thereto, could be adjudicated in one proceeding, thereby saving the heavy expense incident to an independent action to oust the persons in possession of the property after the right to an order granting leave to sell had been established.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

LUMPKIN, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal. But I think that attention should be called to the two cases of Hall v. Armour, 68 Ga. 449, and Head v. Driver, 79 Ga. 179, 3 S. E. 621. The decision in the former case has never been reviewed. Whether it is in accord with section 4831 of the Civil Code or not, that case arose under a claim interposed after an order of sale had been granted, and it appeared that the persons in possession held, not as heirs of the intestate, but as purchasers claiming under a conveyance. In the second case above cited, it was held that, "prior to the Code, it was not absolutely settled whether an administrator could recover in ejectment against an heir at law without first obtaining an order for sale from the ordinary. Under the Code, it is the better practice, if it is not indispensable, to obtain such order." See, also, Luttrell v. Whitehead, 121 Ga. 703, 49 S. E. 691, where it was said that the order was necessary. The difference between the cases first cited is apparent. In the case at bar the administrator is applying for an order to sell. If he should, either as better practice or as matter of necessity, obtain an order for sale before recovering possession from the heirs, and if he cannot obtain an order for sale if the heirs are in possession, he is between the horns of a legal dilemma. The law does not place him in such a position. He is entitled to the order of sale, under the evidence in the record.

GUINN et al. v. TAYLOR.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

WILLS (§ 637*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTERESTS CREATED.

A will devising certain property contained the following provisions: "Item Third. I will and bequeath to my beloved daughter, Martha Scott Guinn and her children born and to be born, all of my property, real and personal, that may belong to me at the time of my death. The income of all such property to be for the use and benefit of my said daughter, Martha Scott Guinn, formerly Martha Scott Abrahams. Said income to be used by her without liability to account to her said children for her benefit and that of her said children and to be free from all debts of Robert J. Guinn, her husband; neither is said income to be sold for any debts of the said Martha Scott Guinn except any surplus which may remain after a support has first been allowed for her and her said children. Neither shall any part of the property outside of the income be sold for the debts of the said Martha Scott Guinn. In case of death of any of the children of the said Martha Scott Guinn, without issue living at that time, then the part going to such child shall immediately vest in the survivor or survivors in equal shares." Item 4 provided for the appointment of a trustee for Martha Scott Guinn and her children, to preserve the corpus and to pay over to Martha Scott Guinn the income from the property, and provided that, with the consent in writing of the trustee and the ordinary, the property might be sold publicly or privately, the proceeds thereof to be reinvested "upon like uses and purposes." "Item Fifth. Upon the death of my daughter, Martha Scott Guinn, it is my will that all the property with its income if any be equally divided, share and share alike, between the children of the said Martha Scott Guinn, then living. If any of the children of Martha Scott Guinn should die before her death, without children, then the part of such deceased child or children shall go to the survivors, but should any of the children of Martha Scott Guinn be dead at the time of the death of Martha Scott Guinn and leave a child or children, they to stand in the place of deceased parent." Item 6 provided that the trustee "shall appropriate each year from the proceeds of my estate a sum sufficiently to keep the graves of my husband and myself in good condition." The wife of the plaintiff was one of four children of Martha Scott Guinn, all of whom survived her. The plaintiff claims an interest in the property as heir of his wife. Held:

Construing in connection with each other the items of the will above named, it was the intention of the testator to hold the property together until the death of Martha Scott Guinn, with a proviso that, in the event of the death of any of her children in her lifetime, the interest devised to such child was to go to the "survivors," but at the death of Martha Scott

Guinn the property was to be divided and vest absolutely in the persons then entitled, namely, one share to each of her children then living, and one share per stirpes to the surviving children of any child of Martha Scott Guinn who died during her lifetime. The wife of the plaintiff, having survived her mother, Martha Scott Guinn, took a vested interest in the property, which would descend by inheritance to her heirs.

(a) The plaintiff, as sole heir of his wife, having petitioned the court for a partition of property conveyed by the will, it was proper to overrule a demurrer to the petition setting up the contention that the plaintiff under the will referred to was not entitled to any interest in such property as heir of his wife.

SHIPPEN BROS. LUMBER CO. v.

ELLIOTT, Mayor, et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 29, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. STATUTES (§ 188*)—AMENDMENT—TITLES.

The act approved October 21, 1891 (2 Acts 1890-91, p. 898), entitled "An act to amend the charter of the town of Ellijay, in the county of Gilmer, and to confer certain powers therein named," is not violative of the provisions of article 3, § 7, par. 17, of the Constitution (Civ. Code 1895, § 5779), on the ground that the act failed to sufficiently designate the previous acts of the General Assembly which constituted the charter of the town of Ellijay. Puckett v. Young, 112 Ga. 578, 37 S. E. 880; Town of Poulan v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 123 Ga. 605, 51 S. E. 657; Burge v. Mangum, 134 Ga. —, 67 S. E. 857.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 205, 206; Dec. Dig. § 138.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 314*)—ASSESSMENT—POWER OF MUNICIPALITY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The provisions of the act of the General Assembly, approved October 16, 1891 (1 Acts 1890-91, p. 231; Pol. Code 1895, § 717), "that the mayor and council of each town or city are authorized, at their option, to elect three freeholders residing in the town or city, as assessors, who shall value and assess all the property within the said town or city liable for taxation," it is to be construed as cumulative, conferring upon the municipalities the option of assessing property for taxation through the agency of appointed freeholders, but does not preclude an assessment through other agencies provided by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 314.*]

B. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 284*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

In so far as the charter of the town of Ellijay (2 Acts 1890-91, p. 900, § 10), purports to authorize the mayor and council to assess or raise the valuation of any unreturned property to its true market value, it is violative of the due process clause of the Constitution of the United States, and of the similar clause of the Constitution of the state of Georgia, because no provision is made which affords the owner of any unreturned property a hearing on the question of its value.

(a) It is unnecessary to deal with other questions which relate exclusively to the exercise of discretion by the judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 893-896; Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

Dvane, P. J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Gilmer County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by the Shippen Bros. Lumber Company against J. H. Elliott, Mayor, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Thos. A. Brown, for plaintiff in error. A. H. Burtz and D. W. Blair, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. 1-2. The rulings announced in the first and second headnotes do not require elaboration.

3. The plaintiff was a taxpayer in the town of Ellijay. It omitted to return its property for taxes for the year 1909. The mayor and council, after giving notice and a hearing, assessed the property at a stated value for the purpose of taxation. Execution issued for the amount of the taxes based on the assessed value, and suit was brought to enjoin the enforcement of the execution. It was contended that the mayor and council were without authority to assess the value of the property. The charter of the town of Ellijay contained the following: "Sec. X. Be it further enacted, that the marshal of said town shall receive the return of property, both real and personal, and shall lay the same before the mayor and council before an assessment has been made; that when any person or corporation fails or refuses to return its property for taxation, or when property is returned below its true market value, the mayor and council may assess or raise the valuation of any property to its true market value." Acts 1890-91, vol. 2, p. 900. It was alleged that section 10 was unconstitutional, because it violated the due process clause as embodied in the Constitution of the United States (Civ. Code 1895, § 6030), and of the Constitution of the state of Georgia (Civ. Code 1895, § 5700), it being substantially the same in each of the Constitutions. The attack upon the constitutionality of this provision of the charter was based upon the ground that there was no provision made which afforded a hearing to a taxpayer in the matter of fixing the value at which his unreturned property should be taxed. The town of Ellijay was incorporated by the act approved August 16, 1883 (Acts 1882-83, p. 297), and its charter was subsequently amended at several different times. Acts 1887, p. 584; Acts 1889, p. 1078; Acts 1890-91, p. 598. Section 10 of the act of 1891, which is attacked as being unconstitutional, when considered in connection with all of the provisions of the charter as contained in the act incorporating the town of Ellijay and the several amending acts above mentioned, in so far as it relates to the ascertainment of values of unreturned property for taxation, does not contemplate the conferring of power upon the mayor and council to provide by ordinance for the ascertainment of the value of unreturned property, but professes to be a complete act within itself and to make final disposition of the matter by conferring upon the mayor and council directly the power to assess the value, and makes no provision which affords the taxpayer a hearing as to the value of property to be assessed, but the assessment by the mayor and council is contemplated to be final and binding. It thus appears that the question before us is different from what it might be if the charter provided authority to assess the value of property, and expressly conferred power upon the municipality to adopt ordinances providing for the ascertainment of values, and ordinances were in fact adopted which provided for notice and a hearing to the taxpayer. In the case of City Council of Augusta v. King, 115 Ga. 454, 41 S. E. 661, it was said: "A legislative act which undertakes to empower a city council to collect 'all sums that may be assessed by said city council, or its authority, against each and every improved lot lying on any street in [the city], through which the pipes of the [city] waterworks may pass,' is unconstitutional when it makes no provision for fixing the amount of the assessment for which it provides, with relation either to the cost thereof or the benefits to the property owners interested, nor for notice to them, nor for giving them any hearing with respect to the reasonableness or justness of such assessments. See Acts 1887, p. 568. An act of this nature, with such omissions, is violative of article 1, § 1, par. 3, of the Constitution, which provides that 'No person shall be deprived of * * * property except by due process of law.'" In the case of Savannah, Florida & Western R. Co. v. Mayor and Aldermen of the City of Savannah, 96 Ga. 680, 23 S. E. 847, it was said: "That the charter of a city provides for the appointment by the mayor and aldermen of freeholders to assess the damages sustained by lotowners in consequence of the opening or extension of any street, with power to the mayor and aldermen to enforce the award or decision of these assessors, without providing for notice of any kind to such lotowners as to these matters, would not render the charter violative of the constitutional prohibition against depriving persons of their property without due process of law, if the charter made any provision for such notice to lotowners as would allow them an opportunity to be heard with reference to the amount of the compensation to be paid them before such assessments should become finally binding and conclusive upon them. * * * In the absence of any provision whatever for such notice in a city charter, it is unconstitutional in the respect above indicated." In each of the foregoing cases there was statutory power conferred upon the municipality to do the thing attempted; but in each instance, as is true with the statute creating the charter of the town of Ellijay, there was an omission to provide for a hearing to the property owner, and the law was held to be unconstitutional. The property owner is entitled to a hearing at some time before the assessment of the value of his property becomes finally binding, and a statute which attempts to authorize an assessment when the law does not afford him such a hearing, will be declared unconstitutional. Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Wright, 207 U. S. 127, 28 Sup. Ct. 47, 52 L. Ed. 134. See, also, cases cited in 8 Cyc. 1108. It will not suffice that he may have been afforded a hearing as a matter of grace; where he is entitled to a hearing, it is essential that the law should afford it to him as a matter of right. Security Trust Co. v. City of Lexington, 203 U. S. 323, 27 Sup. Ct. 87, 51 L. Ed. 204. See, also, Process of Law, by McGehee, c. 2, p. 82; Gray on Limitation of Taxing Power and Public Indebtedness, § 1165, p. 579. Under a proper construction of the charter of the town of Ellijay, the mayor and council would have complied with its terms with reference to the assessment of unreturned property for taxation without giving any hearing whatever, or passing any ordinance on the subject; and the hearing which they gave the plaintiff in error was given purely as a matter of grace. After construing the charter of the town of Ellijay as an effort to confer power upon the mayor and council to assess the value without also making provision which afforded the property owner a hearing, we have considered whether the plaintiff in error might not have been entitled to a hearing in a court of equity, and thus to have upheld the constitutionality of section 10 of the charter; but under the reasoning in the case of the City of Augusta v. Pearce, 79 Ga. 98, 4 S. E. 104, we have concluded that as to the question of the ascertainment of mere value equity will not afford a hearing, and we can discover no ground upon which to defend the constitutionality of section 10 of the charter as against the attack made upon it. As it was unconstitutional, all the proceedings under it were necessarily void, and the court ought to have granted the injunction. Having reached this conclusion, it is unnecessary to deal with other questions in the case which depended entirely upon the discretion of the judge.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

EVANS, P. J. I concur in the judgment, but dissent from the conclusion of the majority that section 10 of the amended charter of the town of Ellijay was intended to be an exhaustive scheme for the assessment of property for taxation in that municipality. It is not usual, and indeed not desirable, that a municipal charter should be burdened with all the details for exercising the various powers conferred upon the municipality or any of its officers by the Legislature. When the power to do certain acts is conferred upon the mayor and council by the municipal charter, but the particular mode of exercising the power is not prescribed, this may be done by ordinance. Section 10 bears internal evidence that the Legislature did not contemplate that they were inhibiting the municipality from providing the mode of exercising the power given to the municipality relative to the assessment of taxes. It is not provided when the tax returns shall be made to the marshal, nor the form or manner in which they shall be made, nor is the machinery provided for the assessment of property of delinquent taxpayers. I do not think that the provision in the charter should be held to be self-executing, and a denial of the right of the municipality to provide by ordinance a constitutional mode of assessment, so as to render the charter provision unconstitutional; but rather should it be construed as authorizing the municipality to carry into effect the power conferred by the charter by adopting proper and legal by-laws or ordinances providing for the assessment of property. It does not appear in the record, however, that the municipality has adopted any by-law to carry into effect the charter provision; and for this reason I concur in the judgment, but dissent from so much of the opinion as holds section 10 to be unconstitutional.

PAVLOSKI v. KLASSING et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 29, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING (§ 248*)—AMENDMENT—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

The former husband of one of the defendants brought suit against her and her present husband, alleging in the original petition, filed December 24, 1907, that in 1889 and 1890 described lots of land were conveyed to the plaintiff, of which he was in possession up to December 25, 1901, when defendants took possession of the lands "under some pretended but fraudulent and unlawful claim, * * * and have since over the protest" of the plaintiff held such possession, and that, after plaintiff obtained title to the lands, he conveyed the same to his brothers, who on December 3, 1907, conveyed the lands to plaintiff. Plaintiff prayed for a recovery of the lands, and "especially for any and all such orders, judgments, and decrees as may be consistent with law and equity in such cases made and provided." The plaintiff offered an amendment to the petition, alleging that upon the false and fraudulent representations of his former wife that, if he would have his brothers to make her a deed to the lands, she (who was then living separate from him) would immediately return to him and live with him as his wife "so long as they both might live," plaintiff had his brothers (who held from him a deed to the land to secure a debt which had been paid) to make her a deed on July 13, 1895, under which she claimed title to the land. She returned to the plaintiff's home July 24, 1895, but slept in a separate room, and refused to cohabit with the plaintiff, and left him on August 20, 1895, and thereafter married her present husband. Her promise to live with the plaintiff as his wife was falsely and fraudulently made for the purpose of procuring the deed made to her. In the amendment the plaintiff prayed for a cancellation of such deed. Held: (1) Such amendment was allowable, and was not subject to the objection that it added a new and distinct cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 686-706; Dec. Dig. § 248.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§§ 413, 419*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING WRITTEN CONTRACT—EXPLAINING CONSIDERATION FOR DEED.

The petition as amended sought to set aside the deed to the wife because of its having been procured by her fraud, and was not subject to demurrer on the ground "that said petition as amended is an attempt to add by parol to the terms of a written instrument, to wit, an attempt to add to the terms of an unconditional deed, by parol, a condition that it was to be effective only in the event that the defendant lived with the plaintiff as his wife."

(a) Though the deed recited a consideration of $1,500, it could be shown by parol that the real consideration was as alleged in the amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1912-1928; Dec. Dig. §§ 413, 419.*]

3. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 34*)—RIGHT TO RELIEF—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION—LACHES.

The time during which the plaintiff was in peaceable possession of the lands should not be counted against him in determining whether or not he was barred by lapse of time from invoking the aid of a court of equity in having the deed to his wife canceled.

(a) The plaintiff having sought by equitable proceedings to have the deed set aside within seven years from the time he lost possession of the property and she took possession, his right to ask a court of equity to set aside the deed is not barred by his own laches.

(b) Upon proof of the allegations of the petition as amended that the former wife of the plaintiff procured the deed by fraud as alleged, the plaintiff is entitled to have the deed canceled. The petition as amended set forth a good cause of action, and was not subject to general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 49-54; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by Frank Pavloski against Julius Klassing and others. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Frank Copeland and Hal Wright, for plaintiff in error. Nat Harris and Dean & Dean, for defendants in error.

HOLDEN, J. On December 24, 1907, the plaintiff brought suit against his former wife and her present husband to recover described tracts of land, making in his original petition substantially the following allegations: The plaintiff acquired title to part of the land in 1889 and to the rest in 1890. He subsequently conveyed it to his brothers, who on December 3, 1907, conveyed it back to the plaintiff, who is now the owner in fee, and entitled to its possession, control, and use. On and prior to December 25, 1901, he was in possession of the land. On or about that date the defendants "took possession of said lands * * * under some pretended, but fraudulent and unlawful, claim, and without any legal right or legal authority whatever, and have since over the protest of this petitioner held the possession of said land against petitioner's right, claim, and title, and are now in possession of the same under some pretended but unlawful and fraudulent claim, and refuse to deliver to petitioner the possession thereof." The plaintiff prayed for a recovery of the property and mesne profits, and "especially for any and all such orders, judgments, and decrees as may be consistent with law and equity in such cases made and provided." Amendments were offered, making substantially the following allegations: On July 13, 1895, the plaintiff had his brothers to make to the defendant, who was formerly the wife of the plaintiff, a deed to the lands, under which she claims title thereto. This deed recites a consideration of $1,500, but the only consideration thereof was the promise of the defendant, who was at that time his wife and living apart from him, that she would "immediately return to live with petitioner as his wife so long as they might live." This deed was secured by her falsely and fraudulently representing to the plaintiff that, if he would have the same made, she would "again and immediately resume her place in plaintiff's family as his wife, and would continue so to live with him so long as they both might live; that plaintiff believed and acted on said statement, promises, and contract, and, acting on the same in good faith for said consideration, was misled, defrauded, and deceived by the said Henrietta, in this: that instead of resuming her place as plaintiff's wife, except for a short while as a pretense in order to obtain said land agreement, she declined and refused to do so, although plaintiff offered and was anxious to accept her back as his wife, and she refused to return, and soon after married to her present husband." She came back to live with the plaintiff on July 24, 1895, and lived with him until August 20, 1895, "and during said time refused to cohabit with plaintiff as his wife, but slept in a separate room from plaintiff, and refused to treat him as her husband, and plaintiff charges that said Henrietta's only purpose was to secure his property, * * *" and "to fraudulently secure said deed," and plaintiff was thereby "injured, wronged, cheated, and deceived and defrauded." Plaintiff prayed for a cancellation of the deed, and that the title to the land be declared to be in him as against the defendants in the original petition and his brothers, whom he prayed to be made parties defendant, and who, by an order of the court, were made parties defendant. At the time the brothers of the plaintiff made the deed to his former wife, they held title to the land to secure a debt, which had then been paid. The two brothers who were made parties defendant acknowledged service, but filed no defense. The defendant Julius Klassing offered a disclaimer, and the other defendant, who was formerly the wife of the plaintiff, filed a demurrer. To the order of the court sustaining this demurrer the plaintiff excepted.

1. One of the grounds of the demurrer, which was filed during the term of the court at which the amendments were offered, was as follows: "That said petition as amended is a separate and distinct cause of action from that originally filed by plaintiff; the petition as originally filed having been a common-law action for the recovery of possession of land, together with mesne profits, and the petition as amended being an equitable proceeding to set aside and cancel a deed for fraud." Under the record in this case, we think it proper to treat both of the amendments as having been allowed by the court without objection. Whether or not the question as to whether the amendments added a new cause of action was properly raised by the demurrer need not be considered, as the amendments offered no new cause of action and were allowable. The plaintiff in his original petition stated that the defendants held the lands "under some pretended but fraudulent and unlawful claim" of title, and prayed for a recovery of the lands, "and especially for any and all such orders, judgments, and decrees as may be consistent with law and equity in such cases made and provided." The allegations in the amendment set forth the deed under which the defendants claimed title to the land, and alleged that it was procured by fraud, and asked a cancellation of the same. This did not add any new cause of action to that originally brought. The object of the original petition was to maintain title to and obtain possession of the lands sued for. By the amendments the same result was sought, the plaintiff seeking, in furtherance of that purpose, to set aside, as having been procured by fraud, this deed which he caused his brothers to make to the main defendant. The gist of the original petition was that the plaintiff was the rightful owner of the lands sued for, and that the defendants were holding them under a pretended but fraudulent and unlawful claim. The amendments specified that the alleged fraudulent claim was based on a deed which the defendant, who was formerly the wife of the plaintiff, had obtained by fraud, and sought a cancellation of this deed in the suit for a recovery of the possession of the land sued for in the original petition. Amendments of this nature did not add a new cause of action, and were permissible. Jordan v. Downs, 118 Ga. 544, 45 S. E. 439; Bridger v. Exchange Bank, 126 Ga. 821, 56 S. E. 97, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 463; Brice v. Sheffield, 121 Ga. 216, 48 S. E. 925.

2. Two of the grounds of demurrer were as follows: "(7) That said petition, as amended, is an attempt to add, by parol, to the terms of a written instrument, to wit, an attempt to add to the terms of an unconditional deed, by parol, a condition that it was to be effective only in the event that defendant lived with plaintiff as his wife. (8) That said petition as amended should be dismissed upon the ground that such condition cannot be ingrafted on said deed, it appearing that there was no intention to incorporate such condition in the deed." There is no merit in either of these grounds of the demurrer. The consideration of the deed could be inquired into, and, although it recited a consideration of $1,500, the plaintiff had a right to show that he had his brothers to make the deed to his wife in consideration of her living with him, and could show that it was procured by fraud on the part of the wife. There was no effort to add any condition to the deed or to change the terms thereof.

3. One of the grounds of the demurrer was that plaintiff's right to recover the land and cancel the deed was barred because of his own laches. We think that the petition, properly construed, means that from the time the brothers of the plaintiff made his wife a deed on July 13, 1895, up to December 25, 1901, the plaintiff was in possession of the land, and that the possession of the land by his wife and her second husband never began until December 25, 1901. The brothers of the plaintiff made him a deed to the property on December 3, 1907, and this suit was filed on December 24, 1907. We do not think the equitable right of the plaintiff to have the deed canceled was barred by laches on his part. Twelve years had elapsed between the date of the execution of the deed to the wife of the plaintiff which it was sought to cancel and the time the suit was filed, but only about six years intervened between the time the possession of the land by the plaintiff ceased and the time of the filing of the suit. Ought the time during which the plaintiff was in possession of the property to be counted against him, in determining whether or not his right to have the deed cancelled is barred by his delay in undertaking to assert such right? We think not. In 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 124, it is said: "The owner of the legal title in possession may lie by until his possession is invaded or his title attacked, before taking steps to vindicate his right." On page 125 of this work the following language is used: "But, when the plaintiff is out of possession, it would appear that the defense of laches is available. * * * Laches will not be imputed to one in peaceable possession of property for delay in resorting to a court of equity to establish his right to the legal title." In this connection, see Pierce v. Middle Georgia Land Co., 181 Ga. 99, 102, 103, 61 S. E. 1114; 5 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 33, p. 58. Conceding that the plaintiff, while in possession of the property from the time the deed to his wife was made, or from the time his wife left his home soon thereafter, which possession continued to December 25, 1901, had the right to apply to a court of equity to have the deed canceled, we do not think his failure to do so can be considered against him, under the facts of this case, in determining whether or not he was barred by lapse of time from asserting his right to have the deed canceled. He was in possession of the property and enjoying the benefits of it, and his failure to assert such rights before his possession and enjoyment of the benefits of the property were disturbed should not be considered against him in determining whether or not by lapse of time he had lost the right to have the deed from his brothers to his wife canceled in a suit for that purpose filed after he lost possession. The only time that should be counted against the plaintiff is that intervening between the date when his wife and her husband took possession of the property on December 25, 1901, and the date when this suit was filed on December 24, 1907, which was six years. There is in this state no statute of limitations barring the right of the owner of land to sue for a recovery of it, though another in adverse possession for seven years or more under color of title may acquire a prescriptive title which would be the superior title. The analogy of the law is followed in courts of equity; and, as the plaintiff sought to have the deed made to his wife canceled within a less time than seven years after he lost possession of the property, we do not think he was barred by the lapse of time from asserting such rights, there being no special circumstances sufficient to authorize a departure from the general rule above announced. At the time the plaintiff brought this suit, he had obtained from his brothers a deed to the land. The allegations of the petition were sufficient to show that the wife of the plaintiff by fraud on her part induced the plaintiff to have his brothers execute a deed to her, and the petition was sufficient to withstand a general demurrer. Brown v. Doane, 86 Ga. 32, 12 S. E. 179, 11 L. R. A. 381. The court committed error in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition.

WILSON v. GRANGER & LEWIS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 25, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. JURY (§ 13)—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—LEGAL OR EQUITABLE PROCEEDING—ACCOUNTING—EXCEPTIONS TO AUDITOR'S REPORT.

The plaintiff filed a petition in the superior court, alleging a complicated state of facts, including the taking up by the defendants, for her benefit, of several claims, one being transferred at less than the full amount due on it, the shipment of lumber by the plaintiff from a sawmill for the purpose of discharging the indebtedness, the taking possession of the sawmill and operating it by the defendants, the sale of the property by them, and the buying of a tract of timbered land by them, taking title in their names, but allowing the timber to be cut and used at the plaintiff's mill. It was alleged that "said matters of account, being of an intricate and complicated nature, cannot be adequately and properly considered in a court of law; and it is necessary, in order that your petitioner may have adequate and complete relief, that an accounting be had under the equitable powers of the court." Discovery was waived. The prayers were for judgment for an amount which was alleged to be due from the defendants to the plaintiff, that an auditor be appointed "to prepare an accounting" between the parties, and for process. Two amendments were filed to the petition, which referred to it as "in equity." The answer of the defendants likewise so characterized the case, as did also the process and the various entries on the papers. An auditor was appointed, who filed a report adverse to the contentions of the plaintiff. She filed exceptions. At the hearing, counsel for plaintiff contended that the cause was one at law, and that the plaintiff was entitled to a jury trial on the exceptions of fact to the auditor's report as matter of right, instead of treating them as subject to be approved or disapproved by the presiding judge, as in cases of an equitable character. Held, that such contention was properly overruled.

2. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Upon a careful consideration of the auditor's report, the various exceptions filed by the plaintiff thereto, and the evidence, it is held that there was no error in overruling such exceptions and sustaining the findings of the auditor.

action, in uniting an action ex delicto with an action ex contractu.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 65*)—SALE OF LAND BY TRACT.

A deed contained the following description: "Seven thousand five hundred and seventy-eight acres, more or less, lying and being in the 32d Dist. G. M., Charlton County, Georgia, bounded on the north by Folkston lands, Edward lands, Cooner lands, and lands of John Vickery, east by Molette lands and St. Mary's river, south by St. Mary's river, and west by Spanish creek and lands of John Wilson, except so much of the above-described land as has been previously sold, which has been deducted from the total number of acres included in said boundary." A petition was filed, seeking a reformation of such deed, alleging a deficiency in the number of acres, and seeking to recover on the warranty contained in the deed for such deficiency. The plaintiff alleged "that during the negotiations preceding the actual sale, and at the time of making the sale, and at the time of executing and delivering the deed, it was the understanding of both parties thereto that the boundaries in the deed described a tract or body of land containing about 10,000 acres, and it was mutually intended to convey all of said land within said boundaries in said deed, except the amount previously sold off and that decreed to belong to J. E. Bryant et al., and it was mutually understood that the amount of land in the tract previously sold and deducted under the Bryant et al. decree aggregated 1,800 acres, more or less, and that there was left 7,578 acres then belonging to the defendant. * * * which said 7,578 acres he agreed to sell and convey to petitioner at $1 per acre, amounting to $7,578; said agreement to sell and convey being by the acre, and not by the tract." Held that, under the allegations of the petition and the description contained in the deed, it is apparent that the sale was by the tract, and not by the acre, although in one part of the petition the plaintiff alleges that the contrary was true.

(a) Where the plaintiff alleged that it was the understanding of both parties that the boundaries in the deed described a tract or body of land containing about 10,000 acres, and it was mutually intended to convey all of said land within said boundaries in said deed, except the amount previously sold off and that decreed to belong to named persons, and "that the amount in the tract previously sold and deducted under the * * * decree aggregated 1,800 acres, more or less," such allegations are inconsistent with a sale by the acre and a covenant that the tract of land contained an exact number of acres. "Eighteen hundred acres, more or less," cannot be subtracted from a tract of land included within certain boundaries and "containing about 10,000 acres," so as to leave an exact number of acres as a result. Such allegations as to the contract must be taken most strongly against the pleader, and are not cured by mere general statements that the sale was understood to be, and was in fact, by the acre.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

3. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 36*)—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

Under the allegations of the petition, the plaintiff did not make out a case authorizing a reformation of the deed in regard to the quantity of land conveyed, or the manner of its conveyance by the tract, instead of by the acre; nor did it show that the plaintiff was authorized to recover for a deficiency in the quantity of land.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—FAILURE TO ARGUE POINT IN BRIEFS.

The petition contains some allegations to the effect that by an oversight the deed was headed, "State of Georgia, Clinch County," but was actually executed in the state of Florida, and that the plaintiff cannot offer the deed in evidence as a registered deed without having it corrected in this particular. In the briefs of counsel for plaintiff in error no reference is made to this allegation, but the case was argued alone on the points decided in the preceding headnotes. This court, therefore, will not determine this question, but will affirm the judgment without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to institute another proceeding, with proper allegations, to seek to obtain a reformation of the deed in this particular, should it be so advised.

PEDRICK v. PEDRICK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 23, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DIVORCE (§ 184*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT.

In cases of cruel treatment or habitual intoxication by either husband or wife, the jury, in their discretion, may grant either a total or partial divorce. Civ. Code 1895, § 2427.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 571, 572; Dec. Dig. § 184.*]

2. DIVORCE (§ 184*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT.

In the present case there was evidence tending to show cruel treatment on the part of the defendant toward the plaintiff; but the jury found a partial divorce, instead of a total divorce, as desired by the plaintiff. No reason appears why this was an abuse of the discretionary power vested in the jury; and the presiding judge having approved the verdict, and refused to grant a new trial on motion of the plaintiff, this court will not reverse the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Dec. Dig. § 184.*]

3. DIVORCE (§ 186*)—REVIEW.

In such a case, it not appearing that there was any abuse of discretion either on the part of the jury or of the judge, this court will not reverse the judgment and grant a new trial merely because it appears from the briefs of counsel that both parties desired it to be done, and because the jury at the first hearing found in favor of a total divorce, and at the second hearing found only a partial divorce.

1. RAILROADS (§ 255*)—WRECKING TRAINS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where one is charged with the offense of attempting to wreck a railroad train, the question whether it was his intention to actually wreck the train or merely to obstruct the tracks, and, therefore whether he should have been indicted under section 520 of the Penal Code of 1895, rather than under section 512, is a question of fact for the jury, and may be determined in every case by those circumstances which indicate the probable result of the defendant's act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 780; Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 596, 598*)—CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF WITNESS.

Continuances in criminal cases are not governed by the same rule as those in civil cases. In a criminal case, a motion for continuance should be granted whenever the principles of justice appear to demand a postponement, whether the witness on account of whose absence the postponement is asked has been subpoenaed or not, if his testimony is material, and it appears that the defendant has used all the diligence within his power, and all the means at his command to procure the attendance of the absent witness. A motion for a continuance put upon the ground of absence of a witness, while to some extent addressed to the discretion of the judge, ought generally to be granted if his testimony is material, even though other witnesses present may testify to the same facts as the absent witness would state. The absent witness might be believed, while the witnesses present might be discredited by the jury.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ALIBI.

When alibi is the only defense set up by a defendant in a criminal case, and this defense is sustained by testimony, the jury should be properly instructed in the rules governing the consideration of the subject of alibi, even in the absence of a request, and although the defense of alibi is included in the general plea of, "Not guilty." It is the duty of the court to instruct the jury, without request, in the law applicable to the substantial issues presented by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1833, 1908; Dec. Dig. § 824.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 331*)—INSANITY—BUDEN OF PROOF.

There is no merit in the exception to the instructions of the trial judge upon the subject of insanity. As every person is presumed to be sane, the burden of proving insanity or idiosyncrasy rests upon the defendant, and the insanity or idiosyncrasy need not be established beyond a reasonable doubt, but only to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury, as the jury were correctly informed by the judge. When, in a given case, it appears that the defendant is insane or a lunatic or an idiot, and the burden has been shifted, it devolves upon the state to prove the sanity of the defendant.

Error from Superior Court, Montgomery County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Emmett Hobbs was convicted of attempting to wreck a railroad train, and he brings error. Reversed.

Wm. B. Kent, for plaintiff in error. E. D. Graham, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of attempting to wreck a railroad train. The indictment was based upon the provisions of section 512 of the Penal Code of 1895, which prescribes that any one who shall wreck or attempt to wreck a railroad train, or a locomotive, or any car of the same, shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary for life, unless the jury trying the case shall recommend the person to mercy. It is urged by counsel for plaintiff in error that the defendant, if guilty at all, violated section 520 of the Penal Code of 1895, and that under the evidence he could not properly be convicted upon the present indictment. The reason given is that the evidence fails to show any intent to wreck the train, and that the most that appears from the evidence, construing it favorably to the prosecution, is that the defendant obstructed the railroad or the train. The question as to whether this contention is sustained was one for the jury.

Conceding that the defendant placed a scantling or old cross-tie across the track, it is for the jury to say whether it was his intention to wreck the train or merely to derail or obstruct it. In Sanders v. State, 118 Ga. 329, 45 S. E. 365; it was held that "to place on the rails of a railroad track a piece of iron of sufficient size and weight to derail a passenger car is to obstruct the track of a railroad company, within the meaning of Penal Code 1895, § 520." Sanders, however, was indicted under section 520, and in the language of the ruling of the Supreme Court quoted there is nothing to indicate that if he had been indicted under section 512 of the Pen. Code 1895, for attempting to wreck the same train, it would have been held that there was a variance between the proof and the allegations. In other words, it could not have been held that if the surrounding circumstances were such as to satisfy the jury that the intention in placing the bar of iron across the railroad track was to wreck the train, the jury would not have been authorized to find the defendant guilty. From the testimony of the engineer in the present case, we ourselves would be very doubtful whether the intent of this boy was to wreck the train, or whether he merely wanted to see the wood placed there by him splintered. The engineer testifies that the engine readily cut the obstruction out of its way into splinters, and that, though he endeavored to stop the train, he did not do so, and, after the train had passed through and over the obstruction, the engine proceeded on its way uninjured. However, the jury was authorized to find that the intent of the defendant (assuming that he placed the timber across the track) was to wreck the train; because there was testimony to the effect that such a piece of timber as he placed across the track would generally derail the train. Whether the derailment would result in a wreck is of course to be determined by such circumstances as the speed at which the engine might be running, the weight of the train, and the contour of the surroundings. For instance, if a train were derailed by running slowly and on level ground, with no objects upon the sides of the track with which it was likely to come in contact, these would be circumstances from which the jury might infer that there was no intent to wreck the train, though there might be a purpose to obstruct or derail it. On the other hand, a jury could well infer that an attempt to derail a train upon a high trestle, where an inch out of balance might precipitate the engine or coaches, or both, to certain ruin upon the rocks below, was a conclusive circumstance indicating an intention to wreck the train, and not merely to obstruct it.

2. We think the judge erred in overruling the defendant's motion for a continuance. The defendant asked a continuance because of the absence of two witnesses—J. H. Mosely, by whom he expected to show that he was an idiot, and Jake Phillips, by whom the defendant's father stated that he expected to prove not only that the defendant was an idiot, but also expected to prove an alibi. It appeared that the defendant had other witnesses present by whom he could show that he had always been considered an idiot, and it was, no doubt, for this reason that the court disregarded the showing so far as Mr. Mosely's absence was concerned; because it was proved that Mr. Mosely had been subpoenaed and was too sick to come to court. There is no doubt as to the reason which influenced the trial judge in disregarding the absence of Jake Phillips; for it appears that the court suggested to the Solicitor General that there was no necessity for further inquiry as to his absence, because it had not been made to appear that Phillips had been subpoenaed. As we pointed out in the case of Paulk v. State, 5 Ga. App. 567, 63 S. E. 659, the long-established rule that motions for continuances in criminal cases are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial judges is stated in section 961 of the Penal Code of 1895, and is especially pertinent to cases called for trial at the same term as that at which the defendant is indicted. In this section there is no requirement that it shall be made to appear that the witness has been subpoenaed. Of course if he has not been subpoenaed, or no effort has been made to subpoena him, and there has been ample opportunity to do so, a court would be justified in disregarding the absence of a material witness. But, as we said in the Paulk Case, if it appears that the defendant has done all that was within his power to procure the attendance of a witness, whose attendance could probably be later secured, even though he might not have subpoenaed him, this, of course, would afford no reason for overruling a motion for a continuance. We think, therefore, that the trial judge erred in assuming that the fact that Phillips had not been subpoenaed prevented the defendant from insisting that his absence was a legal ground of continuance. As to Mr. Mosely, it appears that he had been subpoenaed, and that he was too sick to attend the court on the day of the trial. The question which arises then, as to him, is, would his testimony have been material? It is not denied that he would have testified that the defendant was an idiot, and, if so, incapable of distinguishing right from wrong. This testimony would have been material. It is urged, however, that the defendant had other witnesses by whom he could establish the same fact, and who did testify upon the trial that the defendant was an idiot. If, according to uncontradicted evidence, the testimony of a witness who is unavoidably absent is material, it is not within the power of the court to say that the defendant has sufficient testimony upon that point because he has other witnesses present who will testify to the same fact as the absent witness. The credibility of a witness being for the jury, the court cannot select a party's witness for him. The jury might disregard as wholly unreliable the testimony of the witnesses who are present, and yet might pin their faith to every word uttered by the absent witness. Either his manner upon the stand, his opportunity for knowing the facts, the probability of his statement, or its very apparent sincerity, might carry conviction to the minds of the jury, while the interest or manner or bad character of other witnesses who testify to the same facts might cause the jury to eliminate their testimony from the case as wholly unworthy of credit. This principle was recognized so strongly by the Supreme Court that in Reid v. State, 23 Ga. 190, where the defendant moved for a continuance because of the absence of a witness by whom he expected to prove an alibi, and the court overruled the motion because the defendant had at hand other testimony to the same effect, it was held that the court should either have granted the motion, or exacted a promise from the state not to introduce evidence to destroy the credit of the witness who was present.

3. We think, too, that the court erred in not instructing the jury as to the rules which should govern them in their consideration of the defense of alibi. It is true there was no request to that effect, and it has been held that, where the defense of alibi is presented solely by the defendant's statement, it is not error, in the absence of a request, not to refer specifically to the subject of alibi, because, as it is the duty of the state to prove the defendant's presence, proof of his absence is included under the general defense of "Not guilty." In the present case, however, it was sought to establish the alibi by the sworn testimony of the witnesses. It was the only defense in denial of the act itself presented by the defendant; because the plea of insanity is not a denial of the criminal act; it is not a denial that the defendant committed the act charged against him; it is rather an assertion that, even if he did commit the act, the law grants him immunity and overlooks the act, because he is mentally incapable of crime. The only issue, therefore, as affecting the guilt or innocence of the defendant in this case, if the jury thought him to be sane (as all men are presumed to be), was whether he did or did not do the act charged in the indictment. From one view a mere statement of this fact would seem to be sufficient instruction to the jury upon the subject of alibi, and, of course, in the absence of a request, the trial judge is not required to bring to the attention of the jury the various theories, arising from the evidence, which may tend to show his innocence, or at least the state's failure to prove his guilt. But it is to be borne in mind not only that there are cases in which the defendant might be guilty of a crime without being actually present, but also that where an alibi is insisted upon as a defense, this fact is to be measured by a rule different from that employed in determining the effect of testimony for the state. The state must satisfy the jury that the defendant committed the acts alleged against him, beyond a reasonable doubt. The defendant, to disprove the state's case has only to reasonably satisfy the jury that he was absent. As pointed out in Smith v. State, 3 Ga. App. 803, 61 S. E. 737, this rule is perhaps incongruous, and yet is well established by the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state. In Fletcher v. State, 85 Ga. 666, 11 S. E. 872, and in Moody v. State, 114 Ga. 449, 40 S. E. 242, it was held that when the defense of alibi was relied upon and sustained by testimony, a failure to charge upon the law of alibi would cause a new trial. While the Supreme Court has since held that failure to charge upon alibi, in the absence of a request, where the defense was presented only in the statement of the defendant, was not erroneous, the rulings in the cases of Fletcher and Moody have not been overruled. The holding is merely in accord with the general rule that the court is not required to present any defense arising exclusively from the defendant's statement, without a written request. In every case it is the duty of the judge to present the controlling issues with sufficient definiteness to enable the jury to consider them legally, and as the only issue in this case really affecting the physical participation of the defendant in the alleged criminal act depended upon whether it was probable that he was at such another place at the time of the alleged offense as rendered his participation therein impossible, the jury should have been instructed in the rules controlling the consideration of the evidence by which the defendant sought to establish his alibi.

4. There was no error in the instructions of the trial judge on the subject of insanity as an excuse for crimes. In so far as the requests to charge upon that subject were legal and pertinent, the subject was fully covered in the general charge. The charge of the trial judge as a whole was a luminous exposition of the general principles of law governing the case, and some portions of it were more favorable to the defendant than he had a right to ask, but in our opinion the case should have been postponed, to enable the defendant to present the testimony of the absent witnesses, and the attention of the jury should have been specifically called to his defense of alibi, and the jury should have been told, not only that the defendant was only required to establish this defense to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury, and that if they had any doubts upon that subject the benefit of such doubts should be given the defendant, but also that the evidence tending to show an alibi was to be considered by them with a view of ascertaining whether it created a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, either when considered alone or when taken in connection with all the facts in the case.

Judgment reversed.

RICHARDSON v. STATE. (No. 2,450.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 5, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 778*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE.

The defendant enters upon his trial with the presumption of innocence in his favor, which is equivalent to evidence authorizing his acquittal; but this presumption does not necessarily remain until the end of the investigation. It remains until it is rebutted by proof which is sufficient for that purpose. Consequently it was not error for the court to charge the jury that "the defendant enters upon his trial presumed by law to be innocent, which presumption remains and continues with him throughout and until the end of the trial, unless at some time during the progress of the trial such presumption of innocence is overcome by proof."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1846, 1847; Dec. Dig. § 778.*]

2. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The evidence authorizes the instructions of the trial judge upon the subject of voluntary manslaughter. Construing the evidence as a whole, the evidence of mutual intent to fight was ample. The charge of the court was a full and fair exposition of the law applicable to each of the several grades of homicide involved, and a careful review of the evidence demonstrates that the special exceptions offered no sufficient reason for granting a new trial.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 957*)—JUDGMENT (§ 136*)—DEFAULTS—OPENING—DISCRETION OF COURT—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

Section 5072 of the Civil Code of 1895, providing for the opening of defaults, should be given a liberal construction, in the promotion of justice and the establishment of the truth; and the discretion of the trial judge in opening a default and permitting the defendant to plead will not be interfered with by a reviewing court, unless manifestly abused, to the injury of the plaintiff. Under the facts of this case, the trial judge was fully authorized to open the default and permit the defense to be filed. Basz v. Doughty, 5 Ga. App. 460, 63 S. E. 516; Brawner v. Maddox, 1 Ga. 2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1058*)—NEW TRIAL (§ 41*)—GROUNDS—EXCLUSION OF PROPER EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

The exclusion of competent and relevant testimony will not be ground for reversal, where the same witness subsequently gives testimony substantially the same as that previously rejected by the court; nor will the improper rejection by the trial court of testimony justify the grant of another trial, unless the testimony so excluded would probably have produced a different verdict. Central of Ga. 8. EVIDENCE (§ 474½)—OPINIONS—ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENT.

In a suit on a promissory note, the defense relied upon was that, subsequently to its execution, the payee or his agent made a material alteration in the note, without the knowledge of the maker, and with intent to defraud; the alteration alleged being the addition of the word "seal" to the signature of the maker, so that the instrument was changed from a simple contract in writing to a note under seal, the alteration being made for the purpose of saving the note from the bar of the statute of limitations. Held, testimony that the word "seal" was apparently written with an indelible pencil, in a different handwriting from the signature of the note, and appeared to have been freshly written, and that the impression made by an indelible pencil would rapidly fade, given by witnesses claiming to be experts, was properly admitted. 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 561; Civ. Code 1895, § 5285; Crankshaw v. Schweizer, 1 Ga. App. 369, 58 S. E. 222; 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1242; Davitte v. Southern Ry. Co., 108 Ga. 670 (3), 34 S. E. 327.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 474½.*]

4. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 492*)—ACTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where the defendant denied on oath that the note sued upon was at the time of its execution under seal, alleging that the word "seal" had been added to the signature, by the plaintiff or his agent, with the fraudulent purpose of preventing the application of the statute of limitations to the note, this amounted in substance to a plea of non est factum, and the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to prove the execution of the note as sued upon, and the charge of the court to this effect was not erroneous. Stanton v. Burge, 34 Ga. 435; Winkles v. Guenther, 98 Ga. 472 (3), 25 S. E. 527; Planters' & Mechanics' Bank v. Erwin, 31 Ga. 371; Wheat v. Arnold, 36 Ga. 479; Thrasher v. Anderson, 45 Ga. 544.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 273*)—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF EXCEPTION.

6. TRIAL (§ 232*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the trial judge, in closing his charge to the jury, instructed them, in substance, that if they found that a preponderance of the evidence was in favor of the contentions of the plaintiff, it was their sworn duty to find a verdict for the plaintiff, but, on the other hand, if they found that the preponderance of the evidence was not for the plaintiff, but for the defendant, then it would be their sworn duty, as it should be their pleasure, to return a verdict for the defendant, the instruction was not rendered erroneous by the use of the word "pleasure," in referring to a verdict for the defendant, though the word was not used also in referring to a finding for the plaintiff. Although the plaintiff was a man and the defendant a woman, the use of the word "pleasure" in the connection above indicated did not tend to improperly influence the finding of the jury in behalf of the woman.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

7. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

No error of law appears of sufficient gravity to warrant another trial, and there is evidence to support the verdict.

PELHAM MFG. CO. v. POWELL.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 5, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COURTS (§ 189*)—TRIAL (§§ 10, 367*)—JURY (§ 25*)—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—CITY COURTS—JURISDICTION.

When a statute confers upon the judge of a court jurisdiction to try the facts, unless jury trial be demanded at the return term, no subsequent demand for a jury trial can thereafter divest the judge of this jurisdiction, though in the meantime the case has been tried once and a new trial granted. The statute relates to cases and not to trials.

(a) The jurisdiction to try the facts in such cases attaches to the judge officially, and may be exercised by any judge lawfully presiding in the court.

(b) The privilege of trial by jury may be made dependent upon a timely demand or other conditions, which, though onerous, do not "totally prostrate the right or render it wholly unavailable."

(c) Unless the statute makes it mandatory for the judge to try the case where a jury is not demanded, he has the discretion, nevertheless, of referring the facts to a jury. There was no timely demand for a jury trial in the present case, and the judge did not abuse his discretion in refusing it.

(d) The jurisdiction conferred by statute upon the judge of a city court, to try the facts unless jury trial be demanded in a designated time and way, is to be differentiated from the somewhat similar power sometimes conferred upon judges by stipulations of parties, as to particular trials in which, but for their consent, the judge would have no jurisdiction to pass upon the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 189; Trial, Dec. Dig. §§ 10, 367; Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 154-173; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

2. SETTING ASIDE VERDICT ON APPEAL.

The verdict is not so wholly without evidence to support is as to justify this court in setting it aside.

Error from City Court of Camilla; A. S. Johnson, Judge.

Action by Z. L. Powell, by next friend, against the Pelham Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Payne, Little & Jones and Colquitt & Conyers, for plaintiff in error. Pope & Bennet, Spence & Bennet, and Cox & Peacock, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. This is the second appearance of this case in this court. On the former hearing we reversed a judgment in the plaintiff's favor and sent it back for a rehearing. See Pelham Mfg. Co. v. Powell, 6 Ga. App. 308, 64 S. E. 1116. The general nature of the plaintiff's action is stated in the course of the former opinion, and need not be repeated here. When the case went back for a second trial, and while the officers were engaged in collecting up the jurors to fill the panel, evidently with the view of having the case tried by jury, counsel for the defendant entered an objection to the entire array, based on the ground that the jury boxes of the court had not been properly made up. The judge was about to sustain this objection, when counsel for the plaintiff made the point that no jury was necessary, as jury trial had not been demanded. The court, while holding that this point was well taken, nevertheless stated that he would allow a trial by jury if counsel for the defendant would make certain waivers as the summoning of a new jury, so as to prevent a continuance of the case for the term. Counsel for defendant declined to make the waivers, and tendered a demand for jury trial. The judge then announced that he would try the case without a jury, that the demand for jury trial came too late. The defendant therefore made the suggestion that the judge was disqualified to pass on the facts. The judge sustained this point, and the Honorable Albert Sidney Johnson, the judge of the city court of Newton was called on to preside, and he tried the case without a jury. He rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. No request for jury trial was presented to Judge Johnson, but, at the conclusion of the evidence, certain written objections to his presiding in the court were presented. These grounds of objection were similar to those raised in the case of G. F. & A. Ry. Co. v. Sasser, 4 Ga. App. 278, 61 S. E. 505, and ruled adversely to the defendant's contention in the decision of the Supreme Court in answer to the certified question propounded by this court in that case. See G. F. & A. Ry. Co. v. Sasser, 130 Ga. 394, 60 S. E. 997.

The portion of the act creating the city court of Camilla, relating to the judge's power to try the case without a jury, is in the following language: "The judge of the city court of Camilla shall have power and authority to hear and determine all civil cases of which said court has jurisdiction, and to give judgment thereon; provided, that any party in any case shall be entitled to a trial by jury upon entering a demand therefor in writing by himself or attorney on or before the call of the docket of the term of said court to which said case is made returnable in all cases where such party is entitled to a jury trial under the Constitution and laws of this state."

It was early held in this state that, as to civil cases, "Modern law reform seeks, among other objects, to dispense as much as possible with juries;" that trial by jury is a privilege which may be waived; that when a party has had the opportunity to demand it, and has omitted to demand it, he cannot complain that it has been denied him; that by an act of the General Assembly the privilege may be "clogged with onerous conditions" without offending the fundamental law, unless, indeed, the statute be such as "totally prostrates the right or renders it wholly unavailing." Flint River Steamboat Co. v. Foster, 5 Ga. 194, 48 Am. Dec. 243. The requirement of a demand for jury trial as a condition precedent to the enjoyment of the privilege is no violation of the constitutional right of trial by jury. Sutton v. Gunn, 86 Ga. 652, 12 S. E. 979. If the statute fixes a reasonable time within which the demand must be made, the right is ordinarily lost unless the demand be made within the time prescribed. Sutton v. Gunn, supra; Heard v. Kennedy, 116 Ga. 36, 42 S. E. 509. See, also, Waterman v. Gllsson, 115 Ga. 773, 42 S. E. 95; Miller v. G. R. Bank, 120 Ga. 17, 47 S. E. 525. In the case of Heard v. Kennedy, just cited, where the language of the statute was almost literally that before us now, it was held that, if the jury trial was not demanded at the return term, it could not be demanded at a subsequent term.

In some of the city court acts of this state the language is mandatory that the judge shall try the case, if jury trial is not demanded, and in those courts the judge has not the discretion to order a jury trial over the protest of either party. Green v. State, 6 Ga. App. 324, 64 S. E. 1121, and cases therein cited. But unless the language is mandatory that the judge shall try the case in the absence of a demand for jury trial (and the language of the present act is not mandatory in that respect), the judge has the discretion of referring the facts to a jury. Central R. Co. v. Gleason, 69 Ga. 200; Bibb Land Co. v. Lima Machine Works, 104 Ga. 116, 30 S. E. 676, 31 S. E. 401; Thorn-ton v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 116 Ga. 121, 42 S. E. 287, 94 Am. St. Rep. 99. If the statute sets no time limit within which the demand must be made, it may be made at any time before the case is called for trial, or upon the call for trial; and in such cases a waiver of jury trial may be withdrawn, where the case has been tried once and a new trial is to be had, if the notice of a desire for jury trial is timely given. Brown v. State, 89 Ga. 340, 15 S. E. 462. A party who without protest goes to trial before the judge when he should have been tried before the jury, and vice versa, will not be heard to complain or to demand a hearing before the other trier. Logan v. State, 86 Ga. 268, 12 S. E. 406; Taffee v. State, 90 Ga. 459, 16 S. E. 204; Thomas v. State, 7 Ga. App. 637, 67 S. E. 894. The only fair deduction to be drawn from the principles stated and the cases cited above is that where the statute confers jurisdiction upon the judge to try the case without the intervention of a jury unless a demand for jury trial is made within a designated time, and the language does not make the duty of so trying it mandatory, the judge thereafter has the discretion of passing on the facts himself or of submitting them to a jury; and that neither party, after the time for making the demand has expired, can insist, as a matter of right, that the case be tried otherwise than in the manner allowed by the judge in his discretion. Generally a judge who has once passed upon the facts should exercise his discretion by refusing to try them again. But in the case at bar, where an unbiased judge who had never heard the facts was accessible, and a jury could not be obtained without considerable delay, there was no abuse of discretion in refusing a demand for jury trial, made after the term at which the statute prescribed it should be demanded. In fact, Judge Scaife, who first called the case, seems to have treated the defendant with all reasonable consideration in the matter; for he declined to exercise his discretion of ordering a trial without a jury, until it appeared that, on account of the objections the defendant was making, a jury could not be obtained without considerable trouble and delay.

The proposition here asserted deals with the extent of the judge's jurisdiction to try the facts, when a statute confers that jurisdiction, but makes it divestible by a demand for jury trial tendered within a designated time, and is not to be confused with the proposition, very widely recognized (see Worthington v. Nashville, etc., Ry., 114 Tenn. 177, 86 S. W. 307, and the annotations thereto as published in 4 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 1002), that where the parties by stipulation waive jury trial and consent for the case to be tried before a judge who otherwise would not have the jurisdiction thus to try it, the consent will not be extended to a retrial of the case, but will be presumed to have had reference only to the trial which, at the time the agreement was made, was about to occur before the particular judge to whom the stipulation referred. Almost the identical point involved in this case was before the Supreme Court of Alabama in the case of Brock v. Louisville & Nashville R. Co., 122 Ala. 172, 26 South. 335. That court held that where the statute required the demand for a jury trial to be made at the first term, it could not be made thereafter, though in the meantime the case had been tried once and had been remanded by the Supreme Court for a new trial. As the court there said, "The statute deals with cases, not trials."

2. As to the other proposition so ably argued by counsel for the plaintiff in error—that the verdict is without evidence to support it—we will say that if we were, in the true sense of the words, a court of appeals, and not merely a court for the correction of errors of law, we could not give our approval to the verdict; the weight of the evidence seems to be against it.

But judgment affirmed.

BUTLER v. LAZENBY. (No. 2,580.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 19, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. POSSESSORY WARRANT (§ 1*)—WHEN LIES—POSSESSION OF DEFENDANT.

Possessory warrant will lie for the recovery of property wrongfully taken from the plaintiff's possession, though the defendant at the time of the issuance of the writ, has not personal physical possession of it, if it be in his power, custody, or control, or in the possession of some agent or custodian holding it for him or in collusion with him. When the property itself is before the court, the defendant, who denies that he is in possession of the property, is in no just position to complain if the court awards the possession to the plaintiff; the rights of no third person being involved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Possessory Warrant, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

2. POSSESSORY WARRANT (§ 7*)—CERTIORARI—POWERS OF SUPERIOR COURT—FINAL JUDGMENT.

Possessory warrant procedure is summary. The judge of the superior court has plenary jurisdiction, on certiorari in such cases, to settle all disputed issues of fact and to render final judgment.

Error from Superior Court, McDuffie County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by D. T. Lazenby against Reuben Butler. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

P. B. Johnson, for plaintiff in error. Jno. T. West, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. 1. Lazenby sued out a possessory warrant against Butler, his cropper, to recover possession of a bale of cotton. On the trial before the justice, the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff was that the defendant still owed him for advances and supplies, and that the bale of cotton in question was a part of the crop. The defendant did not deny that the bale of cotton was a part of the crop, but set up that there had been a division, and that he had paid all advances, and that with Lazenby's consent he had sold the cotton to Hunt Bros. Lazenby denied that he had given his consent for any sale of the property, and the evidence on the subject of a sale was in conflict. The constable had the cotton itself before the court, and Hunt, the alleged purchaser, was not a party to the case. The justice awarded the possession of the property to Lazenby, the plaintiff in the possessory warrant. The case was carried by certiorari to the superior court, where the decision of the justice was sustained. This ruling of the superior court is now before us for review.

It is contended by the plaintiff in error that a possessory warrant will not lie against any one who is not in possession of the property at the time the warrant is sued out, and that in the present case, the possession of the cotton having been transferred to Hunt Bros., no legal judgment could be entered against Butler. Since in a possessory warrant case, possession is the only issue to be tried (Civ. Code 1895, § 4802), manifestly the action would fail of its purpose if the court could not lay hands on the property. In view of this fact, Civ. Code 1895, § 4805, authorizes most summary measures to compel the production of the property when it is in the possession of the defendant, or of any agent of his, or of any person intrusted by him with the property. In this case the court had the property physically before it. The only contestants as to the right of possession were Lazenby and Butler. If Butler did not have possession, actual or constructive, of the property, then what right has he to complain of the judgment? For the judgment merely settles the question of possession. If any third person has rights in the matter, these rights do not affect the defendant, and the judgment does not affect the third person. Besides, the court was authorized to find that the alleged purchaser was merely holding the cotton for the defendant.

2. It is also contended that Lazenby consented to the sale by Butler, and that under Dennard v. Butler, 2 Ga. App. 198, 58 S. E. 297, possessory warrant would not lie. Consent is a matter of fact (Marchman v. Todd, 15 Ga. 25), and on this point the evidence is conflicting. In possessory warrant cases, carried up on certiorari, the judge of the superior court may render a final judgment, notwithstanding conflicts in the evidence. Susong v. McKenna, 121 Ga. 97, 48 S. E. 695. If the judge sustains the judgment of the justice, on the conflicting facts, this court will not reverse his judgment; certainly not unless he has manifestly abused his discretion. Hill v. Johnson, 74 Ga. 362.

BURGLARY (§ 41*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The proof of the corpus delicti being insufficient, and there being no evidence tending to show where the car alleged to have been broken was located at the time of the alleged breaking, the conviction of the defendant was unauthorized, and a new trial should have been granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

James Thomas was convicted of breaking into a railroad car, and brings error. Reversed.

Moore & Moore, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., and D. K. Johnston, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant in the court below was indicted for breaking into and entering a railroad car in the custody of the Southern Railroad Company. He was arrested late one night on the streets of Atlanta by a policeman, who found him in possession of seven pairs of shoes, which were later identified as having come from a box of shoes which had been loaded into a car upon the tracks of the railroad company. The defendant, upon being arrested, stated that he was carrying the shoes, as directed by a hackman, to a house near by, but disclaimed any knowledge of where or how they were obtained. Both drivers of the hack in question were introduced by the state, and denied having given the shoes to the defendant. Testimony was introduced, showing that shoes similar to those found in the possession of the accused were loaded into the car, and another witness testified that he sealed the car in question. No testimony, however, was introduced tending to show where the car was at the time of the breaking—whether it was broken into on the track where it was loaded, which was shown to have been in Fulton county, or whether the breaking was done at some other place, perhaps not in Fulton county.

Inasmuch as the proof of the corpus delicti is not clear, and the venue not satisfactorily established, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the other assignments of error. The defendant may be guilty of larceny, because he had the shoes in Fulton county (see Burley v. State, 81 Ga. 741, 7 S. E. 693); but no one testified that the car was actually broken, and that it was in Fulton county at the time or after it had been broken and entered. As there must be another trial, however, we will say that under the evidence in the present record the judge should have instructed the jury that, where circumstantial evidence alone is relied upon to authorize a conviction, the circumstances must be sufficient to satisfy the jury of the defendant's guilt, to the exclusion of any other reasonable hypothesis than that he is guilty, and that if the circumstances relied upon are as consistent with the innocence of the accused as with the theory of his guilt he should be acquitted. Riley v. State,

1 Ga. App. 651, 57 S. E. 1031. The law in its humanity requires that in every criminal case, in which the guilt of the defendant is dependent wholly on circumstantial evidence, the jury should be instructed that, if the proven facts are consistent with innocence, the defendant is entitled to an acquittal.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 19, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

RAILROADS (§ 447*)—KILLING OF STOCK—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a suit to recover damages from a railroad company for killing a cow, the court charged the jury, "If you believe the railroad company was not negligent—did all they could to prevent the killing—under the rules of law given to you, and are not liable therefor, the form of your verdict will be, 'We, the jury, find for the defendant.'" The foregoing excerpt was excepted to, because the use of the words "and are not liable therefor" allowed the jury to find against the defendant, although they found it was not negligent, and did all it could to prevent the killing of the cow. Held, that this criticism is wholly without merit, irrespective of other exceptions that might have been taken. No other error of law being complained of, and the verdict being supported by the evidence, the judgment refusing a new trial is affirmed.

STATE v. REVELS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 4, 1910.)

HOMICIDE (§ 255*)—INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to warrant a conviction of involuntary manslaughter caused by the negligent manner of handling a gun.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court, Marlboro County.

French Revels was convicted of involuntary manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Townsend & Rogers, for appellant. J. Monroe Spears, Sol., for the State.

JONES, C. J. The defendant was convicted of involuntary manslaughter and sentenced to two years on the public works of the county. The only question involved in the exceptions is whether there was any testimony tending to show involuntary manslaughter.

There was testimony that on the night of the homicide there was an ice cream supper given at the home of defendant, and that deceased, James Henry Jacobs, who was the brother-in-law of defendant, was present assisting the defendant, appearing to be partner. A crowd was present. In the yard a man and a boy were quarreling. Defendant told them he was not going to have any fuss there, and ordered the man Smith to shut up or get out, and Smith replied with an oath that he would hush or get out when he got ready. Defendant walked off saying that he would scatter the crowd, went into his house, and was returning along the passage in the direction of the front door with a cocked gun in his hand, when Allen Tolson caught hold of the gun, and requested defendant to put it up lest he cause trouble, and defendant said that he was not mad; that he would not hurt any one. The defendant told Tolson to turn the gun loose; it was cocked. About the time Tolson turned the gun loose the deceased, Jacobs, took hold of the barrel end, and they were pulling at the gun when it fired, the load striking deceased about the knee, from which wound he died. Immediately after the shooting, defendant said he would not have done it for anything in the world, and walked out of the house. Before he died, Jacobs said he was not mad with defendant, and would not hold it against him.

The testimony was sufficient to warrant an inference that the homicide was caused by the negligent handling of the loaded gun, within the definition of involuntary manslaughter as declared and enforced in State v. Gilliam, 68 S. C. 422, 45 S. E. 6.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

STATE v. TUCKER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 5, 1910.)

HOMICIDE (§ 74*)—INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER—CRIMINAL CARELESSNESS—STANDARD FOR DETERMINATION.

Criminal carelessness on which to base a conviction of involuntary manslaughter is determinable by the standard of simple negligence or carelessness, or mere inadvertence, and it does not involve that degree of lack of care amounting to recklessness or gross carelessness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 97-101; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Union County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Russel Tucker was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Wallace & Barron, for appellant. J. C. Otta, Sol., for the State.

JONES, C. J. The defendant, under an indictment for murder, was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to two years at hard labor on the public works of the county.

The testimony for the state tended to show that in Union county in December, 1909, at night, the defendant, who had never handled a pistol before, got his father's pistol out of the bureau and was "projecting" around with it in the room in presence of the deceased, a boy about 10 years old, his sister, and one or more other smaller children. Defendant, whose age is not stated, had playfully snatched a dime from the pocket of his sister, and the sister tried to recover it when defendant said to her: "If you don't sit down I am going to shoot you." The sister sat down and then the deceased tried to take the money from defendant, and defendant told him if he didn't sit down he was going to shoot him and deceased said: "No, you won't either." Then defendant said: "If you don't believe it, hold out your hand, I will show you." Then deceased held out his hand and snatched it back. Shortly afterwards the pistol fired, the ball striking deceased in the neck and killing him, whereupon the defendant said: "Lord have mercy! did I shoot him?" and, being frightened, ran off for a couple of hours, and returned. The deceased was a half-brother of the defendant. The defendant testified that he was sitting down rubbing the pistol and that deceased was sitting down by his side when he commenced, and that without knowing that it was loaded or that his brother was in front of him, pulled the trigger without meaning to do so. From the foregoing statement it is clear that there was some testimony of criminal carelessness in handling the pistol, which resulted in homicide.

Exception is taken to the following charge to the jury: "Where a person handles firearms in a criminally careless way and causes the death of some person, he would be guilty of manslaughter. Now, it is necessary for me to define to you what we mean by carelessness or negligence. Negligence is the want of due care; it is the failure to observe due care under the circumstances, or I might put it this way, it is the failure to do that which a person of ordinary firmness and reason would have done under the circumstances, or it is doing something that a person of ordinary care and prudence would not have done under the same circumstances. Now, that is a question of fact to you. The defendant comes into court charged with the taking of the life of Nick Tucker. He says that he did it; that it was an accident. Now, the question before you is whether or not, in taking the life of Nick Tucker, the defendant here was guilty of criminal carelessness in the sense that I have defined it to you. Inquire, would a person of ordinary prudence, surrounded by the same circumstances that surrounded him at the time, have acted in the same way that he did?"

The error assigned is that the court thereby charged that criminal carelessness upon which a verdict of guilty of involuntary manslaughter could be based was to be determined by the standard of simple negligence or carelessness or mere inadvertence, whereas it is submitted that criminal carelessness involves that degree of lack of care amounting to recklessness or gross carelessness. The point raised has been expressly ruled against appellant's contention in the case of State v. Gilliam, 66 S. C. 423, 45 S. E. 6, which sustained a charge like the one complained of, and held that a person who causes another's death by the negligent use of a pistol or gun is guilty of manslaughter, unless the negligence is so wanton as to make the killing murder.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

STATE v. EDWARDS.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 593*)—CONTINUANCE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Berkeley County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

James Edwards was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John O. Edwards, for appellant. P. T. Hildebrand, Sol., for the State.

JONES, C. J. The defendant was arraigned at the July, 1909, term of the court of general sessions for Berkeley county, Judge Watts presiding, charged with the murder of his wife about eight years previous. The case was continued. At the November, 1909, term, Judge Ernest Gary presiding, the case was tried and resulted in a conviction of murder without recommendation to mercy, and defendant was sentenced to be hanged on December 10, 1909.

The exceptions assign error in the refusal to continue the case at the November term and in proceeding with the trial. The court has often declared that the refusal of a motion for continuance is in the discretion of the trial court and will not be ground for reversal, except in a clear case of abuse of discretion. State v. Kenny, 77 S. C. 240, 57 S. E. 859.

In his order settling the case the presiding judge stated his reason for refusing the motion as follows: "The defendant was arraigned at the previous term of the court held by the Honorable R. C. Watts. For reasons satisfactory to him, a continuance at that term of court was granted. During the progress of the November term this case was called, after having been reached on the calendar, and the solicitor announced promptly that the state was ready and insisted upon a trial. The docket showed that Mr. Edwards and Mr. Davis were noted as counsel for the defendant, not only at the November term, but were so noted at the previous term. After the announcement made by the solicitor, Mr. Edwards appearing for the defendant, made a motion for the continuance, basing said motion, in part, upon the inclosed certificate and on the further grounds that Mr. Edwards did not feel fully warranted to proceed with the trial. It appeared to me that Mr. Edwards, being a lawyer of experience, was fully capable of managing the defendant's case, and I therefore held that the motion based on this certificate (the same being so very definite) was insufficient, and ordered the case to proceed to trial. The case was regularly tried, ably represented by Mr. Edwards, and the result is as appears in the case."

The physician's certificate, dated November 1, 1909, was in these words: "I hereby certify that Mr. G. B. Davis of the Berkeley bar is physically unable to attend court at this term or to attend to business, either legal or otherwise, at present. [Signed] H. S. Feagin, M. D." We see no abuse of discretion here.

The case is quite different from Varn v. Green, 50 S. C. 404, 27 S. E. 862, wherein all the counsel for the prisoner were sick and thereby unable to conduct his defense, and the trial judge committed error of law in permitting his ruling, refusing to continue, to be controlled by his custom in such cases to require the prisoner to employ other counsel.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed, and the case is remanded, so that a new day may be assigned for the execution of the sentence.

DOVER v. LOCKHART MILLS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 4, 1910.)

1. TRIAL (§ 287*)—INSTRUCTIONS—INADVERTENT ERRORS—USE OF "AND" INSTEAD OF "OR."

In an action for injuries to a servant, where the complaint alleged negligence in not furnishing plaintiff with safe machinery and a safe place to work, in that a belt which broke and injured him was old, unsafe, defective and worn out, thereby causing it to break easily, an instruction that the burden was on plaintiff to prove that the place at which he was put to work was not safe and suitable, "and" that the belt was old, unsafe, and defective, was not objectionable for using the conjunctive instead of the disjunctive; there being in effect only one specification of negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 702; Dec. Dig. § 287.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 215*)—PRESENTATION OF OBJECTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Any mere inadvertences in a charge, such as the use of a conjunctive instead of a disjunctive, must be brought to the attention of the trial judge or they will not avail as grounds of appeal.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 264*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTION—PLEADINGS AND PROOF.

In an action for injuries to a servant by the breaking of a belt which plaintiff was attempting to place on moving machinery, where there was no allegation in the complaint that the belt was too tight, but it was alleged that it was unsafe and defective in that it was old and worn out, an instruction to disregard unsolicited testimony that the belt was too tight was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 865; Dec. Dig. § 264.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a servant by the breaking of a belt, instructions that if the belt was old and rotten and plaintiff threw it on a rapidly moving piece of machinery, when any one, by the exercise of ordinary care, would have known that it was dangerous, and the proximate cause of his injury was his own negligent act in so doing, instead of stopping the machinery before putting it on, it was for the jury to say whether he was guilty of negligence, and whether his negligence contributed to the injury, were not objectionable as charges on the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 465, 466; Dec. Dig. § 194;* Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 358, 359.]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 296*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to a servant, an instruction that a servant has a right to assume that the machinery and appliances are reasonably safe, but that a man cannot walk into an apparent danger, and, without the slightest exercise of his faculties, take up a thing which the slightest degree of care would show him was unsafe, and recover because he thought it was all right, was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1182, 1185; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 231*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—CARE REQUIRED OF SERVANT.

A servant may, without inspection, assume and rely upon the assumption that the machinery and appliances furnished him by the master are safe and suitable, and he is not bound to use ordinary care to ascertain if they are so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 675; Dec. Dig. § 231.*]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 217, 234*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—KNOWLEDGE OF DANGER.

If a servant knows that appliances are not safe and suitable, or if it is obvious or apparent that they are not, and he uses them and is injured, he may be held to have assumed the risk or to have been guilty of contributory negligence, with certain exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 574, 706; Dec. Dig. §§ 217, 234.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to a servant, error in charging that a servant must use ordinary care to ascertain if the machinery and appliances furnished him by his master are safe, is not prejudicial where the law was correctly stated several times, and just before the language complained of the judge had said that "a man cannot walk into an apparent danger, and, without the slightest exercise of his faculties, take up a thing which the slightest degree of care would show him was unsafe," and just after the language complained of he said, "if it is apparent that it is unsafe," etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705, 709; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 264*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—ISSUES AND PROOF.

The burden being upon plaintiff in an action for injuries to prove the allegation of his complaint that his injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant, his employer; the defendant, under the general denial, had the right to introduce any testimony tending to disprove that allegation, as, for instance, that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant or by the sole negligence of plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 864; Dec. Dig. § 264.*]

10. TRIAL (§ 314*)—CONDUCT AND DELIBERATIONS OF JURY—COERCING AGREEMENT.

The action of the court in recalling the jury and telling them that he regretted to keep them out longer in the case as it was clogging the work of the court, that it seemed absurd that a jury of 12 men could not agree on a case like that, that the case had had a fair and complete trial, and had been presented clearly, was not objectionable as coercing the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 747; Dec. Dig. § 314.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 975*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF COURT—CONTROL OF DELIBERATIONS OF JURY.

The length of time which should be given to the consideration of a case by the jury being a matter for the sound discretion of the court, the exercise of such discretion will not be reviewed unless it has been abused.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Union County; R. W. Memminger, Judge. Action by Joseph B. Dover against the Lockhart Mills. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John K. Hamblin, for appellant. Townsend & Townsend and Sirrine & Charles, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff sought to recover damages for injuries received while assisting a fellow servant in putting a belt on a pulley which was revolving very rapidly. The belt broke, and the end of it struck and hurt plaintiff's hand. Plaintiff was 47 years of age, and had been working in the mill about 30 days. By the use of a lever near at hand he could have stopped the machine and put the belt on with safety; and the person whom he was assisting testified that he told him several times to do so, but plaintiff refused, and insisted on putting the belt on while the pulley was in motion. The defenses were a general denial, and the pleas of contributory negligence and assumption of risk.

The first specification of negligence in the complaint was "in not furnishing plaintiff with safe machinery, and a safe place in which to work, in that the said belt was old, unsafe, defective, worn out, thereby causing the said belt to break easily." The court instructed the jury that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove that the place at which he was put to work was not safe and suitable, and that the belt was old, unsafe, and defective. The error assigned is in the use of the conjunctive "and" between the words "safe" and "suitable" and between the words "unsafe" and "defective," instead of the disjunctive "or"; the contention being that, where there are several specifications of negligence, it is not incumbent on the plaintiff to prove all of them, but if he proves only one, and that it was the proximate cause of his injury, he is entitled to recover, which, as a general proposition, is correct, but, properly construed, the complaint contained only one specification of negligence—that the belt had become defective from long use, in other words, that it was worn out. The other modifying adjectives used added nothing to this charge. The same may be said of the adjectives descriptive of the place—if it was "unsafe," it was "unsuitable." In this connection, these words are used interchangeably and synonymously. In responding to an exception which made the same point, the court said, in Davis v. R. R., 75 S. C. 307, 55 S. E. 527: "It would greatly embarrass the practical administration of the law for the appellate court, in reviewing charges to the jury, to become hypercritical or a stickler for the technical rules of philology in every phrase and clause, and reverse verdicts for some loose expression or some slight misuse of a word, when the general import of the charge stated the law. Any portion of a charge to which exception is taken should be fairly construed with reference to the clear tenor and import of the whole, and as an effort to explain the law of a case to men of ordinary or average education and intelligence. The average jurymen has little knowledge and less concern about fine distinctions, but generally has a desire and capacity for sufficient information to enable him to do substantial justice between the parties." Mere inadvertences of such a nature in charging the jury must be brought to the attention of the judge, or they will not avail as grounds of appeal; for if they are not of sufficient importance to attract the attention of counsel learned in the law, we may safely assume they do not mislead the jury or affect the result.

There was no error in instructing the jury to disregard the unsolicited testimony of one of the witnesses that the belt was too tight, because there was no such allegation in the complaint. It is contended that the allegation that it was unsafe and defective is broad enough to admit evidence that it was too tight. That might be so, if it had been alleged generally, and without more, that the belt was unsafe and defective. But, referring to the allegation of the complaint, it will be seen that, properly construed, it was intended to allege that the belt was unsafe and defective only in that it was old and worn out. There is not even an intimation to be gathered from the language used that it was too tight.

The fourth and ninth exceptions will be considered together. The fourth exception complains of the following instruction: "If you find that the belt was old and rotten, and that it was negligence on the part of the mill to furnish him with such a belt, if you so find, and that the man went and picked it up and threw it on a rapidly moving piece of machinery, which any one, by the exercise of ordinary care, would have known that it was dangerous, and the proximate cause of his injury was the negligent act of his own in putting the belt on a moving machine, instead of stopping the machine before putting it on, and the proximate cause was not the defect in the belt, but was the negligent act of the man himself in putting the belt on the moving piece of machinery, it would be for you to say whether, under that state of facts, he himself was guilty of negligence; if you find that he was, and that his own negligence contributed to the injury as a proximate cause, if the belt was old and rotten, but his own negligence would have brought about the same results had it been a new belt—then he is not entitled to recover; that is what is known as contributory negligence."

After the jury had been out some time, they were brought in, and the court gave them further instructions, of which the following portion is complained of in the ninth exception: "Now, on the other hand, if the belt was so rotten and defective, so obviously dangerous as claimed on the part of the plaintiff, and he went and picked it up, and it was such a belt that any reasonable man could see was defective, and he deliberately put it on a moving piece of machinery, regardless of any rule, or any instructions, if any, you would have to say from the testimony whether or not he exercised, under the circumstances, the care a reasonable man would have done in putting a belt on a moving piece of machinery, and the question would be, then, could he recover if he had seen, or could have seen, that it was a defective belt, and that comes under the head of contributory negligence."

The errors assigned are that the judge charged on the facts (1) in stating what facts or series of facts would constitute contributory negligence, and (2) that it was inferable from the charge that, in his opinion, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. It will be seen from an analysis of the language above quoted that the facts are stated hypothetically, and that it was left to the jury to say whether, if they found the facts so stated to be true, the plaintiff was guilty of negligence; and, if so, whether his negligence contributed to his injury as a proximate cause thereof. The judge did not say what facts or series of facts would amount to negligence; nor can there be gathered from the language used any intimation of his opinion as to the facts.

The sixth and seventh exceptions impute error to a part of the charge which was in response to a verbal request made by plaintiff's attorney at the conclusion of the principal charge, as follows: "In connection with what your honor has said, I would like you to charge the jury that the plaintiff had a right to assume that the machinery was reasonably safe, and, in regard to the assumption of risk, he assumes the risk, unless it was known or apparent to him." The court: "I have already charged the jury fully on that point—that the party has a right to assume that the machinery and appliances are reasonably safe, and that the place to work is safe—and I charge you, also, that a man cannot walk into an apparent danger, and, without the slightest exercise of his faculties, take up a thing which the slightest degree of care would show him that it was unsafe, and then say he can recover, because he thought it was all right. The law does not set a premium on that sort of carelessness. A man has a right to rely upon the assumption that a thing is safe, but nevertheless says he must use ordinary care to ascertain if it is, and if it is apparent that it is unsafe, and he uses it and gets hurt, I don't think any fair-minded man would say that he would be entitled to recover, and the law says so; and while he has a right to rely upon that assumption the law requires that he use his faculties to see what the risk is, and what the condition of the thing was."

The errors assigned are (1) that the judge charged on the facts, in stating what facts or series of facts would amount to carelessness, and (2) in charging that while a servant has the right to assume that the appliances furnished him by his master are safe and suitable, nevertheless he must exercise ordinary care to ascertain if they are, and if it is apparent that they are not, and he uses them and gets hurt, he cannot recover of the master.

The first assignment of error is untenable, for certainly, if a man walks into "apparent danger, and, without the slightest exercise of his faculties, takes up a thing which the slightest degree of care would show him was unsafe," he is guilty of negligence, which is the lack of only ordinary care. But there was error in charging that a servant must use ordinary care to ascertain if the machinery and appliances furnished him by his master are safe. A servant may, without inspection, assume and rely upon the assumption that the machinery and appliances furnished him by the master are safe and suitable, and he is not bound to use ordinary care to ascertain if they are so; but if he knows that they are not, or if it is obvious or apparent that they are not, and he uses them and is injured, he may be held to have assumed the risk, or to have been guilty of contributory negligence, except under circumstances of which there is no proof in this case.

By reference to the charge, it will be seen that the law upon this point had been correctly stated several times, and it was so stated immediately preceding the language complained of. Just before and in connection with the language complained of, the judge had said, "a man cannot walk into an apparent danger, and, without the slightest exercise of his faculties, take up a thing which the slightest degree of care would show him that it was unsafe," etc.; and just after the language complained of, he said, "If it is apparent that it is unsafe," etc., which, taken in connection with the context and with the whole charge, shows that the idea which the judge intended to convey and did convey was that while a servant has the right to assume and rely upon the assumption that the machinery and appliances furnished him are safe and suitable, still he cannot, under cover of that assumption, expose himself to obvious danger, and hold the master liable for the injurious consequences, except as above stated, under circumstances which appear not to have existed in this case. We are satisfied, therefore, that the error was not prejudicial.

The fifth exception complains of error in not charging that the burden was upon defendant to prove that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. The burden was upon plaintiff to prove the allegation of his complaint that his injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant. Under the general denial, the defendant had the right to introduce any testimony tending to disprove that allegation, as, for instance, testimony tending to prove that it was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, or by the sole negligence of the plaintiff. Roberts v. Virginia-Carolina Chem. Co., 84 S. C. 283, 66 S. E. 298; Wilson v. Ry., 51 S. C. 95, 28 S. E. 91; Kennedy v. Ry., 59 S. O. 535, 38 S. E. 169.

The eighth exception charged that the judge coerced the verdict. After the jury had had the case under consideration for some time, they came into court, and the judge asked if there was any prospect of their reaching a verdict, and the foreman replied in the negative. After ascertaining that their differences were on the facts, the judge said, and this is the language complained of: "Now, gentlemen, I regret to keep you out longer on this case; it is clogging the work of the court. Another jury has gone out on another case; and, until you reach a verdict in this case, we will not have enough jurors to go on with the work. It seems absurd that a jury of 12 men cannot agree upon a case like that, and find a verdict one way or the other. The case was on the calendar. It has had a fair and complete trial, and has been presented to you gentlemen clearly. It has consumed the time of the court, and caused expense to your county." His honor then restated the salient principles of law applicable to the facts of the case, and sent the jury back for further deliberation. We see nothing in the language quoted from which it can be inferred that the verdict was coerced. It is the duty of the trial judge to admonish juries of the desirability and importance of trying to reconcile their differences and agree upon a verdict, and, in the exercise of the discretion vested in him, to keep them together for such reasonable time as may seem necessary and proper to that end. He is in the atmosphere of the trial, and is cognizant of all the facts and circumstances developed during the trial; and therefore the length of time which should be given to the consideration of the case by the jury must be left to his sound discretion. This court will not interfere with the exercise of that discretion, unless it is clearly made to appear that it has been abused. In this case, it appears to have been wisely exercised.

Judgment affirmed.

DISEKER v. EAU CLAIRE LAND & IMPROVEMENT CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 13, 1910.)

1. COVENANTS (§ 100*)—WARRANTY—BREACH—INCUMBRANCE.

A decision in a suit by a purchaser against the vendor which adjudges that a representation made to the purchaser by the vendor that certain land should be kept open is binding on the vendor, though the land has not been dedicated, is a decision that the land is incumbered within a covenant of warranty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. §§ 139, 155; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

2. COVENANTS (§ 104*)—WARRANTY—BREACH—REMEDIES.

Where an outstanding right to an easement on land conveyed by deed containing a covenant of warranty is enforced, and thus becomes a burden on the land, an action on the warranty is maintainable, but the mere right to an easement may not be set up by the grantee as a breach of warranty, when his use of the land has not been affected by the assertion of the right against him.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Action by James H. Diseker, Jr., against the Eau Claire Land & Improvement Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank G. Tompkins, for appellant. Lyles & Lyles, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for breach of the covenants of warranty in two deeds, executed on the 5th of April, 1905, and the 9th of September, 1905, whereby the defendant conveyed to the plaintiff certain lots of land described in the complaint.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendant, committed a breach of the covenants of warranty by selling to him the said lands, after they had been dedicated by the former owners to the use of the citizens of the town of Eau Claire, for the purpose of establishing a park or public place, and that the lots, at the time of said sales, were burdened by this outstanding incumbrance in the nature of an easement, in favor of said town and the public in general.

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit on the following grounds: "1. That there has been no eviction or disturbance of the possession of the plaintiff, of the property in question—no actual eviction or disturbance of the property. 2. That by the decree of the circuit court, and the Supreme Court's decision of the case of Marshall v. Eau Claire Electric Railway Company it is not adjudged, so as to bind the defendant here, that the square in question had been dedicated to the town of Eau Claire, or to the public of any community. 3. That there is no evidence in this case whatever of a dedication and acceptance by the public, which would show even any shadow of doubt of the title of the plaintiff to these lots in question. 4. It appears from the testimony that only a part of the lots of Diseker is affected by the doubt, even if any such exists." His honor, the presiding judge, overruled the first and fourth grounds, but sustained the second and third.

The first question that will be considered is whether there was error in sustaining the second and third grounds of the motion. It must be remembered that the rights of the plaintiff in the case of Marshall v. St. Ry. Co., 73 S. C. 241, 53 S. E. 417, are not involved in this action. In that case it was decreed by his honor, the circuit judge, "that the defendant company be, and they are hereby, restrained from conveying any portion of said 'circle' to any person whomsoever." And in affirming said decree, the Supreme Court said: "Even if the map was not accepted or adopted by the defendant company, and even if the 'circle' was not dedicated, so as to confer rights that could be enforced by the public, nevertheless, if the company represented to the plaintiff that the 'circle' would be kept open, and thereby induced the plaintiff to purchase her lots, such representation would be binding upon the defendants," thus showing that the defendant had created an incumbrance on the property embraced within the "circle," against which it covenanted by the clauses of warranty contained in the said deeds. The exceptions raising this question are sustained.

The respondent's attorneys gave notice that they would ask for the order of nonsuit, upon the additional grounds that his honor, the presiding judge, erred in overruling the first and fourth grounds of said motion; and the next question that will be considered is whether there was error in this respect. As stated in Nathans v. Steinmeyer, 57 S. C. 386, 35 S. E. 733, we regard the law as settled in this state, that neither partial nor total failure of consideration can be set up as a defense, on account of a paramount outstanding title before eviction. It is also said in Brown v. Thompson, 81 S. C. 380, 62 S. E. 440, that a defendant cannot set up an incumbrance as a breach of the warranty, unless he has been evicted under it, or has actually extinguished it in whole or in part, to protect his title and possession. The reasons for the rule are stated in Nathans v. Steinmeyer, 57 S. C. 386, 35 S. E. 733, and are alike applicable to those cases in which the action is commenced by the grantee for a breach of the warranty, and those in which he, as defendant, attempts to set up the breach of warranty as a defense, when sued for the purchase money. The presiding judge erred, therefore in not sustaining the nonsuit on this ground.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

WOODS, J. I concur. The incumbrance set up by the plaintiff, as a breach of the warranty contained in the conveyance to him, was the easement adjudged to be the right of Mrs. Marshall, in her suit against the Columbia & Eau Claire Electric Railway Company, to have the land, a part of which was conveyed to the plaintiff, kept open, as land dedicated to the public use. The position was taken by plaintiff's counsel that the rule which requires the grantee to show that he has extinguished the outstanding incumbrance, or has been evicted under it before he can maintain an action on a general warranty, does not apply when the incumbrance is an easement. It is true, as argued by counsel, that the grantee may not be able to extinguish the easement, but it is also true that the right to it may never be enforced. It cannot be doubted, under the principle on which the cases in this state were decided, that when an outstanding right to an easement exists and the right is actually enforced so as to become a burden on the land, an action on the warranty could be maintained. But the mere right to an easement in a third party cannot be set up by the grantee as a breach of warranty, when his use of the land has not been affected by the assertion of the right against him. Whatever may be the rights of Mrs. Marshall, there is no evidence that she has ever asserted them, so as to interfere with the plaintiff's enjoyment of the land conveyed to him.

GENS v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 5, 1910.)

TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 69*)—TELEGRAMS—FAILURE TO DELIVER—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

A telegraph company's agent's refusal to attempt to deliver a telegram, on his attention being repeatedly called to the fact of nondelivery, shows willfulness sustaining an award of punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 71; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Hampton County; Thos. S. Sease, Judge.

Action by William Gens against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. N. Heyward and W. B. De Loach, for appellant. E. F. Warren and G. Warren, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, through the defendant's failure to deliver a telegram, and the appeal is from an order of nonsuit. On the 21st of April, 1908, the plaintiff sent to his attorney, Mr. W. B. De Loach, the following message: "Are you coming. Answer." At this time the plaintiff was under arrest for violation of an ordinance of the town of Ridgeland, S. C., and the telegram was sent in pursuance of an agreement with Mr. De Loach, that he would represent the plaintiff, whenever notified, in such cases. This message was delivered within a reasonable time. On the 21st of April, 1908, the following telegram in answer to the foregoing, was delivered to the defendant for transmission: "Camden, S. C. 4/21. Wm. Gens, Ridgeland, S. C.—Mr. De Loach not here, try Columbia, Supreme Court. Mrs. W. B. De Loach." But it was not delivered to the plaintiff until the lapse of more than 24 hours after it was received at Ridgeland.

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit on the ground that the complaint shows the action was not for mental anguish, and "that there is nothing upon the face of the first telegram or of the reply telegram, which would have notified the defendant company of any damage which would have been sustained, by reason of the nondelivery of these telegrams."

Even if it should be conceded that this is a proper construction as to what the complaint shows upon its face, nevertheless there was error in granting the nonsuit on this ground, for the reason that his honor the presiding judge had allowed the plaintiff to introduce testimony, tending to show that the plaintiff had sustained damages, other than those arising from mental anguish, as will be seen by reference to the following testimony, which appears in the record:

"Q. What did you do when you received that message, Capt. Bill? A. I got Mr. Colcock; I had to go and hunt Mr. Colcock, and at first I could not find him, and I went to Fayville—I got him there. Q. How far is that from where you live? A. Six miles. Q. How long does it take you to go there and get back? A. About an hour and a half—Mr. Warren: I object; there is no such allegation in the complaint. The Court: I think it is competent. Q. You procured the services of Mr. Colcock? A. Yes, sir. Q. How far did you go? A. Six miles. Q. How long did it take you to go there? A. A couple of hours. Good horse go there and come back in a couple of hours. Q. What was the services of that horse worth? A. My mare was worth $225. Oh, a dollar or two. Mr. Warren: I object to that. The Court: Was that your own horse? Witness: Yes, sir. The Court: You did not have to hire one? Witness: No, sir. The Court:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Strike it out. The Court: What was your horse doing—anything—at the time? Witness: Yes, sir; ploughing, and I was merchandising. The Court: You can prove that, I guess. Q. What was the services of your horse worth, to go that distance? A. I generally charge $1.50 to go down there, and $1.50 to come back. Q. That is what you generally hire them for? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you keep a horse for that? A. Yes, sir. Q. And the time you were away from your place? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you pay for this message? A. Yes, sir; I paid for it. Mr. Berg paid for it, and I paid him. Q. Now Capt. Bill, I want to ask you—I believe you say your horse was worth $1.50 going and $1.50 coming? A. Yes, sir."

The second ground upon which the motion for nonsuit was made is that there was error in the admission of the foregoing testimony, and that if it was excluded there would be no testimony to sustain the allegations of the complaint. If testimony is incompetent and the presiding judge allows it to remain in the record, the right to a nonsuit must be determined, just as if it had been introduced without objection, and the rule is that "if testimony is received without objection, which would otherwise be incompetent, it becomes competent, and cannot be disregarded upon a motion for nonsuit; but its sufficiency must be left to the jury." Ashe v. Ry., 65 S. C. 134, 43 S. E. 393. And the foregoing testimony tended to show that the plaintiff had sustained actual damages.

But even if the two propositions upon which the defendant relied for a nonsuit are sound, nevertheless the nonsuit should have been refused. In the first place, an unreasonable delay in the delivery of a telegram, raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the telegraph company. In this case, it should have been submitted to the jury to determine whether the delay was unreasonable.

In the second place, there was testimony tending to show that the plaintiff was entitled to punitive damages, in addition to the actual damages hereinbefore mentioned, as there was testimony tending to show that the attention of the agent was several times called to the fact that the telegram had not been delivered, and that he would take no notice of it.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

WOODS, J. (concurring in the result). I think the judgment of nonsuit should be set aside for reasons different from those stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice GARY. The main allegation of the complaint with respect to damage for delay in the delivery of the telegram is that the plaintiff was thereby "greatly distressed and worried." This allegation must be eliminated because the telegram related to the employment of an attorney, distinctly a business matter, and worry and disappointment in business affairs do not fall under the mental anguish statute. Capers v. Telegraph Co., 71 S. O. 29, 50 S. E. 537. The evidence admitted over defendant's objection that the plaintiff, when he received no reply to his dispatch to Mr. De Loach, had taken his horse from his field and driven six miles to procure the services of another attorney cannot serve as an element of actual damages to warrant this court in reversing an order of nonsuit. No such damage was alleged in the complaint and the evidence with respect thereto was clearly incompetent. It seems to me illogical for this court to reverse a judgment of nonsuit on the ground that evidence, objected to and incompetent, tended to show that the plaintiff had some other cause of action than that which he undertook to state in his complaint.

There was nevertheless a good ground for sustaining the appeal from the order of nonsuit. By reason of the delay of the defendant's agent in delivering the telegram, the purpose of the plaintiff in using the defendant's wires as a means of communication was entirely defeated. Upon proof that the delay having this result was due to defendant's breach of its duty to use due diligence, the plaintiff was entitled to recover as actual damages the nominal amount paid the defendant for the service of prompt delivery, undertaken on plaintiff's behalf, and not performed. The payment for this service was alleged in the complaint and testified to by the plaintiff. This nominal damage was sufficient to support a finding of punitive damages on proof that the delay was due to willfulness or wantonness. Arial v. Telegraph Co., 70 S. C. 418, 50 S. E. 6; Doster v. Telegraph Co., 77 S. C. 53, 57 S. E. 671. There was evidence tending to show a willful disregard of duty on the part of the agent of the defendant at Ridgeland; that evidence being that the agent held the telegram addressed to the plaintiff for 24 hours without effort to deliver, though twice reminded by an assistant of his duty to deliver.

PEAKE, Master for Union County, v. RENWICK et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 4, 1910.)

1. PARTITION (§ 109*)—SALES—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER—CAVEAT EMPTOR.

The rule of caveat emptor does not apply to judicial sales for partition, and the officer making the sale is the agent of the parties to the action, and his representations are binding on them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 350, 353; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

2. PARTITION (§ 109*)—SALES—FRAUD—MISREPRESENTATIONS—REMEDY OF PURCHASER.

Where a purchaser at a partition sale was imposed on by fraud, or by misrepresentations innocently made, the court, in an action against him for the price, could give him, according to the circumstances, a pro tanto abatement of the price or rescind the contract of purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 383, 385; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

3. PARTITION (§ 109*)—SALES—MISREPRESENTATIONS—REMEDY OF PURCHASER.

Where at a partition sale of an unimproved lot of decedent, an improved lot, which decedent had conveyed, was by mistake included, the court, in an action against the purchaser for the price, would not direct a pro tanto reduction of the price, but would rescind the sale on it appearing that a pro tanto reduction would probably result inequitably to the heirs of decedent.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Union County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by C. H. Peake, Master for Union County, against John Renwick and another. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wallace & Barron, for appellant. Townsend & Townsend, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. This was an action to foreclose a mortgage given by defendants to plaintiff, as master, for the credit portion of the purchase price of a lot in the town of Union, sold under order of court for partition amongst the heirs of C. C. Culp. By mistake, the lot, as described in the complaint, in the advertisement for sale, and in the master's deed to defendants and their mortgage to him, included a lot which had been sold by Mr. Culp some years before his death to Dolly Ann Hawkins, upon which there were valuable improvements, including a dwelling house, well, orchard, and vineyard. The defendants knew that Dolly Ann Hawkins was, at the time of the sale, and for many years prior thereto had been, in possession of a part of the lot covered by the description, but allege that they believed, nevertheless, that they were buying all the land included within the boundaries given, and, before complying with their bid, they called the attention of the master to the fact that she was in possession of a part of the lot, and were assured by him that they would get all the land covered by the description, and that, relying upon his assurance, they completed the purchase by paying the cash portion of their bid and executing the bond and mortgage. Having failed to get possession of the Hawkins lot, they refused to pay the bond given for the balance of the purchase price, and to the complaint herein they pleaded failure of consideration. The circuit judge found that, on account of the mistake in the description, the master thought he was selling, and the defendants thought they were buying, the Hawkins lot, together with the adjacent vacant lot, which alone was intended to be sold; that the minds of the parties did not meet, and therefore no contract was made, and he dismissed the complaint. It was error to dismiss the complaint. The decree should at least have restored the parties to their original condition.

The rule of caveat emptor does not apply to judicial sales of property for partition. The officer making such sales is the agent of the parties to the action, and his representations are binding upon them. Tunno v. Fludd, 1 McCord, 121; Bank v. Bramlett, 58 S. C. 477, 36 S. E. 912, 79 Am. St. Rep. 855.

While the court will not lend too ready ears to defenses by which parties seek to get rid of the obligation of contracts solemnly entered into, especially as in cases like this, the court will afford reasonable opportunity for investigation of the titles to property sold under its order, and will even order a reference to ascertain whether they be good; still, where it appears that a purchaser at such sale has been imposed upon by fraud or misrepresentation, even when the misrepresentation was innocently made, as it was in this case, and where it further appears that he relied not upon his own investigation and judgment, but upon such misrepresentation, and that it was a principal inducement to the purchase, he is entitled, in an action brought against him for the purchase money, to relief, which may, according to the circumstances, consist either in a pro tanto abatement of the purchase price, or in a total rescission of the contract. Means v. Brickell, 2 Hill, Law, 657, and Latimer v. Wharton, 41 S. C. 508, 19 S. E. 855, 44 Am. St. Rep. 739, and the cases cited therein.

In this case, as the Hawkins lot is improved, and the lot which was intended to be sold is not improved, a pro tanto reduction of the purchase price would probably result inequitably to the heirs of Mr. Culp, who, according to the testimony, thought that only the vacant lot was being sold, and made it bring a price with which they were satisfied. Therefore, the sale should be wholly rescinded, and the original status of the parties restored, unless the defendants are now willing to confirm the purchase and pay the bond and mortgage sued on, and take that portion of the lot covered by the description of their deed, exclusive of the Hawkins lot.

Judgment reversed.

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§§ 133, 159*)—FORMAL DEFECTS—WAIVER.

The defects in an indictment failing to state the time of the finding by the grand jury and the day of the designated month at which the offense was committed relate merely to the form, and may be cured by amendment on timely objection, and an objection must, as required by Cr. Code 1902, § 57, be taken by demurrer or motion to quash before the jury is sworn.

Cr. Code 1902, § 160, providing that one convicted of a designated crime shall be "punished by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by a fine of not more than $500," leaves it to the court to determine whether the sentence shall be by fine or imprisonment, and a sentence to imprisonment alone, without the alternative of a fine is valid.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Charleston County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

James Davis was convicted of larceny from the field, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Alonzo E. Twine, for appellant. John Peurifoy, Sol., for the State.

JONES, C. J. The defendant was convicted and sentenced under an indictment charging larceny from the field. After trial and verdict of guilty the defendant moved in arrest of judgment on the ground that the indictment was fatally defective in that it failed to state the time of finding by the grand jury, and the refusal of the motion is the basis of exception. The indictment was as follows: "State of South Carolina, County of Charleston. At a court of general sessions begun and holden in and for the county of Charleston in the state of South Carolina, at Charleston courthouse in the county and state aforesaid, on the second Monday of February in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and ———, the jurors of and for the county of Charleston aforesaid, in the state of South Carolina aforesaid, upon their oath, present that James Davis on the ——— day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and nine, with force and arms at Charleston courthouse in the county of Charleston and state aforesaid, from the field of the said C. G. Dupont and S. W. Windham of the value of fifty ($50.00) dollars of the proper goods and chattels of C. G. Dupont and S. P. Windham, then and there being found feloniously did steal, take and carry away, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state. John H. Peurifoy, Solicitor." The appellant also excepts on a ground not made in the circuit court, namely, that the time of the offense is not alleged. All such objections come too late after the jury is sworn. Section 57 of the Criminal Code of 1902 provides: "Every objection to any indictment for any defect apparent on the face thereof shall be taken by demurrer or on motion to quash such indictment before the jury shall be sworn and not afterwards." The defects complained of related merely to the form of the indictment, and did not materially affect the nature of the offense charged, hence may have been easily cured by amendment upon timely objection. State v. May, 45 S. C. 509, 23 S. E. 513.

Appellant's remaining exception is that the sentence is void because it is not in the alternative. The sentence was imprisonment at hard labor on the public works of Charleston county for the term of two years, or at hard labor in the state penitentiary for a like period—two years. The statute (section 169 Cr. Code 1902) provides that "whosoever shall steal from the field any grain, cotton or vegetables, whether severed from the freehold or not, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than five years or by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars."

The appellant contends that the judgment after providing for imprisonment should have further provided an alternative of fine. Such a construction of the statute would give the prisoner the right to determine whether he should suffer fine or imprisonment, whereas the statute leaves it to the court to determine what shall be the sentence, either by fine or by imprisonment. The sentence was in conformity to the statute.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

STATE v. LANGFORD et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 4, 1910.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 96*)—OFFICER—BONDS.

An agreement between the state and the sureties on the bond of a defaulting county treasurer, entered into pending an action by the state on the bond, which agreement provided that the sureties should pay $20,000 in full; that the state should prosecute its claim against the treasurer; that on the recovery of judgment against him and assignment thereof to the surety, the latter would enforce it, and that the proceeds thereof should first pay the costs and then pay the state the excess over $20,000 up to $24,171, did not release the treasurer or surety from further liability and the state, though receiving the $20,000 from the surety, could prosecute the action against the treasurer, since it had a beneficial interest in the proceeds, arising from the enforcement of a judgment against him, and since the surety became a trustee for the state to the extent of such interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

2. COUNTIES (§ 96*)—OFFICERS—ACTIONS ON BONDS—STIPULATIONS—EFFECT.

The agreement did not operate as an assignment of the claim of the state, so as to bar the state from further prosecuting the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 242*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—QUESTIONS NOT PASSED ON IN THE TRIAL COURT.

A question not passed on in the trial court is not properly before the Supreme Court on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1417-1425; Dec. Dig. § 242.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Hampton County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by the State against Jesse O. Langford and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

The facts are fully set out, in the decree of his honor the circuit judge, which is as follows:

"The plaintiff sued the defendant Langford, former treasurer of Hampton county, on his official bond, and joined the defendant National Surety Company as one of the makers and surety on the bond. The complaint alleges a breach of the condition of the bond, in that Langford failed to turn over to his successor in office about $25,000 of public moneys. The defendant Langford made a general denial. The other defendant pleaded defenses not now necessary to state. At the trial the defendant Langford was granted leave to make a supplemental answer, in which he pleaded: (1) That since this action was begun, the claim of the plaintiff had been discharged by payment. (2) That since this action was begun, the plaintiff had assigned its claim to the National Surety Company, thus defeating the plaintiff's further interest in the cause. After conference, counsel then agreed upon what had been done betwixt the state and the Surety Company, and counsel made and signed an agreed statement, upon which the case was to be tried. So the cause is now akin to a controversy without action. By the terms of the agreed statement, the original answers were withdrawn, and the only pleadings and proof now are the complaint, the supplemental answer of Langford, and the agreed statement.

"From the agreed statement it appears that on the 22d of October, 1909, the plaintiff and the Surety Company made an agreement, by which agreement: (1) The Surety Company was to pay $20,000, in full settlement of all demands on it by reason of the bond. (2) The plaintiff was to press to judgment its claim against Langford and the Surety Company, the latter thenceforth a nominal party. (3) Any judgment recovered should be entered against Langford, or Langford and the Surety Company, at the Surety Company's request, and then satisfied or assigned to the Surety Company, for common interest as further herein provided. (4) The Surety Company should be subrogated to, and have assigned to it, all the rights of the plaintiff in the judgment, subject to the next-stated provision. (5) Any judgment recovered against Langford should be collected by the Surety Company, with the state's assistance and co-operation, from Langford or any other parties liable therefor. (6) The money collected on the judgment should be applied (a) to costs, expenses, and fees; (b) to the payment of the plaintiff, all over $20,000 and up to $24,171.02; (c) to the Surety Company. Under this agreement the Surety Company paid the state $20,000.

"The narrow issue is: Have the agreement and payment thereunder, one or both, operated to conclude this action? That is Langford's contention. He admits that the Surety Company, having made good the default, may now sue him, in an independent action, to recover back the money so paid, to the limit of $20,000, but no more. If Langford's contention be true, then the intention which the state and the Surety Company had will be defeated; for they intended, and so expressly declared, that this action should proceed to judgment. That intention ought to be executed, unless it be in contravention of law, or hurtful to the rights of Langford. It can make no substantial difference to Langford, whether he answer this action, or whether he answer an action against him by the Surety Company; the issue in both is the same.

"The first contention of Langford in the supplemental answer is that the claim of the state has been paid. But that is not so; the state had two claims, one against Langford as principal, and one against the Surety Company as surety, and the claims rest on different liabilities. It is possible, and it sometimes happens, that the liability of the principal is intact, while the liability of the surety is discharged. The principal might be liable for the whole amount claimed, and the surety might be liable for only a part of it. The state claims $24,171.02. If Langford is due to it that much, then the acceptance by the state of $20,000 from the Surety Company does not operate to pay $24,171.02. If Langford is due to the state the large sum, and that is susceptible of proof, then the state has something in issue besides the sum it got from the surety, and the cause ought to proceed to the end; that is, to judgment and execution. The $20,000 paid by the Surety Company was not accepted as payment of the whole liability of Langford, and there is no reason why it should operate as such. It is not worth while to consider if the Surety Company may have from Langford, in the event of recovery, anything over what it has paid, as, under the sixth paragraph of the agreement, that is not in issue now. In my opinion the claim of the state against Langford has not been paid.

"The next contention is that the plaintiff has assigned its claim, to wit, this cause of action, to the Surety Company, and that defeats this action. There is nothing within the agreement, about the assignment of the claim. There is in the minutes of the county commissioners a recital about the state and county transferring all rights of action which they may have against any other person or corporation that may have participated in the loss. But when the agreement was reduced to its finality, it provided (2) that the state should press to judgment its claim, and (3) that the judgment shall be assigned to the Surety Company, and (4) that the Surety Company should be subrogated to the rights of the state in the judgment. As matter of fact and of law, therefore, I conclude that the state's claim was not assigned to the Surety Company, but that the only thing assigned was the judgment, when it shall have been recovered.

"I have given careful consideration to the able argument of counsel for Langford. I have not been able to examine all the authorities they cite. I have rather considered the case, not so much on authority, but upon principles of reason, applied to its particular features.

"At the close of the agreed statement is this paragraph, to wit: 'The principal answers having been withdrawn, it is not necessary for plaintiff to offer proof in support of the allegations, as to the amount of the shortage. The court is requested to render judgment, in accordance with the admitted facts.' In conformity with this agreement, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendants for $24,171.02. It is so ordered."

The receipt of the Attorney General for the $20,000 is as follows: "Received from National Surety Company, exchange on New York for $20,000 which, when paid, will be in full settlement of all claims of the state against the National Surety Company in the matters of Langford, in accordance with the agreement above set out, made by state in behalf of itself and the county of Hampton, under resolution of its county commissioners, October 22, 1909. J. Fraser Lyon, Attorney General, S. C."

The defendant Langford appealed from said decree.

W. B. De Loach, for appellant. J. Fraser Lyon, Atty. Gen., and W. H. Townsend, for the State.

GARY, A. J. (after stating the facts as above). The first question that will be considered is whether there was error, on the part of his honor the circuit judge, in ruling that the defense interposed by the defendant Langford, alleging that since this action was commenced the claim of the plaintiff had been discharged by payment, could not be sustained. The contention of the appellant is predicated upon the theory that the agreement of the plaintiff to release the defendant National Surety Company was the sole consideration upon which the agreement was made. Not only did the Surety Company pay the $20,000, but it also agreed "that on the recovery of judgment against J. C. Langford, and its assignment to the Surety Company, said Surety Company shall at its own expense, but with the assistance and full co-operation of the state and its associates, take such steps and file such proceedings as it may be advised might result in recovery of the whole or part of said judgment from the said Langford, or any other parties liable thereon, or by reason of any matters or transactions connected therewith."

It also agreed "that upon said recovery, if any, the moneys arising therefrom shall be disposed of as follows: (a) To the reasonable costs, expenses, and professional compensation therein; (b) next, to the payment to the state of the excess over $20,000 of its recovery upon the judgment against J. C. Langford, and up to $24,171.02, the amount demanded in the suit pending on the bonds; (c) the balance to the National Surety Company"—thus showing that the plaintiff had a beneficial interest in the proceeds, arising from the enforcement of the judgment, and that under the assignment thereof, the Surety Company would become a trustee for the plaintiff to the extent of its interest. The agreement entered into between the plaintiff and the Surety Company, was executory in its nature, and it clearly appears upon the face thereof that it was not intended that the payment of the $20,000 should either discharge Langford or the Surety Company from further liability, unless it complied with the conditions of the contract, as to the enforcement of the judgment for the benefit of the plaintiff.

In the case of Massey v. Brown, 4 S. C. 85, the principle was announced that although the general rule is that a release of one of several joint obligors discharges the others, yet equity will restrain the general effect of the release, according to the intent of the parties, and that such intent may be shown, even by parol evidence. In that case the court uses the following language: "Equity construes a release according to the intention of the parties, and will give it no operation beyond the design or the purpose it was intended to accomplish. The principle is so fully enforced by Chancellor Kent, in Kirby v. Taylor, 6 John. Ch. (N. Y.) 242, that any further reference to authority in support of the rule is unnecessary. It is certainly in strict consistency with the doctrine of equity, which always seeks, if possible, to give effect to the intent which induced the act, if it can be ascertained, without a violation of the rules of law. We cannot, however, refrain, because they appear so pertinent to the case before us, from referring, in the language of the chancellor, to some of the authorities on which he rested his opinion. Lord Hardwicke said, in the case of Cole v. Gibson, 1 Ves. 503, 'that it was common in equity, to restrain a general release to what was under consideration, at the time of giving it.' And, again, in Ramsden v. Hutton, 2 Ves. 304, he observed 'that if a release be given with a particular consideration recited, notwithstanding that the release concludes with general words, yet the law, in order to prevent such surprise, will construe it to relate to the particular matter recited, which was under the contemplation of the parties, and intended to be released.'

The court thus states the rule in Brown v. Whittington, 39 Or. 300, 64 Pac. 649: "It is insisted at the outset that the plaintiffs cannot recover because the complaint admits that the note upon which judgment against Whittington and Shull was recovered by Brown was paid in full by Shull before the commencement of the action thereon. But the contention is not supported either by the allegations or the proof. The complaint alleges that prior to the commencement of the action, Shull gave Brown sufficient money to satisfy the note, with the understanding and agreement that it should not be considered as a payment, but that Brown should prosecute an action thereon in his own name, at the expense and for the use and benefit of Shull, and the testimony is to the same effect. This was no more than Shull could have compelled Brown to do. Mr. Brandt says: 'It is settled by a long-continued and unvarying current of authorities that the surety may, by a suit in chancery, after the debt becomes due, and before he pays it, compel the creditor to proceed to collect the debt from the principal, provided he indemnify the creditor against loss from a fruitless suit against the principal.' " 1 Brandt on Sur. (2d Ed.) 258. Carson v. Richardson, 3 McCord, 528; Potts v. Richardson, 2 Bailey, 15; Thomson v. Palmer, 3 Rich. Eq. 139; Wilson v. Wright, 7 Rich. Law, 399; Kinard v. Baird, 20 S. C. 377.

The second defense set up by Langford is as follows: "That the plaintiff since the commencement of this action, has assigned its claim, to wit, the cause of action herein sued on, to the defendant the National Surety Company; and hence the plaintiff has no further interest in the subject-matter herein." Error is assigned on the part of the circuit judge in not sustaining this defense. The exceptions raising this question are overruled for the reasons stated by the circuit judge.

His honor in his decree says: "It is not worth while to consider if the Surety Company may have from Langford, in the event of recovery, anything over what it has paid, as, under the sixth paragraph of the complaint, that is not in issue now." As the circuit judge has not passed upon this question, it is not properly before us for consideration.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF RICHMOND, IND.,
v. BADHAM.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1910.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 165*)—NEGOTIABILITY
— REFERENCE TO COLLATERAL CONTRACT —
STATEMENT OF CONSIDERATION.

A note is not rendered nonnegotiable by a promise to pay a certain amount "for value received in one machinery as per contract, November 23, 1899."

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 160*)—NEGOTIABILITY — CERTAINTY AS TO AMOUNT—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

A note is not rendered nonnegotiable by a provision that, "in case it becomes necessary to employ an attorney to collect this note, a further sum not exceeding 10 per cent. for fees" will be paid.

Gary, A. J., and De Vore, A. A. J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Richmond, Ind., against V. C. Badham. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The following are the exceptions taken:

"1. Because his honor erred in the admission of testimony in that on the issue of whether the erasure of the printed provision for attorney's fees in the two notes sued on herein had been made by the defendant or without his consent. His honor, over plaintiff's objection, permitted the witness Melghan (who, as bank collection clerk, had handled other notes executed to defendant, Badham, on printed forms like the two notes in question) to testify that the printed attorney's fee clause was not erased in the said other notes; plaintiff objecting that such testimony was irrelevant, and that the fact that the clause 'was not erased in other notes does not tend to prove that it was not erased on these notes,' and his honor holding and stating, 'does not prove that it was not erased on this note, but would be some evidence on that point,' and allowing defendant's attorney to ask the question, 'Do you recall ever having seen one of these notes of Mr. Badham with the clause to which I called your attention erased? and allowing, over objection, the witness to answer, 'No, sir; I do not recall ever seeing one of the Badham notes with this erasure before.'

"It is submitted that the testimony was irrelevant and misleading in its effect upon the minds of the jurors, and that the effect was further prejudicial because his honor stated that the said testimony throws light on the question.

"2. Because his honor erred in allowing the defendant, Badham, over plaintiff's objection, to testify as to his relations with the machinery company to which he had indorsed the notes sued on herein, such testimony being conclusions from catalogues and correspondence which should have been produced as the best evidence, defendant endeavoring by such oral testimony—merely his personal construction in his own favor—to prove that he was agent for the sale of said machinery, rather than independent purchaser and dealer on his own account (as plaintiff contends the correspondence shows), and that his indorsement was not intended as an absolute guaranty, to wit: 'A. In consequence of my writing, complete estimates and prices for mills were furnished me, and I acted with the knowledge of the Richmond City Mill Works— Mr. Lyles: The matter of prices ought to have been in writing; let him produce the writing. (Defendant then testified they were lost.) Mr. Muller: That relieves the matter from my friend's objection. Mr. Lyles: I do not think so. It does not permit him to testify to any relations which were based upon the papers themselves. I do not think it is sufficient for one who has had a catalogue of machinery of a machinery institution to testify as to its loss and contents. He should have given notice to produce such a catalogue, because it is always presumed that a printed catalogue like that—that the party who had it printed can produce it. The Court: I do not see what the contents of a catalogue has to do with it. Do not see the necessity of going into the contents. Mr. Muller: He is stating the connection between himself and the Richmond City Mill Works. The Court: Leave out everything in reference to correspondence, and give a plain statement of your connection, and we will get along better. Mr. Lyles: Your honor understands us as objecting to his testimony. He is going to testify from conclusions of correspondence. There was no personal conference between them. Mr. Muller: My friend is in error about that. The Court: Go ahead. A. I began, with their consent and knowledge, to solicit business— Mr. Lyles: We object. If their knowledge and consent is in writing he must produce it. The Court: Go ahead. A. To solicit business in the city for the Richmond City Mill Works for their flour mill system. * * * I actively canvassed this state from one end to the other for the Richmond City Mill Works, selling their machinery for them, soliciting trade for them, and I sold one or two of these large outfits for them— Mr. Lyles: Our objection goes to all of this.

* * * He is now testifying to the result of the correspondence; his idea of the result of the correspondence. * * *

The Court: This testimony ought to go in on the question of bona fide holder of the notes. Mr.

Lyles: We object on the ground that if he had written authority from them he must produce it; he has no right to testify what he had done by authority contained in a written instrument or correspondence. The Court: I do not understand this witness to say that he had written correspondence on this. The Witness: Great many of them I did not. * * *

Richmond City Mill Works were in the habit of sending me inquiries in this state. It was understood between us that I should be their exclusive agent— Mr.

Lyles: We object to his understanding. The Court: Have you a written contract with them? A. No, sir. I am trying to explain how the business grew up. Mr. Lyles: From the correspondence? * * *

The Court: Go ahead. The Witness: Under arrangements that had grown up between us and the understanding, I should have their exclusive agency of this state, they sent me inquiries from all over the state which I went to see, soliciting this trade for them. During those three or four years of soliciting I effected the sale of three mills * * * (Including this), and they recognized me as their agent by sending me all these inquiries and directing me to go— Mr. Lyles: Does your honor rule he can testify to their sending him these inquiries when all were accompanied by letters? If a matter is done in writing, no matter what it is, the writing is the best evidence. (Objection overruled.) Witness: Well, as I said before, they sent me inquiries all over this state. I sold this machinery for them, and would make settlements with them; had correspondence with them concerning it. They would send me directions, blue print for putting up this machinery, and directions of that kind.'

"It is submitted that there was error in thus allowing defendant to testify of the effect and understanding of transactions by correspondence, the correspondence being the best evidence, and plaintiff suffered thereby, in that defendant was permitted to present to the jury, apart from the correspondence which was the best evidence, defendant's own deductions and plausible argumentative testimony that he was, after all, merely an agent ('soliciting this trade for them'), and not debtor on the notes indorsed by him.

"3. Because his honor erred in allowing the defendant, Badham, over the objection of the plaintiff, to testify as to course of business by correspondence, and his conclusions therefrom of his agency in the sale of machinery for which the notes sued on were given and indorsed by him, and his nonliability by said indorsement, instead of requiring an effort to produce the writing as the best evidence, and so allowed the defendant to testify that he was not the bona fide guarantor of the notes sued on, but acted as the representative of the machinery company through which the plaintiff claimed, to wit: 'Q. When you would sell one of these large plants, describe the method you would pursue. A. Well, I would send the order in to the Richmond City Mill Works for the machinery, describe what it was for, * * * and they would ship it to the customer—ship it to the original purchaser—and under my agreement I had to put that machinery up, that is, my mechanics had to put it up, according to the blue prints, the plans, that the Richmond City Mill Works furnished. Mr. Lyles: At the risk of seeming to be against the intimation of your honor's remarks a few minutes ago, we still submit that it is incompetent for this witness to go ahead and testify as to these orders, or anything else, having been in writing, until he has taken the proper steps showing that he has given notice to produce them, then he can offer secondary evidence of its contents. The Court: He is not testifying to the contents of the writing. Mr. Lyles: I think he is. He said he sent orders to these people for this machinery. He is showing that he sent in orders, and that shows a written instrument. The Court: I have not observed anything more than that this witness is giving a general statement of his connection with these people. * * * A. To make up a complete plant, I would sell the engine and boiler of the engine company I represented and the flour mill machinery from the City Mill Works, and the pulleys and shafting from the people I bought those things from, and the belting which I usually obtained in Columbia. Q. When you had settlements with the purchaser, how would you arrange them? A. That portion that belonged to the Richmond City Mill Works I would take good notes and turn them over to them, if notes, and with the other manufacturers the same way. I would divide up the whole order according to their interest in that order, and made settlement that way. Q. Was that done in the case of the Huffman machinery? A. Yes, sir. Mr. Lyles: All of it was in writing, and we object to his testifying. * * * The Court: Was that done in writing? A. I sent the notes to these people in a letter accompanying the notes when I sent them to them. The Court: Do you expect them to produce that letter; haven't you got it? Mr. Lyles: We have it. If he gives us notice to produce it, we will produce it right now. The Court: He has not got to the point of settlement yet. Go ahead. Q. (By Mr. Muller): That is the way you conducted the Huffman transaction? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. * * * About what time did you first make that first trade with Huffman for the Richmond City Mill Works—Mr. Lyles: We object. The important point is whether he ever made the sale to S. J. Huffman for the Richmond City Mill Works. The Court: Did you make the sale for the Richmond City Mill Works? A. Yes, sir; in the manner I have just described.'

"It is submitted that his honor erred in allowing said oral testimony as to deductions of witness based upon correspondence, instead of requiring the correspondence as the best evidence, and that the error was harmful, in that the defendant was allowed to give as evidence his conclusions and opinions that he was acting 'for the Richmond City Mill Works,' and thus was the agent of said company, and not himself responsible for the purchase money of the goods, as contended for by plaintiff.

"4. Because his honor erred in allowing defendant, Badham, over plaintiff's objection, to testify to complaints and representations made to him by Mr. Huffman as to alleged defects in the machinery for which the notes sued on were given, to wit: 'The Witness: Huffman notified me that the machinery—Mr. Lyles: We object to anything that Mr. Huffman notified him of. The Court: Go on with it. The Witness: Huffman notified me that the mill was not doing anything like it was guaranteed to do; that he could not get over 25 bushels a day out of it, and that the yield of flour was so poor that it was worse than any of the old country mills, and that he could get no customers; that people were leaving him because he could not get enough flour per bushel of wheat, and he said if things did not get better he would throw it back on my hands, and he refused settlement for it until it was made good.'

"It is submitted that said testimony was hearsay.

"5. Because his honor erred in allowing defendant, over plaintiff's objection, to testify to statements made to him by Huffman, as follows, to wit: 'Huffman came to my office and said, instead of being all right, it was all wrong, and he not only refused settlement for the machinery, but wanted us to take it away from there, that it had damaged him; that he could not get the quality or the quantity of flour out of it, or, rather, the amount of flour per bushel that his customers demanded; that he could not get over 30 or 35 pounds, and that it had absolutely ruined him; that he could not do any grinding, people would not patronize him. I notified the Richmond City Mill Works of these facts, and explained to them why the settlement had not been forthcoming for this machinery. Mr. Lyles: Your honor understands us as objecting to all of that—Q. Did Mr. Huffman get any use of the mill? A. He said not.'

"It is submitted that said testimony was hearsay.

"6. Because his honor erred in allowing the defendant, over plaintiff's objection, to testify to statements made to him by Mr. Haughton, an officer of the machinery company, to which defendant had indorsed the notes herein (and of which defendant claims to have been agent rather than purchaser), and which company had indorsed said notes to plaintiff, said statements being made after the notes had passed from his company into the hands of the plaintiff, and after this suit thereon had been instituted, to wit: 'Mr. Lyles: We object to any statement made by Mr. Haughton. The Court: That might go to show that the Richmond City Mill Works people were not the bona fide holders of the paper. Mr. Lyles: How could it tend to show it? It would be hearsay testimony. The Court: Suppose the agent of the mill works had admitted it. Mr. Lyles: Would it be binding upon the First National Bank, which then had these papers? The Court: If your theory be correct, what interest has the mill works people in these notes? If he can testify to any fact that these mill works people made an admission about the notes after the suit was brought, and after the note was assigned, it will tend to show whether they were bona fide holders without notice. Q. (By Mr. Muller): State what occurred? A. Mr. Haughton stated he had come down to see Mr. Lyles and Mr. McMahan about this matter, and he wanted to see me to see if we couldn't arrange some adjustment to the matter; Haughton was treasurer of the City Mill Works, and he wanted to know what proposition I had to make to the company. * * * I still urged him to back this machinery. * * * He told me no; that they had too much secondhand machinery. During that conversation one of the reasons he gave me why he did not wish to take back that machinery was the fact that they could not use that system of flour milling any more, that they were using another sifter—just the heart of the whole thing—that the rollers might be used, but the sifter they were not using any more in their system. It struck me as peculiar, but he would not give me any more information along that line, so the conversation drifted back to some settlement with the Richmond City Mill Works. The bank was never mentioned at all. He finally—I forget the amount—I told Mr. Haughton that I would ship this machinery back and would pay the freight * * * and pay him one or two hundred dollars in connection with it to get it off my hands, and we separated, he said he would not accept my proposition, but he would take it before the directors of his mill company. * * * Q. That was while that suit was pending in the name of the First National Bank? A. Yes, sir; but never said a word about the bank holding these notes, and he could not make any settlement, but, on the contrary, he said he was down here to see what settlement he could effect with me.'

"It is submitted that said testimony is hearsay and also irrelevant, being the declarations after this action brought by plaintiff of a person not shown to bear any relations to the plaintiff, and his honor erred in admitting said testimony and in holding that it was relevant as tending to show whether the plaintiff was a bona fide holder without notice. It is submitted that said testimony was harmful error, in that it presented to the jury the alleged confession of the machinery company (strangers to this suit) that the machinery was not up to date, and that there was a failure of consideration in the notes.

"7. Because his honor erred in allowing the defendant, over plaintiff's objection, when defendant was a witness undergoing cross-examination by plaintiff, to testify in detail and give opinions and reasonings as explanations, over and above and in addition to the answers to the questions addressed to him by plaintiff's counsel, to wit: Witness identifying a letter received by him from the Richmond City Mill Works, dated November 24, 1899, and read in evidence, being in part as follows: 'We do not see how it would be possible for us to accept the order at the old prices. We have made very careful estimates, and we find that at the old basis of discounts we cannot cover the actual cost of manufacturing the machinery. The advance which we have made is moderate when the cost of production is taken into consideration. We hope that you can arrange the matter with your customer to get more money for this machinery. * * * It is our invariable custom to sell to our own customers on terms providing for a settlement within a reasonable time after shipment. * * * The account for the last order from you stood open on our books for six months before we received any cash payment, and there is still more than half the amount remaining on open account. * * * We presume that you protect yourself in making deals with your customers, and it is only reasonable that we should be protected and receive interest on deferred payments. The Witness: May I make any comment upon that answer? Mr. Lyles: No, sir. Mr. Muller: I think when counsel asks the witness if he wrote or received a certain letter that it will be reasonable if he has comment to make upon it to make it at the time— Mr. Lyles: The letters speak for themselves. Mr. Muller: The answer is not complete until the witness says what he deems necessary to answer. The Court: The object of examination is to give a man a chance to say what he has to say. If this witness wants to make a statement, I do not see how I can stop him from making it. The Witness: I would like to comment on the letter just read. I had notified these people that I had actually sold this order, but I had done so on the basis of the old prices which they had furnished me. In the meantime, they notified me to advance the price, and I immediately wrote that letter telling them that I had already taken this order for the shipment at a subsequent date, and to know whether they would protect it or not. Then they wrote me that letter calling attention to the fact that there was a large amount open on that account. Charged against you? A. Certainly. That related to two mills we had sold— Mr. Lyles: We object to the witness explaining any further. The Court: I think he ought to have the right to explain it. The Witness: I had sold two mills, one to Cook, of Newberry, and the other to the Prosperity Mill Company. I could not effect the settlement with these people because the mills were not giving satisfaction. I remitted to the City Mill Works all cash that I obtained on them, and it left a balance due, which they called attention to in that letter. In the meantime I had sent Mr. Milne to put these mills in order, and just as soon as they were accepted by the customers, * * * as soon as paid for, I remitted to the City Mill Works. That was the balance they claim was open.'

"It is submitted that said details as to other transactions were irrelevant and tended to confuse the minds of the jurors and divert them from the significance of the letter read, which showed the defendant as a customer and debtor of the machinery company; and his honor erred in holding that the object of examination is to give a man a chance to say what he has to say, whereas the object of the cross-examination (to which his honor was referring) is not to give the witness opportunity to say what he wants to say, but to restrict him to the answering of such questions as his adversary wishes him to answer, the ruling in effect taking the witness from the control of the cross-examining counsel, and permitting said witness to violate the rule against parol testimony to supersede a written instrument. The error of the practice complained of appears in his honor's later ruling in reference to other like demands on the part of the witness to be given unlimited range in his replies, to wit: 'The Court: I have allowed the witness to comment on these letters, but they always turn out to be arguments, and I cannot allow it. You can examine him in reply to all these letters.'

"8. Because his honor erred in allowing defendant, a witness under cross-examination, to testify in detail and give opinions and reasons as explanations, over and above and in addition to the answers to the questions addressed to him by plaintiff's counsel, to wit: Witness, identifying a letter written by him to the machinery company, dated December 6, 1900, read in evidence, being in part as follows: 'The settlement that I shall try to effect with Mr. Huffman will be for him to give me notes for the full amount of his indebtedness due next fall. These notes I will indorse and turn over to you. I already have a mortgage over all of his property, and Mr. Huffman is a man of first-class credit in our community, and the matter will be safe and secure, although we will be forced to give him this extension, for, as stated before, I have to handle him very diplomatically, for if he should be roused to the point of fighting us, he certainly would obtain damages. As the matter now stands, I have him in the most conciliatory humor, and think that I will have but little trouble in effecting a settlement. The Witness: I explained to these people why I had not been able to get a settlement with Huffman, and told them what I would try to do. As a matter of fact, Huffman would not do it. He would not sign anything. Huffman repudiated the whole thing, said the machinery had not come up to the guarantee, and I was trying to manage him diplomatically. Mr. Lyles: Your honor, do we understand that this witness is allowed to make a speech to the jury? The Court: I did not mean that the witness could make an argument on each letter; I only allow him to comment on it.'

"It is submitted that the foregoing statement of the witness, made pursuant to a previous ruling of his honor that the witness under cross-examination might elaborate his answers and explanations as he saw fit, designedly diverted attention from his admissions of liability which he had made in his letter, and injected into the evidence a third party's representations about the defects of the machinery, and thus it interfered with the plaintiff's orderly presentation of his case and control of the witness and was prejudicial, the practice of releasing the witness under cross-examination from the cross-examiner's guidance of him to a certain line of testimony transfers the control of the cross-examination from the examiner to the witness, and destroys one of the methods of searching a witness by cross-examination.

"9. Because his honor erred in holding and ruling that the notes sued on were non-negotiable, as follows, to wit: 'I guess the rest of the evidence is as to the sufficiency of this mill in coming up to the guarantee. We had better discuss and dispose of the question of the negotiability of the notes. * * * I have with great reluctance relinquished the idea of the negotiability of these notes. * * * I have before me a point blank decision of the Supreme Court (Green v. Spires [71 S. C. 107, 50 S. E. 534]) which decides that a note containing a special stipulation is a nonnegotiable note. I have compared these notes with the Green-Spires Case, and I cannot see any possible difference in favor of the negotiability of the notes; the difference, if any, is entirely in favor of the nonnegotiability of the notes in this complaint, because in the Green-Spires

Case the amount of attorney's fees is fixed, whereas in the case here the amount of the attorney's fee is not exceeding 10 per cent., making an uncertain element. I have followed the decision in the Spires Case, and hold that if that clause was in the note and was altered by some third person, not a party to this note or this proceeding, what is known in law as spoliation, that note would have been a nonnegotiable note, and this defense could obtain between the bank and defendant Badham.'

"It is submitted that this ruling was erroneous, since the attorney's fees were provided in the note to apply only after maturity, and hence the amount of the notes was fixed and certain during the currency of the notes, and they should be held negotiable.

"10. Because his honor erred in holding and ruling that the notes were nonnegotiable, as follows, to wit: 'There is another point in the case. * * * The note contains in the body of it this clause: "With all expenses if suit be instituted for the collection of this note." * * * The view that such stipulation does not render the note nonnegotiable * * * because that could not obtain till after the maturity of the note is obviated by the statute in this state, which authorizes the bringing of a suit or action before maturity of the note. Now, if true, and it is true under section 255b in the Code [of Civil Procedure] that suit may be brought upon a note before its maturity, and expenses incurred in that suit, as to an uncertain amount before the note is matured, that destroys the force of the reasoning which says the note shall be negotiable because an uncertain amount cannot enter into it as an element until the negotiability is destroyed' (by maturity).

"It is submitted that this is an erroneous conclusion from the special statute allowing suit and attachment before maturity in case of a debtor departing the state with intent to defraud: (1) this exceptional remedy is not to be taken as applicable to any note until proof of the fraudulent conduct, all presumptions being against the probability of fraud; (2) it is against public policy to construe a note so as to render it possible for the maker to defeat its negotiability, and lessen his obligation, by resorting to a fraud—thus profiting by his own wrong—the 'suit instituted for the collection of the note' contemplated and contracted for in the making of the note cannot have been a suit before maturity provided for by the statute in case of fraudulent absconding; (3) the statute provides that if the debtor pay the debt on or before its maturity, he shall not pay the costs of the suit instituted before maturity under this section, and this provision of the statute would control so that the clause in the notes herein could not have reference to costs in a suit instituted before maturity, and there is no contingency in which these indeterminate costs could accrue till after maturity; (4) a note sued on under said section and attached, though not technically mature, would certainly be practically mature and no longer negotiable, and hence the expenses of the suit, if recoverable, must be regarded as not affecting the negotiability.

"11. Because his honor erred in allowing defendant's witness W. J. Elliott, over plaintiff's objection, to testify as to the rule or practice of retaining the attorney's fee provision in the Badham notes which came under witness' eye (not the notes sued on herein), to wit: 'Q. Now, please state what was the rule with regard to retaining or canceling that clause in the Badham notes in the transaction of his business? Mr. McMahan: We object to this testimony as to the rule; it is irrelevant, except as to what he did as to these particular notes. Your honor overruled our objection before. Q. (By Mr. Muller): Was that ever allowed to be stricken out? A. Never was. Q. If parties wanted it struck out, would Mr. Badham consent? A. No, sir; he never did consent. Q. You handled a good many of these notes? A. Yes, sir.'

"It is submitted that said evidence was irrelevant and calculated to make the jury believe that such practice would tend to prove that defendant had not himself made the erasure.

"12. Because his honor erred in allowing defendant's witness Milne, over plaintiff's objection, to testify as to defendant's practice not to allow the attorney's fee provision to be stricken out when parties were signing notes to him, to wit: 'Q. About these notes that you heard witnesses speak of, did you ever handle any of these notes for Mr. Badham? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you remember that clause, "If it becomes necessary to employ an attorney to collect this note, a further sum of not exceeding ten per cent. for fees"? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did Mr. Badham ever allow that clause to be stricken out? (Objected to. Allowed.) A. Not to my knowledge. I had trouble once in Hampton county about that clause, and wrote to Mr. Badham for instruction, and his reply to me was that the notes must be signed just as they are made.'

"It is submitted that the said evidence was irrelevant, and his honor's allowing it tended to mislead the jury as to its value.

"13. Because his honor refused to allow the plaintiff in reply to interrogate the witness A. C. Moore as to the appearance under the microscope of the signature of S. J. Huffman to the notes in question to show that such signature was written after the alteration in the notes, his honor refusing the same upon the ground that such testimony was not in reply.

"14. Because his honor refused to allow the witness T. H. Gibbes to testify as an expert that the signature of the said S. J. Huffman had been put to said notes after the alteration in question; his honor refusing to allow the same upon the ground that such testimony was not in reply.

"15. Because his honor erred in charging the jury that the notes sued on were 'not negotiable,' and the question was for the jury 'just as though the suit were between the Richmond City Mill Works and Badham.'

"It is submitted that his honor should have charged that the notes were negotiable (if the erasure was made by Badham or with his consent or before his indorsement of them), and that the defenses which might have existed against the original payee were precluded (subject to the condition stated as to the erasure).

"16. Because his honor erred in charging the jury that the notes were nonnegotiable on the ground of their containing the provision for expenses of suit if suit be instituted; whereas, his honor should have held that such expenses could not accrue until after the maturity of the notes, and hence said provision did not affect the negotiability.

"17. Because his honor erred in charging the jury that they must find for the defendant 'if the evidence does not satisfy you by the greater weight that the bank is the owner'; whereas, his honor should have charged that the notes were negotiable (subject to the condition as to erasure only), and the holder was presumed to be the owner.

"18. Because his honor charged the jury as follows, to wit: 'If the jury believe from the evidence that at the time of the commencement of this action these notes really belonged, and now belong, to the Richmond City Mill Works, and not to the First National Bank of Richmond, Indiana, and that this action is brought in the name of the bank for the benefit of the Richmond City Mill Works under some private agreement or understanding between the two corporations, then the jury must find for the defendant'—thereby erring in indicating to the jury that there was any evidence of such a fact upon which they might find the same.

"19. Because his honor charged the jury as follows, to wit: 'That if the jury believe from the evidence that the Richmond City Mill Works warranted or represented the flouring mill machinery for which the notes were given to have a certain capacity, and that it fell short of that capacity, then (1) such failure of the machinery to develop the capacity so warranted or represented would of itself amount to a good defense for the defendant, by way of discount, and would entitle him to a reduction of the price of the machinery represented by the notes by any amount that the jury may believe from the evidence would fairly represent the diminution in value of the machinery caused by such deficiency of capacity; (2) and if the jury also believe from the evidence that before the commencement of this action Sam J. Huffman, or the defendant, offered to return the machinery to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff declined or failed to accept a return thereof, then the jury should find for the defendant on this ground'—which it is submitted was erroneous in the following particulars, to wit:

"(a) It instructed the jury that if there was a warranty by the Richmond City Mill Works of the machinery in question to have a certain capacity, and any failure of the machinery to develop that capacity, even to an immaterial extent, such failure would itself amount to a good defense.

"(b) It instructed the jury that a mere representation by said Richmond Mill Works that such machinery would develop a certain capacity, and a failure of said machinery to develop that capacity, such failure would amount to a good defense, even though such representation might not have been accompanied by any fraud or overreaching.

"(c) It instructed the jury that a failure of the machinery to develop the capacity warranted or represented would of itself amount to a good defense regardless of whether efficient means had been used by Mr. Huffman or Mr. Badham to properly develop the capacity, and regardless of whether the defect might not have been remedied.

"(d) It instructed the jury that if Sam J. Huffman offered to return the machinery to the plaintiff before the commencement of this action and the plaintiff refused to receive the same, the jury should find for the defendant on this ground regardless of the extent of the failure and regardless of the fact that the machinery had been sold to defendant, Badham; several years before this action was commenced and that settlements and adjustments had been had between said mill works and Badham, which were claimed to have covered all alleged failures of the machinery.

"20. Because his honor charged the jury as follows, to wit: 'That if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant by his indorsement of these notes intended to guarantee their payment only in case the machinery came up to the representations or guaranty of the Richmond City Mill Works, if they believe from the evidence there were such representations or guaranty, then they must find for the defendant, unless they believe from the evidence that the machinery did come up to such representations or guaranty'—which it is submitted was erroneous in the following particulars, to wit:

"(a) It left it to the jury to find whether the defendant intended to limit his guaranty of the notes; when, the whole contract being in writing contained in the correspondence between the parties, he should have instructed the jury as to what guaranty was intended.

"(b) It put the burden upon the plaintiff of proving affirmatively that there had been no failure of the machinery to come up to the warranty or representations, and that they should have no regard to the degree of such failure, or whether such failure, if any, had been adjusted between the parties or remedied by the Richmond City Mill Works.

"21. Because his honor charged the jury as follows, to wit: 'Now, upon this question, gentlemen of the jury, of the alleged failure of the machinery to come up to representation or guaranty, and the allegation of such failure, and that the machinery was returned, or offered to be returned to the parties, why that involves the question of the nature of the contract as you may see it from the testimony. I can give a case cited in argument which illustrates that point: That is, where a man in this state bought a certain lot of jewelry and fancy articles under the contract that he was to receive with that jewelry a showcase in which it was to be displayed, and that by displaying that jewelry and these articles in the showcase certain sales could be and would be guaranteed, and the company which sold the goods shipped him all the goods, but did not ship him the showcase in time for him to carry on his trade, and therefore he refused to accept any of the goods and offered to return them to the seller; the seller, however, refused to accept the return of the goods and brought suit against him for the value of the goods which were furnished, not including the showcase. The court held in that case that it appeared from the testimony that the showcase was an essential part of the contract; it was essential in making a proper display of the goods to carry out the guaranty of the sale of those goods, and as the failure to deliver the showcase was a failure in a material and important element of the contract, that this man had the right to reject all the goods, to refuse to accept them, to repudiate the contract entirely, and if he did so and made a bona fide offer to return the goods, which was refused, the company could not recover against him for such goods shipped; that the failure of an essential element, in delivering the showcase, and the offer to return such goods as had been shipped to him—why, the contract was at an end, and the party could not recover. You can take the contract and see if the principles involved in that case are applicable to this.'

"It is submitted that said charge was erroneous in the following particulars:

"(a) It instructed the jury that they must determine what was the contract between the parties, when the entire contract was in writing, embodied in the letters of the defendant, Badham, and those of the Richmond City Mill Works which had been offered in evidence.

"(b) It instructed the jury that a mere failure to come up to the representations of the Richmond City Mill Works would be sufficient to authorize the said Huffman or the defendant, Badham, to offer to return the machinery.

"(c) It instructed the jury that a failure of the machinery to come up to the representations or guaranty of the Richmond City Mill Works, even in a slight particular, and an offer of the defendant Badham or Sam J. Huffman to return the machinery would be a sufficient defense to the action.

"(d) It misapplied the decision of this court in the case of Pratt & Co. v. Frasier & Co., in 72 S. C. 368, 51 S. E. 983, inasmuch as after testimony had been offered in this case of a settlement and adjustment of all disputes as to the alleged defects and the undisputed testimony had shown that the defendant had repeatedly promised to make settlement and several years of time had elapsed, it instructed the jury that the defendant, Badham, or Sam J. Huffman, might have offered to return the machinery, regardless of what had happened, and thus defeat the action.

"22. Because his honor left it to the jury to say what was the contract between the parties in question, although the same was embodied in the written correspondence between them.

"23. Because his honor erred in refusing plaintiff's request to charge, to wit: 'The law makes certain presumptions in favor of the holder of a negotiable promissory note:

"(1) The law presumes that the person in possession of the note is the owner, and that he acquired it for value and before maturity, in the usual course of business, in good faith, without notice of defenses to the payment of the note; in other words, this presumption, unless rebutted by proof, would cut off all defenses, because the notes are to pass current, like money, good in the hands of the holder without regard to private agreements or understandings that may have existed between previous parties.

"(2) In such a case, therefore, the consideration cannot be inquired into.

"(3) The indorsement and delivery of such a note transfers the title thereof to the indorsee, and includes and carries the promise of the indorser to pay the note if the maker does not pay it at maturity if the note is duly presented for payment at the place therein specified, and payment is demanded and refused and notice of presentment and demand and of protest for nonpayment is duly given to the indorser.

"(4) But there is a provision in the body of these notes, 'Presentment for payment and protest waived,' and, therefore, I charge you that it was not necessary for the owner and holder of these notes to present them for payment and protest them for nonpayment in order to fix liability on the indorser; he having by his indorsement of the notes with these words in them waived that condition to his liability.'

"24. Because his honor erred in refusing plaintiff's motion for a new trial made upon the following ground, to wit: 'Because his honor erred in charging without modification defendant's request numbered 6B(2), to wit: "That if the jury believe from the evidence that the Richmond City Mill Works warranted or represented the flouring mill machinery for which the notes were given to have a certain capacity, and that it fell short of that capacity; (2) and if the jury also believe from the evidence that before the commencement of this action Sam J. Huffman, or the defendant, offered to return the machinery to the plaintiff and the plaintiff declined or failed to accept a return thereof, then the jury should find for the defendant on this ground"—whereas it is submitted that his honor should have modified said charge by adding words to the effect that such offer to return the machinery cannot relieve the defendant unless made before the acceptance of the machinery or within a reasonable time after the discovery of defects latent and not known and waived at the time of the acceptance of the machinery and settlement therefor, if there were such acceptance and settlement, and took from the consideration of the jury the evidence in the cause tending to show that even if the machinery had been defective, any defense based thereon had been adjusted and waived in the settlement which occurred subsequent to knowledge of the alleged defect.

"25. Because his honor erred in refusing plaintiff's motion for a new trial made upon the following ground, to wit: 'Because his honor erred in his illustration, or statement, from the case of Pratt & Co. v. Fraser & Co., in 72 S. C. 368 [51 S. E. 983], in further explanation of the above charge, in that in charging the jury that a party who had bought certain jewelry for sale, and therewith a showcase necessary for the display of the jewelry for sale, and to whom the seller shipped all the goods except the showcase, was justified in refusing to accept any of the goods, and in offering to return them to the seller and thereby rescinding the contract, he also charged without qualification that it was held in that case "that this man had the right to reject all the goods, to refuse to accept them, to repudiate the contract entirely, and if he did so, and made a bona fide offer to return the goods which was refused, the company could not recover against him for such goods shipped"; whereas his honor should have charged that the "right to reject all the goods, to refuse to accept them," is not of unlimited duration after receiving such part of the goods as arrived, and was exercised, in the case which he cited, promptly, with a notification to the plaintiff that the goods were in the depot subject to plaintiff's order, and that defendant declined to receive said goods, and his honor erred in charging in effect that, regardless of time or circumstances, the purchaser had the right "to repudiate the contract entirely," to make a "bona fide offer to return the goods," and thereby release himself from obligation,' even after there had been, as shown by the evidence in this case, a settlement and adjustment of all disputes as to the alleged defects.

"26. Because, at the conclusion of his charge, against the suggestion and request of the counsel for plaintiff, his honor refused to instruct the jury that they could have or call for any letters or any of the documents offered in evidence, and ruled that, while they might come out and call for the reading, they did not have the right to have such papers with them without the consent of counsel."

Joe Berry Lyles, for appellant. D. W. Robinson, for respondent.

DE VORE, A. A. J. For the purpose of this opinion it will be necessary only to state that this was a suit commenced August 8, 1905, based upon two promissory notes, set out in the complaint; each being basis for a separate cause of action as will appear from the complaint herein.

The main question involved in the court below, as well as in this court, is whether or not said notes are negotiable. It will, therefore, be important to have copy inserted here:

"$785.00. Columbia, S. O., July 12, 1902. On or before the first day of January, 1903, for value received in one machinery as per contract November 23, 1899, I, the undersigned of Richland county, state of South Carolina, promise to pay to the order of V. C. Badham, of Columbia, S. C., seven hundred and eighty-five dollars, negotiable and payable at the Carolina National Bank, Columbia. Without offset, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum after maturity until paid, waiving all relief whatever from valuation, appraisalment or exemption laws, with all expenses if suit be instituted for collection of this note. And it is expressly understood and agreed that the said V. C. Badham neither parts with the title, nor do the undersigned acquire any title in the property enumerated herein until this note and all other notes given in payment for same, and all extensions and renewals thereof are fully paid. And in case it becomes necessary to employ an attorney to collect this note, a further sum, not exceeding 10 per cent. for fees. Sam J. Huffman. P. O. Congaree, Richland Co., State of S. C."

The following indorsements are on the back of the said note: "Pay to the order of Richmond City Mill Works, V. C. Badham." "Richmond City Mill Works, by H. A. Moore, Treasurer." "Pay to the order of any Bank, Banker, or Trust Co. All previous endorsements guaranteed. First National Bank, Richmond, Indiana, O. R. Du Hadway, Cashier."

The other note is identical with the above, except the last indorsement, the amount and date of maturity; and these differences do not affect the question of negotiability; in other words, both notes must bear the same fate so far as that question is concerned.

According to the "case" previous to this one, another action was brought on the notes against the maker, Sam J. Huffman, and V. C. Badham, the defendant herein, jointly, but was discontinued, and this one commenced thereafter against V. C. Badham, because S. J. Huffman, in the former, answered and pleaded as a defense breach of warranty, alleging that the machinery was sold to him by Badham as agent for the Richmond City Mill Works, and that he and the Richmond City Mill Works, as an inducement to him, the said Huffman, to buy, had represented and warranted that said machinery would have a certain capacity of production per day, and said notes were given and accepted upon condition that he would not be liable unless the machinery upon trial proved to have such capacity, and same had failed to develop such capacity. The defendant, Badham, answered in that suit and virtually set up same defense. The plaintiff in order not to become involved in litigation with said Huffman upon that defense, as above stated, discontinued that suit and instituted this one against V. C. Badham alone.

Badham, in substance, sets up same defense here as in the other suit. In this suit he alleges that he, as agent of Richmond City Mill Works, had full power and authority to make, and as such did make, the representations, and that he accepted and took the notes subject thereto, and that his indorsement on said notes was conditional; that after a fair trial said machinery did not have the producing capacity of 50 barrels of flour per day, as represented by him to said Huffman.

On the trial in the court below his honor Judge R. W. Memminger presiding held the notes to be nonnegotiable. Said trial resulted in judgment for defendant. The case was heard in this court, at November term, 1909, involving 26 exceptions, almost all of which will depend upon negotiability or non-negotiability of the notes. Exceptions 9, 10, 15, and 16 in different forms raise the question of negotiability, and will be considered first and together.

In so far as our own decisions are concerned, beginning with Bank v. Strother, 28 S. C. 504, 6 S. E. 313, and coming on down to Machine Co. v. Badham, 81 S. C. 63, 61 S. E. 1031; the last utterance of this court upon the subject, for one reason or another, there is a difference of opinion among the Supreme Court Justices on the question under consideration. The court does not seem to have ever been a unit in any of the cases except the Strother Case. In that case the note contained three provisions: (1) "All counsel fees and expenses in collecting this note if it is sued or placed in hands of counsel for collection." (2) "Gives payee power to declare this note due at any time they may deem it insecure, even before maturity." (3) "With exchange on New York." Mr. Chief Justice McIver, in delivering the opinion of the court, held the note to be nonnegotiable mainly on the ground that it contained the provision "with exchange on New York," for with reference to the other two provisions he uses this language: "If, however, there was any doubt as to the effect of either of these stipulations, there can be none as to the effect of the exchange provision as above." Thus clearly showing that he was not fully satisfied that the other two provisions affected negotiability.

The next case—Sylvester Bleckley Co. v. Alewine, 48 S. C. 308, 26 S. E. 609, 37 L. R. A. 86—the note provided for "10 per cent. attorney's fees for collection." Mr. Justice Gary, delivering the opinion of the court, said that Bank v. Strother held "that uncertainty in a note prior or subsequent to maturity destroyed its negotiability." Mr. Chief Justice McIver concurred in the result. Mr. Justice Pope concurred in the result on another ground. Mr. Justice Jones dissented as to question of negotiability.

The next case—White v. Harris, 69 S. C. 65, 48 S. E. 41, 104 Am. St. Rep. 791—the note contained the provision, "We agree in default of payment after maturity to pay 10 per cent. for attorney's fees for collection." Mr. Chief Justice Pope, delivering the opinion, held the note to be negotiable, for the reason that the attorney's fees were definite and certain. Mr. Justice Gary dissented for the reason stated in the Sylvester Case.

The next case—Green v. Spires, 71 S. C. 107, 50 S. E. 554—the note contained a provision to pay all costs and expenses, including 10 per cent. attorney's fees, if "collected through an attorney or by legal proceeding of any kind." Mr. Justice Gary, delivering the opinion, held the note to be nonnegotiable upon the authority of Bank v. Strother. Mr. Chief Justice Pope concurred. Mr. Justice Jones dissented as to question of negotiability. Mr. Justice Woods concurred in the opinion of Justice Jones, saying Bank v. Strother should be overruled in so far as it held nonnegotiable a note providing for payment of attorney's fees and costs of collection, which cannot accrue until after maturity.

The next case—Machine Co. v. Badham, 81 S. C. 63, 61 S. E. 1031—the note contained the provision "Negotiable and payable at the bank * * * with all expenses if suit be instituted for collection of this note." Mr. Justice Gary, delivering the opinion, held the note nonnegotiable. Mr. Chief Justice Pope concurred in the result. Mr. Justice Jones concurred in the result, but dissented on the question of negotiability. Mr. Justice Woods concurred in the dissenting opinion.

The citation of the foregoing cases will show the views of the Justices of this court, from which it will be seen this court has been divided on the question under consideration since the case of Bank v. Strother down to the present time.

It is very important that the law on the question involved should be settled by this court, and rightly settled, not so much in accordance with the needs and purposes of the times with regard to commercial interest, but in accordance with sound reason as regards the question itself. Our court being divided in this regard, and no decision upon which we can rely for precedent, except the case of Bank v. Strother, supra, it will therefore be necessary to look elsewhere for authority.

Mr. Daniel on Negotiable Instruments (5th Ed.) § 62a, speaking of instruments like those involved here, says: "Such instruments should, we think, be upheld as negotiable;" and continues with his reasons therefor in the text, and, besides, cites numerous cases to support same, and also cites the cases contra.

I find the text-writers on the subject are about equally divided pro and con. The courts of the several states are about equally divided. I find those writers and jurisdictions opposed to holding paper like this under consideration negotiable, do so mainly on the ground of uncertainty as to amount that will be due under the terms of the instrument. In other words, the commercial world cannot estimate the value of paper if put on the market for sale, or negotiation, hence would not know what to pay for it.

Those writers and jurisdictions who favor the negotiability do so on the ground that no uncertainty as to amount due by terms of such instrument can arise until after maturity.

After a careful consideration of the authorities I am forced to the conclusion that the better reasoning leads to the following as a sound proposition of law: If a note or written instrument, otherwise negotiable, contain a provision or provisions which do not and cannot in any way have any effect on said note or written instrument until after it becomes nonnegotiable by operation of law, to wit, after maturity, such provision or provisions do not render the same nonnegotiable. The provisions in the notes involved here—that is, as to attorney's fees, and as to expense of collection—do not and cannot affect the negotiable character of the notes, because those provisions cannot have any active legal operation until after maturity, when the notes by operation of law become nonnegotiable. The notes involved here, are, however, nonnegotiable, on account of the following provision contained therein: "For value received in one machinery—as per contract November 23, 1899, I promise to pay," etc. This provision is notice to the commercial world of a contract made November 23, 1899, in connection with the purchase of the machinery for which these notes were given; the terms of the contract do not appear on the face of the notes, but it is sufficiently referred to and stated to inform those who deal with these notes they must take the contract into consideration in so doing.

The circuit judge in the court below held the notes to be nonnegotiable, which was correct, and this court will not reverse a correct ruling though the reason for it be erroneous or unsound. The notes being nonnegotiable, exceptions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 13, and 14, which relate to the admissibility of evidence cannot be sustained, and are therefore overruled.

Exceptions 15, 16, 17, and 18 cannot be sustained, the notes being nonnegotiable.

Exception 19 imputes error to the circuit judge in charging the following: "And if the jury also believe from the evidence that, before the commencement of this action, Sam J. Huffman, or the defendant, offered to return the machinery to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff declined or failed to accept a return thereof, then the jury should find for the defendant on this ground." Under the law of this state there can be no rescission of an executed sale for breach of warranty, except (1) where this right is given in the contract of purchase; (2) where the seller is guilty of fraud; (3) where there has been an entire failure of consideration. The charge, therefore, should have limited the right of rescission to the instances above, and it should have been left to the jury to say whether or not, if the right ever existed to rescind, it had been waived by the defendant or by Huffman, in not undertaking to do so within a reasonable time.

Under the contention of the parties, and in view of the testimony submitted in the case, it was error to charge as above.

Exceptions 20, 21, 22, 24, and 25 are disposed of by what has been said as to 19.

Exception 23 is overruled as the request submitted by plaintiff is not applicable to nonnegotiable paper such as is involved here.

Exception 26 is overruled, the question raised there being matter in discretion of the trial judge.

Exception 10 is sustained in so far as the question raised therein concerns the charge in regard to section 255b of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902. The same is not applicable here as construed and charged by the circuit judge, for the reason that it would have the effect of destroying altogether negotiable paper in so far as this state is concerned.

Let all the exceptions be reported with the case.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the court below be, and the same is hereby, reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

GARY, A. J. I dissent from the conclusion announced herein that the notes were not rendered nonnegotiable by the provision as to attorney's fees, but concur in the separate opinion of Mr. Justice WOODS to the extent that the words expressing the consideration of the note "For value received in one machinery as per contract November 23, 1899," did not render the note nonnegotiable.

WOODS, J. I concur in the conclusion reached in the opinion of Judge DE VORE that the notes in suit were not rendered not negotiable by reason of the provision therein for attorney's fees. The learned judge has reached the conclusion, however, that the words in the notes expressing the consideration "For value received in one machinery as per contract November 23, 1899," prevented the notes from being negotiable instruments. I dissent from this conclusion because it seems to me not only an unsound and unfortunate limitation on the negotiability of promissory notes, but clearly opposed to authority. The notes are identical in form and need not be separately referred to. The first is in these words:

"$785.00. Columbia, S. C., July 12, 1902. On or before the first day of January, 1903, for value received in one machinery as per contract November 23, 1899, I, the undersigned of Richland county, state of South Carolina, promise to pay to the order of V. C. Badham of Columbia, S. C., seven hundred and eighty-five dollars, negotiable and payable at the Carolina National Bank, Columbia. Without offset, with interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum after maturity until paid, waiving all relief whatever from valuation, appraisal or exemption laws, with all expenses if suit be instituted for collection of this note. And it is expressly understood and agreed that the said V. C. Badham neither parts with the title, nor do the undersigned acquire any title in the property enumerated herein until this note and all other notes given in payment for same, and all extensions and renewals thereof are fully paid. And in case it becomes necessary to employ an attorney to collect this note, a further sum, not exceeding ten per cent. for fees. Presentment for payment and protest waived. Congaree, Richland Co., S. C. Sam J. Huffman."

The following indorsements were on the back: "Pay to order of Richmond City Mill Works, V. C. Badham." "Richmond City Mill Works, by H. A. Moore, Treasurer."

There is not a word importing that the payment of the amount promised was to be subject to or dependent on any contract of sale or any contingency whatever. Had there been such an expression, without doubt the instrument would not have been negotiable. These cases will serve to illustrate the principle. In Dilley v. Van Wie, 6 Wis. 209. the note was held not negotiable. There, however, the reference to a collateral contract was not, as in the note under discussion, explanatory of the consideration, but the words "subject to the provisions contained in an agreement this day made between said Carter and myself" were inserted in the body of the instrument, qualifying and rendering conditional the promise to pay. In Cushing v. Field, 70 Me. 50, 35 Am. Rep. 293, the note was held not negotiable because of the indorsement, "This note is subject of a contract made November 13, 1874." This was manifestly a limitation upon the promise itself, and of course destroyed its certainty. In Costello v. Crowell, 127 Mass. 233, 34 Am. Rep. 367, the note was not an original promise in writing, but was itself collateral given to secure a contemporary agreement. The words "Given as collateral security with agreement" were written on the margin, and it is obvious, as stated by the court, that the note was conditioned "upon the performance of the undertaking to which this is collateral."

This case is entirely different. The promise to pay is not subject to a separate contract, nor according to a separate contract, nor subject to any contingency, but absolute and unconditional. The words relied on by the learned judge as making the note not negotiable merely express the consideration; the reference to the contract being manifestly for the purpose of indicating a sale by which the title to the machinery had to be reserved as a security for the debt. Such a reference to the consideration and the security does not take away from the paper a single element of a promissory note. It is none the less an unconditional written promise to pay a specified sum of money at a certain time to the order of the payee.

The generally recognized rule that the expression of the consideration does not affect the negotiability is thus stated in Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, vol. 1, § 51a: "The negotiability of the instrument is not impaired by recitals or statements upon its face, which merely state the consideration upon which it was made, and impose no other liability upon any parties thereto than that for the payment of the sum of money therein expressed. Where there is a memorandum upon the instrument that it is 'secured according to the condition of a certain mortgage'; or that it was 'given in consideration of a certain patent right'; or 'as part pay for a pianoforte,' or for any other consideration, or 'and the same will be credited in your joint note to me.' The statement that collateral security has been deposited for the performance of a promise contained in a bill or note is a recital only, which does not affect its negotiability; and though the recital contain the terms of a deposit, that does not alter the case, for it renders neither the amount, the time of payment, the payee, nor the engagement to pay uncertain."

Two cases in this state make it clear beyond all doubt that neither statement of the consideration nor provision for securing the promise affect the negotiability of the instrument. And these seem conclusive of the question here, for, as above indicated, reference to the contract of sale was made in the note merely to indicate that the note was given for the purchase money of machinery, and that by the contract of sale the title to the machinery was reserved as a security for payment of the note. In National Bank v.

Gary, 18 S. C. 282, a note held to be negotiable was in these words fully setting out the security:

"$886.00. Charleston, S. C., July 31, 1877. On the first of November, 1877, I promise to pay to M. W. Gary or order, without offset, eight hundred and eighty-six dollars, for value received, with interest from date, interest after maturity at the rate of one per cent. per month, having deposited with M. W. Gary, as collateral security, seven hundred and thirty-five dollars Greenville and Columbia Railroad second mortgage coupons, past due. And in case this note shall not be paid when due, I hereby give the said M. W. Gary authority to sell the said security, or any part thereof, for my account, on the maturity of this note, or at any time thereafter, at public or private sale, at his discretion, without advertising the same, and to apply so much of the proceeds of said security to the payment of said note, as may be necessary to pay the same, with all interest due thereon, and also the payment of all expenses attending the sale of said security. If the net proceeds of such security shall not cover the amount due on this note, I hold myself bound to pay the balance forthwith, after such sale, with interest, at the rate of one per cent. per month."

In Dowie & Molise v. Joyner, 25 S. C. 123, the note was in these words, expressing the consideration, the security for the debt and a distinct undertaking on the part of the payee: "Collateral note for fertilizers. \$826.50. Eastover, S. C., April 23, 1884. On November 1 next, I promise to pay to the order of Dowie & Molise, eight hundred and twenty-six and $\frac{50}{100}$ dollars at First National Bank of Charleston, for value received in fertilizers. And to secure the payment of this note, I hereby agree on or before May 15 next, to pay to the said Dowie & Molise all moneys collected from the sale of said fertilizers, and to deliver to them all notes given for purchase of same, inclusive of freight on said fertilizers, as said collateral security for the payment of this note. That on or about September 15 next, Dowie & Molise agree to return said planter's notes for collection for their account, and that I agree in their behalf to collect the same, and remit to them the proceeds of such notes as may be collected, or transfer the original notes which, as trustees for them, we may be unable to collect in part or in full, and this agreement to remain in force until this obligation is satisfied." This was held to be a negotiable note, notwithstanding the agreement as to the collateral, and the agreement of the payees to return the collateral notes to the maker for collection.

It is a well-settled doctrine in other jurisdictions, also, that the reservation to the payee of title in the property for which the note is given or the statement of the consideration do not affect the negotiability. Chicago Ry. v. Merchants' Bank, 136 U. S. 268,

10 Sup. Ct. 999, 34 L. Ed. 349; Choate v. Stevens, 116 Mich. 28, 74 N. W. 289, 43 L. R. A. 277; Siegel v. Chicago Trust & Savings Bank, 131 Ill. 569, 23 N. E. 417, 7 L. R. A. 537, 19 Am. St. Rep. 51; Windmill Co. v. Honeywell, 7 Kan. App. 645, 53 Pac. 488; Campbell v. Equitable Securities Co., 17 Colo. App. 417, 68 Pac. 788; Collins v. Bradbury, 64 Me. 37; Gilpin v. People's Bank (Ind. App.) 90 N. E. 91.

In Markey v. Corey, 108 Mich. 184, 66 N. W. 498, 36 L. R. A. 117, 62 Am. St. Rep. 698, suit was brought on a promissory note, on the face of which was written: "This note is given in accordance with the terms of a certain contract under the same date, between the same parties;" and the court held that the negotiability of the note was not affected by these words. In Biegler v. Merchants' Loan & Trust Co., 164 Ill. 197, 45 N. E. 512, an indorsement on the note was as follows: "This note is secured by a lien upon my interest in certain horses named in the agreement this day made between S. W. Lelhy & Son and myself." It was held that the notes were negotiable, and were not affected by the recital of the security and agreement.

In Bank of Sherman v. Apperson (C. C.) 4 Fed. 25, the note recited that it was "for value received, being for a part of the payment on the Goree plantation purchased of said Gregg, as per agreement of the fourteenth of February, 1874." The court held that the note in question was negotiable, and "the recitals of the consideration in the face of the note did not at all affect its negotiable character."

In Taylor v. Curry, 109 Mass. 36, 12 Am. Rep. 661, a promissory note given to an insurance company and otherwise negotiable bore on its face the words "On policy No. 33,386." The policy referred to contained a provision for a set-off in case of loss. Yet the court held that this did not make the note contingent upon the happening of no loss, and added "a mere reference to the policy, without more, does not affect the negotiability of the note."

If a written contract had been introduced and had contained a limitation on the liability of the maker of the note, that fact would not affect the liability of the defendant as indorser, for, as we have shown, it would not affect the negotiability of the note. But it may seem important to observe that the record shows that defendant failed to offer in evidence any written contract limiting the liability of the maker, and himself testified that there was no written contract containing any limitation of the liability of the maker of the note.

On the trial counsel for defendant did not contend that the reference to the contract of sale in the note affected its negotiability, and the circuit judge did not so hold. It seems to me clear that the notes are negotiable, and that the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered for error of the circuit judge in holding otherwise. As this was the main issue in the cause, and the course of the trial, and the other rulings of the court depended very largely on the holding that the notes were not negotiable, the labor of considering the exceptions in detail would be fruitless.

JONES, C. J., concurs in the result, and in the separate opinion of WOODS, J.

ARLEDGE et al. v. ARLEDGE et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 5, 1910.)

DEEDS (§ 124*)—CONSTRUCTION—"ISSUE."

Where a deed in the granting clause conveys to A. "for her sole and separate use during her life and at her death to her issue," and the habendum clause reads "to A. and her issue," the word "issue" is one of limitation, and not of purchase, and hence does not convey a fee to A.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Ernest Moore, Special Judge.

Action by Thomas D. Arledge and another against McD. Arledge and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The decree of the circuit judge referred to in the opinion is as follows:

This is an action to compel the performance of a contract by the defendant McD. Arledge to purchase from the plaintiffs the lands described in the complaint and to enjoin the other defendants from clouding the title to the said lands. The plaintiffs aver a title in fee conditional in themselves to the said lands, a contract upon consideration by the defendant McD. Arledge to purchase and pay for the same upon receiving a good title in fee to the said lands, a tender by the said plaintiffs of their deed for the said lands accordingly to the said defendant McD. Arledge, and a refusal by the said defendant to accept the same and pay the purchase price. The plaintiffs further allege that the said defendants J. P. Palmer and G. W. S. Hart set up a claim of title to said premises, which claim is a cloud upon the title of the plaintiffs thereto. The defendant McD. Arledge admits the allegations of the complaint but the defendants J. P. Palmer and G. W. S. Hart aver title in themselves to the said premises and pray the judgment of the court that the title to the said lands is in them in fee simple. There is substantial agreement as to the facts between all the parties to the action, and all parties agreed in open court to submit their respective rights and titles to the determination of the court sitting in equity.

All of the parties claiming from a common source of title in J. P. Palmer, the question submitted for determination depends upon the construction of the deed by the defendant J. P. Palmer to his father Thomas Palmer and sister J. A. Arledge, dated July 30, 1866, conveying the premises here in question. By this deed the premises are conveyed in the granting clause "unto the said Thomas Palmer for and during his natural life and from and after his decease to the said J. A. Arledge, wife of McD. Arledge, for her sole and separate use during her natural life and at her death to her issue"; in the habendum clause, "to the said Thomas Palmer for and during his natural life and unto the said J. A. Arledge and her issue after his decease"; and in the general warranty clause, "unto the said Thomas Palmer during his natural life and thereafter unto the said J. A. Arledge and her issue."

Both the said Thomas Palmer and the said J. A. Arledge being dead, and the plaintiffs being the "issue" of the last named, the said plaintiffs and the defendant McD. Arledge contend that, under the terms of this deed, the said J. A. Arledge took a fee conditional estate in this land, while the defendants J. P. Palmer and G. W. S. Hart claim that the said J. A. Arledge took only a life estate therein, and that, there being no issue of the said J. A. Arledge in esse at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed, no further estate passed thereunder, but that the fee simple in remainder was and is in the defendant J. P. Palmer, except in so far as he has since conveyed an interest therein to the defendant G. W. S. Hart.

As to the matter of the proper construction of the deed above mentioned, it appears that the very question here presented has been determined by the recent case of Williams v. Gause, 83 S. C. 265, 65 S. E. 241, where the Supreme Court of this state, in its latest deliverance upon the point, holds as the correct rule in the construction of a similar deed that the word "issue" in a deed is to be construed as a word of limitation, except when the language used in the deed shows that it was intended as a word of purchase. In that case the court held that, where there was a conveyance to one and "his lawful issue" "and their lawful issue forever," the grantee took a fee conditional, and that the use of the added words "and their lawful issue forever" did not indicate an intention to give the grantee merely a life estate, with remainder to his issue as purchasers. See, also, Holman v. Wesner, 67 S. O. 308, 45 S. E. 206.

It is urged, however, by the defendants J. P. Palmer and G. W. S. Hart that such was not the law of this state in 1866, but that the law then was, as laid down in Markley v. Singletary, 11 Rich. Eq. 397, that "the word 'issue' in a deed is always a word of purchase," and that "an estate in fee conditional could not be created by deed by the use of this word" (issue), "even when clearly designed as a word of limitation." They insist that, especially as the deed here in question was drawn by a lawyer, it must be concluded that the word "issue" as used therein had the meaning then given to it by the decisions of this state.

But this contention cannot prevail, in the absence of any evidence of the use of the word in the deed here in question in the sense now claimed for it. Notwithstanding the fact that the deed was drawn by a lawyer, presumably familiar with the then existing law of the state, it is evident that it was not drawn with reference to any meaning so fixed for the word "issue" by the case of Markley v. Singletary, supra. For, under the decision in that case, the word "issue" as repeatedly used in this deed could be given no effect whatever, for the reason that, if it be construed as a word of purchase, there was no one then in esse to answer the description intended by the term. The oldest child of J. A. Arledge was not born until January 17, 1867, nearly six months after the date of the deed, and it cannot be supposed that either the draughtsman or the grantor contemplated this unknown and probably unsuspected fetus en ventre sa mère as being the "issue" who alone could take as purchaser under that designation in this deed.

Consequently, it cannot be determined that the deed here was drawn with reference to the effect of the use of the word "issue" as declared by the case of Markley v. Singletary. It must, on the contrary, be concluded that the word "issue" was used either in ignorance of its legal effect, or in the belief that it would be effective as a word of limitation. It is unquestionable that, even under the decisions as then existing in this state, it could have been so made effective by way of a declaration of trust in the deed, and it must be assumed that the attorney drawing the deed supposed it to be efficacious as a word of limitation, as it could not apparently have been otherwise intended. By the latest decision of the highest court of the state as above quoted, the word is now given the effect which it was probably intended to have both by the grantor and the draughtsman, and, however contrary this decision may be to the pre-existing rules of construction, it cannot be doubted but that it effectuates the probable purpose of the grantor in the deed at bar.

We are bound therefore by the decision in Williams v. Gause, already cited, to hold that the word "issue" as appearing in the deed here is to be taken as a word of limitation, and to construe this deed as limiting an estate in fee conditional to the said J. A. Arledge in the lands here in question, unless the "language of the deed" itself shows that it was intended as a word of purchase. So resorting to the language of the deed we find nothing to indicate such an intention, but, on the contrary, the intention evidently was to use the term as a word of limitation. It must be concluded therefore that the title of the plaintiffs to the lot of land described in the complaint is a good and valid title in fee conditional and that the deed of the said plaintiffs will convey a good title in fee simple thereto.

It is, therefore, ordered and adjudged that the said plaintiffs do, within 30 days after written notice of the filing of this decree, deposit with the clerk of this court a deed duly executed by them, in the usual form and with the usual covenants, with proper renunciations of dower by the wives of any of the plaintiffs who may be married, conveying in fee simple to the defendant McD. Arledge the lot or parcel of land described in the complaint in this action, free from any claim or incumbrance, said deed to be delivered to the said defendant McD. Arledge upon the payment of the purchase money therefor as hereinafter directed.

It is further ordered and adjudged that the said defendant McD. Arledge, within 30 days after written notice of the filing of this decree, upon the execution and deposit by the said plaintiffs of the said deed as aforesaid, do pay over to the said plaintiffs or their attorneys the sum of two thousand ($2,000) dollars in full of the purchase money of the said land; whereupon the said deed shall be delivered as aforesaid.

It is further ordered that the said defendants J. P. Palmer and G. W. S. Hart be and they are hereby forever enjoined and restrained from setting up any pretended title or claim to the said premises described in the complaint or any part thereof, or from otherwise seeking to cloud the title to the said land by any such title or claim thereto, alleged to be held by the said defendants or either of them at the time of the commencement of this action.

Hart & Hart, for appellants. Witherspoon & Spencers and W. F. Harding, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for specific performance of a contract. The facts are fully stated in the decree of his honor the circuit judge.

The question presented by the exceptions is, whether there was error on the part of the circuit judge in ruling that in the deed under which all the parties claim "issue" is a word of limitation. As a similar question has undergone judicial investigation in the recent case of Williams v. Gause, 83 S. C. 265, 65 S. E. 241, we deem it only necessary to cite this case to show that "issue," mentioned in the deed, is a word of limitation, and not of purchase. The appellant's attorneys were permitted to review the case of Williams v. Gause, 83 S. C. 265, 65 S. E. 241, but the court adheres to the views therein expressed.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

BRIDGES v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 11, 1910.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 152*)—RIGHT OF WAY—COMPENSATION OF REMAINDERMAN.

Where a railroad was built through land in possession of a life tenant, the remaindermen, on the death of the life tenant, could recover compensation for the right of way and the damages caused by the construction of the railroad.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 406; Dec. Dig. § 152.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 152*)—RIGHT OF WAY—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION.

The right of remaindermen to compensation for the construction of a railroad through the land during the lifetime of the life tenant is a personal right, and does not pass to a purchaser at a sale for partition among the remaindermen, after the life tenant's death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 152.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Ernest Moore, Special Judge.

Action by John A. Bridges against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Harry Foster, for appellant. E. M. Thomson, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. In 1868, the owner of a tract of land conveyed it to her son for life, with remainder to his children. About 1888, during the life of the son, a railroad, now operated by defendant, was built through the tract. The life tenant died in 1906. In 1907, the land was sold, by order of court, for partition amongst his children, and bought by plaintiff, who brought this action to recover compensation for the use by defendant of the right of way. The circuit judge directed a verdict for defendant.

On the death of the life tenant, his children had the right to compensation for the right of way, and the damages caused by the construction of the railroad through their land. Cureton v. R. R. Co., 59 S. C. 371, 37 S. E. 914; Trimmer v. Darden, 61 S. C. 220, 39 S. E. 373; Railway v. Reynolds, 69 S. C. 481, 48 S. E. 476. But the plaintiff, to whom the fee was conveyed, burdened with the apparent easement, has not that right. He bought the land subject to the easement. The right to compensation for the easement was, at the time of the conveyance, in the owners of the land, and was not conveyed by the deed. It was a right personal to them—a mere chose in action—a right which they could and may have waived. The same question was decided adversely to appellant's contention in Lewis v. Railroad Co., 11 Rich. Law, 91. The courts of other states are practically unanimous in their decisions to the same effect, as will be seen by reference to the cases cited in the notes to 11 A. & E. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 1189, and 15 Cyc. 796. Judgment affirmed.

DEATH (§ 10*)—ACTION BY MARRIED WOMAN—DEATH OF PLAINTIFF—SUBSTITUTION OF ADMINISTRATOR.

Where a married woman died after having instituted her suit to recover damages for pain and suffering resulting from personal injuries, and one duly appointed as administrator of her estate was made a party to the case, and the cause was ordered to proceed in his name as plaintiff, the case should not have been nonsuited on the trial, where the evidence made a prima facie case against the defendant, on the ground that the administrator was not a proper party to the case and that upon the death of the original plaintiff there was a "right of survivorship" in the husband.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; S. P. Gilbert, Judge.

Action by Marietta Martin against the Columbus Railroad Company. On the death of plaintiff, L. L. Stephens was substituted. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Marietta Martin, on July 16, 1907, brought suit against the Columbus Railroad Company to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to be permanent and of a serious character, and to have been sustained by her while attempting to alight from the car of the defendant company, in consequence, it is alleged in the petition, of the negligence of the company's agents and employes in suddenly starting the car from which the plaintiff was attempting to alight. In due time the defendant filed its answer. Subsequently the petitioner died. Afterwards L. L. Stephens, as the duly appointed administrator of the estate of the deceased plaintiff, was made a party plaintiff, and the action proceeded thereafter in his name as administrator. At the February term, 1909, the case came on to be tried, and evidence was submitted in behalf of the plaintiff tending to sustain the material allegations in the petition. There was some evidence, elicited on cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses, tending to show that at the time of the death of Marietta Martin she had a living husband, who, however, had not been seen in two or three years, and who, at the time of the injuries complained of and at the time of her death, was living, if at all, in a state of separation from the plaintiff's intestate. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, counsel for defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, upon the ground that it appeared from the evidence that Marietta Martin had a husband living, and that upon her death there was a right of survivorship in her husband, and that the administrator could not proceed with said suit. The court granted the nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted.

T. T. Miller, for plaintiff in error. Frank U. Garrard, W. C. Neill, and A. W. Cozart, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). Conceding that the evidence in the case established beyond controversy the fact that the intestate of the plaintiff in error had a husband in life at the time she sustained the injuries complained of, and at the time of her death, we think that the court should have overruled the motion for a nonsuit. The court below evidently granted the nonsuit upon the idea that the right of action survived to the husband, and not to the administrator of the original plaintiff, who died after the institution of her action to recover for personal injuries to herself. That the action itself did not abate is perfectly clear from the reading of section 3825 of the Civil Code of 1895, which provides: "No action for a tort shall abate by the death of either party where the wrongdoer received any benefit from the tort complained of; nor shall any action for the recovery of damages for homicide, injury to person, or injury to property abate by the death of either party; but such cause of action, in case of the death of the plaintiff, shall, in the event there is no right of survivorship in any other person, survive to the personal representative of the deceased plaintiff, and in case of the death of the defendant shall survive against said defendant's personal representative." This action was brought to recover for pain and suffering, mental and physical, resulting from the injuries complained of, which were, it is alleged, of a serious and permanent character, impairing plaintiff's mind and her bodily vigor and strength and her capacity to labor.

Under the facts alleged in the petition, and which there was evidence before the court and jury to support, it appeared that the original plaintiff in the case had been injured by the negligent and tortious conduct of defendant's agents and employees. Under such a state of facts two different causes of action may arise—the one in favor of the woman for her own pain and suffering, and the other in favor of the husband for the loss of his wife's services and the expenses incurred, if any, as the consequence of the injuries to her. These causes of action are separate and distinct, and in favor of different parties, and could not properly be joined in one suit. Georgia Railroad Co. v. Tice, 124 Ga. 459, 52 S. E. 916. This suit was instituted by the woman to recover for pain and suffering. To that action she was a necessary, and the only necessary, party, and at her death there was no other party in whom was vested the right of survivorship. If the husband had been originally joined with the wife in this suit, construing it as one to recover for pain and suffering only (for the allegations as to loss of earning capacity and as to the permanency of the injuries are incident to the allegations of pain and suffering), in case of the wife's death the right of action could not have survived to the husband, but the action could have proceeded only in the name of a duly appointed personal representative of the wife.

We do not think that any right of survivorship which would authorize the husband to proceed with this suit could be inferred from the provision, contained in section 3828 of the Civil Code, that "the husband may recover for the homicide of his wife, and if she leaves child or children surviving, said husband and children shall sue jointly, and not separately, with the right to recover the full value of the life of the deceased, as shown by the evidence, and with the right of survivorship as to said suit if either die pending the action." The right of survivorship here referred to arises in cases where, under the provisions of the statute just quoted, the husband and a child or children are properly joined as plaintiff in a suit brought to recover the "full value" of the life of the deceased, where the deceased is a married woman leaving husband and children at the time of her death tortiously caused. In such a suit as that last supposed, there could be no recovery for that which constitutes the sole ground of recovery in the case at bar, to wit, pain and suffering inflicted upon the deceased.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF PAULDING COUNTY v. PAULDING COUNTY GRAND JURY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 15, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 48*)—
BOARD OF EDUCATION—NEGLECT OF DUTY—DISCHARGE—REVIEW.

The act of August 22, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 100), amending the act of August 21, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 61), contains the following provision: "The failure on the part of any board of education to perform the duties required by this act shall be immediately inquired into by the first grand jury sitting after such neglect of duty; and if said grand jury should find that any member or members of said board have failed to perform their duty, it shall report the same to the judge of the superior court, who shall cause a rule nisi to issue against such member or members, and they shall be heard by the judge in their own behalf; if said member or members cannot give a good and sufficient reason why they have not performed their duties as required by this act, they shall be discharged, and the said judge shall fill the vacancies until the next grand jury shall meet." Held, that the exercise of the power to hear the members of the board of education, and to discharge them, if they do not give a good and sufficient reason why they have not performed their duties as required by the act, and to fill the vacancies thus caused until the meeting of the next grand jury, is not a judgment of the superior court to which a bill of exceptions may be filed, bringing such action to this court for review. Carter v. Janes, 96 Ga. 280, 23 S. E. 201. See, also, Harris v. Sheffield, 129 Ga. 299, 57 S. E. 305.

ROBINSON v. WOODWARD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 522, 713*)—EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 59*)—RECORD—SUFFICIENCY OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

The bill of exceptions recites that, upon the trial of a statutory complaint for land brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendant in error, the trial judge, upon an agreed statement of facts in writing, signed by counsel for both parties, decided that the title to the lands sued for was in the defendant and that the plaintiff do not recover same, to which judgment exceptions were had. The bill of exceptions contained an agreed statement of facts, wherein it was stated "that defendant claims said lots of land solely as such heir at law, and from no other source whatsoever, and that plaintiff claims said lots of land solely by reason of the instrument hereto attached, and that unless said instrument divested said Ashley O. Best of title, the ownership and title of said lots is in defendant." The bill of exceptions specified as a part of the record material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, among other things, the agreed statement of facts and the instrument therein referred to. Neither a copy, nor any of the contents of the instrument referred to, was embodied in the bill of exceptions, or attached as an exhibit thereto, or contained in a brief approved by the trial judge and made a part of the record. In the transcript sent up by the clerk as the record, there appears what purports to be a copy of such instrument, and there appears what purports to be a copy of the agreed statement of facts signed by counsel for both parties and filed in the clerk's office, with what purports to be a copy of the instrument therein referred to as annexed thereto. Held:

(1) Where no motion for a new trial is made, the evidence should be embodied in the bill of exceptions, or attached as an exhibit thereto, and properly identified by the trial judge, or contained in a brief of the evidence approved by him and made a part of the record. McClarty v. Penn Mutual Life Ins. Co., 131 Ga. 724, 63 S. E. 224; Roberts v. Cairo, 183 Ga. 642, 66 S. E. 938.

(2) In the transcript sent up by the clerk as being record, those papers which purport to be copies of the agreement of counsel and of the instrument annexed thereto cannot be considered as record, not being approved by the trial judge and made a part of the record, it only appearing that such agreed statement of facts was signed by counsel and filed in the office of the clerk; and only the agreement of counsel as appearing in the bill of exceptions, with a mere reference to such instrument, can be considered. Cases cited supra; Dolvin v. American Harrow Co., 134 Ga. — (67 S. E. 541).

(a) A construction of the instrument above referred to being necessary for the determination of the only question involved in the case, this court is unable to review the correctness of the final judgment upon the merits, and an affirmance of the judgment of the court below must necessarily result. Cases cited supra.

(3) Several months after the bill of exceptions was certified and filed in this court, there was signed by the trial judge and sent to this court by the clerk of trial court, under his certificate and seal, a second certificate of the trial judge, in which the latter stated that the pages annexed thereto "comprise a complete, true, and correct copy of the agreed statement of facts, and of the original deed referred to therein, exhibited and used in this court on the trial of said case. And I further certify that the annexed copy of said agreed statement of facts, and of said deed, are a complete, true, and correct copy of the agreed statement of facts and of said deed filed in the office of the clerk of this court." Held, such certificate and copies annexed thereto cannot be considered by this court.

(a) As neither the copy nor any of the contents of the instrument can be considered as any part of the record, the bill of exceptions cannot, under the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 5570, be amended so as to include such copy, or any part of such contents.

CASON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1152*)—JURY (§ 72*)—IMPANELING—TALESMEN—DISCRETION OF COURT—REVIEW.

Under Pen. Code 1895, § 858, if on the trial of a person indicted for felony the jury cannot be made up from the regular panel of 48, the court shall continue to furnish panels, consisting of such numbers of jurors as the court, in its discretion, may think proper, until a jury is obtained. Unless the court abuses its discretion in regard to the number of jurors in such successive panels, it will furnish no ground for reversal.

(a) Where, after 10 jurors had been selected, the regular panels were exhausted, and the court drew 30 talesmen and directed the sheriff to summon them, and upon 4 of them coming into court they were put upon the defendant as a special panel, and subsequently as others came in they were put upon him one at a time, it does not appear that such a proceeding was an abuse of discretion on the part of the presiding judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3056; Dec. Dig. § 1152; Jury, Dec. Dig. § 72.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 918*)—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—IRREGULARITIES—PRELIMINARY PROCEEDINGS.

Where a juror's name appeared on the book containing the jury list as "Sterling Whitfield," and the man summoned was named "Starling Whitfield," and the evidence introduced before the judge clearly showed that the two were identical, and that there was a mere error in spelling the juror's first name, it furnished no ground for a new trial that the court held the juror competent and directed the clerk to correct the spelling of the name on the list of jurors drawn.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 913.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 918*)—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—IRREGULARITIES—IMPANELING JURORS.

Where, after the defendant had exhausted his strikes, a juror was put upon him, accepted, and told to take his seat in the jury box, but at once, and before the juror was sworn, the court stated that he had forgotten to ask if the juror had any excuse, and upon the statement of the latter that he had a pain in his breast, had been sick two or three days, and did not think he was able to serve, and upon observation of his physical condition and appearance as a sick man the court excused him from the jury, this furnished no ground for a new trial, although the defendant's counsel stated that they did not want to be understood as agreeing to excuse the juror. Ozburn v. State, 87 Ga. 173, 13 S. E. 247.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 918.*]

4. JURY (§ 75*)—IMPANELING—COMPETENCY OF JUROR.

After the juror had been excused, there was no error in overruling a motion to declare a mistrial on that ground, and proceeding regularly to have the panel completed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 384-390; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 366, 419, 420*)—HOMICIDE (§ 204*)—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY—DYING DECLARATIONS—RES GESTÆ.

Where a person was walking along a street at night, and saw the flash of a pistol, and heard the report, and thereupon went immediately to the place, traversing a distance estimated at about 150 yards, and occupying in going about two minutes of time, and where, on approaching the spot, he saw a man run away in the dark, and, thinking that he recognized the man who had been shot, and who had fallen to the ground, he called the name of such person and asked if it were he, and, on receiving an affirmative answer, asked who had shot him, and the wounded man answered, giving the name of the accused, and died a few minutes later, on a trial of the accused for his murder, there was no error in admitting evidence of the above-stated facts over the objection that the conversation detailed was hearsay, and neither dying declarations nor part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 811, 816, 819, 820, 973; Dec. Dig. §§ 366, 419, 420; Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 438; Dec. Dig. § 204.]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 404*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The evidence sufficiently identified the pocketbook and warrant claimed to have been found in the pocket of the city marshal, who was killed, so as not to require a new trial on account of their admission in evidence as against an objection that they were not shown to have been in his pocket, or to be the same book and paper in it as those found, and to be unchanged, or that they were irrelevant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 891; Dec. Dig. § 404.*]

7. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—ISSUANCE OF WARRANT.

The evidence for the state made a prima facie showing that the warrant was issued by the city clerk.

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 430*)—HOMICIDE (§ 338*)—EVIDENCE—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—TRANSCRIPT OF ORDINANCE.

A copy of a section of a municipal ordinance, which on its face was complete in itself and declared that it should be unlawful for any person to be in a state of intoxication or drunkenness in the city, or to conduct himself openly on the streets or public places like one intoxicated or drunk, and directed that a person should be taken in custody by the marshal at once, if found in such a condition, but should not be tried until sober. It was certified by the city clerk as a "true copy of section 9 of the Ordinance 253 as contained on page 293 of Book of Ordinances of the city of Tallapoosa." This was admitted in evidence, along with evidence tending to show that the accused was drunk, and acting in a drunken manner on the streets, and that the marshal was sent for, and took him into custody. Held, that the transcript was not objectionable, on the ground that the city clerk was not the proper person to certify to the ordinance, or that it was not relevant. Civ. Code 1895, § 5218.

(a) Where it is sought to have the clerk of a municipal corporation certify to a transcript of an ordinance, generally the entire ordinance on the subject in hand should be copied, so that it may be determined what is the effect of the ordinance as a whole. But, under the facts of this case, the admission of the certified transcript of the section authorizing an arrest of one drunk on the streets, along with evidence tending to show that the accused was thus drunk, and killed the marshal who arrested him, will not furnish ground for a reversal.

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 218*)—"WARRANTS"—ISSUANCE.

By section 16 of the charter of the city of Tallapoosa (Acts 1888, p. 240) it is provided that "all processes, writs, warrants, subpoenas, or other papers shall be issued by the clerk of council in the name of the mayor of said city, and signed by such clerk; and it shall be the duty of the marshal of said city to serve all such processes," etc. The "warrants" referred to were warrants for the arrest of offenders against municipal ordinances.

10. GROUNDS FOR NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

The newly discovered evidence did not require a new trial.

11. HOMICIDE (§§ 336, 340*)—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—VERDICT CONTRARY TO EVIDENCE.

If there were inaccuracies in any of the rulings or charges of the court of which complaint was made in the numerous grounds of the motion for a new trial, in view of the entire evidence and the charge of the court, they are not such as to require a reversal. The evidence introduced for the state made a plain case of murder. The accused introduced no witness, except the clerk of council, who testified that he did not issue the warrant on the day it bore date, though he identified the signature as his. The accused in his statement did not claim that he was resisting an illegal arrest, but stated that after his arrest, and as the marshal reached the city prison, he took a pistol from the pocket of the accused; that in the dark the latter stumbled and threw out his hand, causing an accidental discharge of the pistol. This was met by proof of previous threats, of flight from the scene of the homicide, and of the fact that the safety attachment of the pistol was such as to render it reasonably impossible for the firing to have occurred in such a manner. The presiding judge did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

HOLLAND v. McRAE OIL & FERTILIZER CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 25, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DAMAGES (§ 182*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Where a plaintiff sought to recover damages on account of physical injury, alleging in his petition that the injury was permanent, and that his entire earning capacity was destroyed, and that he had not earned anything since receiving the injury, it was competent for the defendant, upon the trial of the case, to show that the plaintiff had had employment since the injury, had earned certain amounts of money therefrom, and had been offered a position at given wages.

(a) In such a case, in connection with testimony tending to show that the plaintiff was capable of doing work, it was competent for the defendant to show that since his recovery the defendant (his former employer) had offered him employment at certain wages. The weight to be given to such evidence, in considering what opportunity for obtaining employment and earning money he had, was for the jury, along with evidence as to his capacity to perform the duties of the offered position.

(b) The offer of employment in this case did not appear to have been made in connection with any effort to compromise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 500; Dec. Dig. § 182.*]

2. DAMAGES (§ 157*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in such a suit, no claim was made for physician's bills, or for exemplary or punitive damages, and there was no claim that the injury was maliciously inflicted, it was not competent to show that the defendant had paid the physician's bill of the plaintiff, or had furnished groceries to him; there being no counterclaim or issue made by the pleadings in regard to such subjects.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 429-440, 447-453; Dec. Dig. § 157.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—CONCLUSIONS—AGENCY.

If the question as to who was the general manager of a manufacturing company, which operated a mill, was material, it was not competent to show, by the testimony of a witness who was the superintendent of such mill, that he supposed that a named person acted as the general manager.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149-2185; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 472*)—OPINION EVIDENCE.

Where the plaintiff contended that a certain appliance of the defendant had been left in a dangerous condition by the superintendent of its mill, and this was denied by the defendant, it was not competent to have such superintendent, as a witness, give in general terms his opinion as to whether he had left such appliance in a dangerous condition or not. The facts should be proved for the consideration of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2186-2195; Dec. Dig. § 472.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 270*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Where the plaintiff alleged that a certain hood, or cap, connected with a cup elevator in an oil mill, had originally been properly and securely constructed and fastened, so as to be safe, and that the superintendent and alter ego of the defendant had removed such hood or cap, and replaced it with insecure fastening, so as to leave it in a dangerous condition, and that by reason thereof it gave way, when plaintiff rightfully took hold of it, and precipitated him into a seed conveyor, thereby causing him injury, it was not error to allow a witness, who at the time of the occurrence in question, and for some time prior thereto, was an officer of the defendant corporation and connected with the management of its mill, to testify that when he returned to the mill, a few hours after the plaintiff was injured, the hood was there, like it had always been.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 913-927, 932; Dec. Dig. § 270.*]

6. CORPORATIONS (§ 428*)—NOTICE TO OFFICER—LIABILITY OF CORPORATION.

Notice to an officer of a corporation, acting for it in connection with its business, and within the scope of its agency, is notice to his principal.

(a) The charge of the court on this subject, as set out in the eighth and tenth grounds of the motion for a new trial, is not entirely clear, but on another trial any inaccuracies will doubtless be corrected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1748-1761; Dec. Dig. § 428.*]

7. CORRECT INSTRUCTION.

Under the evidence, there was no error in charging as follows: "I charge you further that, * * * if you should find that both the injured party and the defendant were innocent and that the catastrophe was the result of accident, * * * there could be no recovery."

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102, 125, 150*)—CARE IN FURNISHING MACHINERY—SAFE PLACE TO WORK—DUTY TO WARN—INJURY ACTION BY SERVANT—INSTRUCTION.

A master is bound to exercise ordinary care in furnishing machinery equal in kind to that in general use, and reasonably safe for all persons who operate it with ordinary care and diligence. A like measure of diligence is imposed in reference to furnishing a reasonably safe place for his employes to work. If there are latent dangers in machinery, or dangers incident to an employment unknown to the servant, of which the master knows or ought to know, he must give the servant warning in respect thereto. But if there are latent defects in machinery or appliances, or incident to the employment, of which the master does not know, and could not know by the exercise of ordinary care, he will be excused for a failure to discover them.

(a) It was not an exact statement of the rule of law to make the question of excusing the master for not discovering latent defects turn on whether they were "such as to deceive human judgment."

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 139, 294*)—VICE PRINCIPAL—INJURY TO SERVANT—INSTRUCTION.

Where the plaintiff alleged that he was injured by reason of the negligence of a superintendent and alter ego of a corporation for which he was working, and this was denied by the defendant, although the circumstances showed that such person at times performed manual labor for the defendant company, yet where it showed, without conflict, that he was the superintendent in charge of the operation of the manufacturing plant of the defendant, with power to direct its operation, and to employ and discharge the laborers, and to determine the number of them required, to put them at whatever work he directed, and to charge them as he saw fit, he was, relatively to the duty of giving notice of a danger known to him to a laborer, to whom the same was unknown, the alter ego of the corporation, although there were two other officials of the company who were superior in command to him, and who also gave direction to him and others. Moore v. Dublin Cotton Mills, 127 Ga. 609, 56 S. E. 839, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 772.

(a) Under such facts, it was error to charge as follows: "If you should find that he [such superintendent] was not in charge, but find that he was a mere fellow servant, and not an alter ego or a vice principal, if you should find that to be the fact of the case, and find that he was merely a fellow servant with the plaintiff, then I charge you that the plaintiff could not recover."

EAVES et al. v. J. E. FIELD & SON.

(No. 2,279.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 19, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 105*)—NECESSITY FOR OBJECTIONS.

A ruling upon the admissibility of testimony may, of course, be reviewed by a motion for a new trial; but the admissibility or incompetency of testimony, to which no objection was interposed at the time it was introduced, cannot be tested for the first time by an exception to a charge of the court which is abstractly correct, and would generally be unexceptionable, merely because some of the evidence in the case might have been subject to be excluded if proper timely objection had been urged thereto. Exceptions to the charge of the court cannot be used as a substitute for timely objections to the introduction of testimony. Consequently, as no objection was made to any of the testimony in this case, so far as it appears from the record, nor any motion made to rule out any of the testimony introduced, it was not error to instruct the jury that "they should take into consideration all of the evidence which had been adduced before them in making up their verdict," even if some of the testimony was legally inadmissible.

2. PARTNERSHIP (§ 213*)—PLEA DENYING PARTNERSHIP.

A plea denying partnership must be sworn to. There was no plea denying partnership in this case. The question of partnership not being involved, the petition must be construed as setting forth a cause of action against the named defendants, by which they became jointly and severally liable to the plaintiff for the value of goods furnished. The evidence authorized the finding against both defendants, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 112*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The testimony of the witness introduced by the plaintiff that certain words were used by the defendant in a meaning which substantially conformed to the allegation in the petition as to the language there charged to have been used by him, and the tacit admissions of the defendant that he had made statements to the same general effect as those charged in the declaration, were sufficient to authorize the verdict.

2. TRIAL (§§ 29, 302*)—RULING ON EVIDENCE—RIGHT OF JUDGE TO DISCUSS EVIDENCE—WITHDRAWAL OF JURY.

Where a ruling upon the sufficiency of testimony is invoked, the trial judge has the right to make his ruling intelligible by stating the impression that certain testimony has made upon his mind, and even to state definitely to what in his opinion a witness has testified, especially when he calls the attention of the jury specifically to the fact that the impression made upon his mind is to have no influence upon their determination as to what was really testified. Where it is either apparent or probable that a discussion of the testimony must ensue upon a motion or ruling invoked of the court, and the party deems it to his interest that the jury should not hear it, a timely request that the jury be withdrawn should be preferred.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 971*)—WITNESSES (§ 263*)—RECALL OF WITNESS—DISCRETION OF COURT.

A trial judge is not required to recall a witness to refresh his recollection of the testimony, nor to regard affidavits as to what a witness who has already been upon the stand would testify if reintroduced. It is discretionary with the court to permit a witness who has already given his testimony to be again placed upon the stand for the purpose of repeating or explaining statements previously made by him; but the practice is not to be favored where reasonable opportunity has been afforded for a full examination of the witness, and the discretion of the court in reference to this matter will in no case be controlled, unless it is perfectly clear that this discretion has been abused.

4. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 100*)—PROOF—VARIANCE.

Proof of language substantially similar, or a practical identity of meaning with the defamatory words alleged, in an action for slander, is all that is requisite or feasible. Substantial identity as to the charge and the proof is all that is usually attainable in actions based upon oral utterances. Where a defamation is reduced to writing, complete certainty is necessary; "but for oral utterances such verbal precision need not and cannot be required. It need not be, for the importance of single words in oral discourse is comparatively much less than in writings; and it cannot be, since memory does not retain precise words, except of simple utterances and for a short time. Hence verbal precision is in general not required in proving oral utterances. The substance or effect is sufficient." 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2097.

It was error to award a nonsuit. SALES (§§ 187, 441*) — ACTION FOR PRICE — BREACH OF WARRANTY—INTEREST.

The trial was free from error, and the finding of the jury upon the facts at issue was authorized by the evidence. The defendants were entitled to set off the overpayment upon the 75 yards of bagging, as to which there had been a breach of express warranty, against the unpaid portion of the plaintiffs' account (the contract was an entire contract); but the plaintiffs were entitled to interest upon that portion of the account as to which there was no dispute, from the time when payment was to have been made, under the contract, up to the time when the payment was actually made. Direction is therefore given that the judgment be amended in accordance with the special finding of the jury, so as to award to the plaintiffs the interest alleged to be due in their petition, and established without dispute in the testimony.

J. H. Porter and Phil P. Johnston, for plaintiffs in error. E. L. Brinson, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. T. L. Langston & Co. brought suit against the R. C. Neely Company for $750 principal, interest on $2,500 from October 1, 1907, to July 2, 1908 (when a payment of $750 was alleged to have been made), and interest on $750 from July 2, 1908, forward. The plaintiffs attached to their petition a written contract embodying stipulations concerning the purchase of 2,000 50-yard rolls of new two-pound bagging, which was signed by both parties, and also a statement of account. The defendants in their answer admitted the receipt of the bagging in question, and, although they insisted that it was defective in several respects and did not conform to the express warranty of the contract, they nevertheless admitted that for reasons satisfactory to themselves they had waived the defects of this shipment, by the acceptance of the bagging specified in the statement, and were indebted to the plaintiffs upon that shipment $750. They set up, however, that there were 75,000 yards of bagging which, under the provisions of the same contract, had previously been shipped to them, as to which they were not precluded from setting up the breach of the express warranty contained in the contract, and that this bagging was worth one cent per yard less than the bagging that they bought, and that should have been delivered to them. As to this lot of bagging the defendants claimed that they had overpaid the plaintiffs $750, and they asked that this sum be set off, as money had and received against the plaintiffs' demand. The finding of the jury was in accordance with the defendants' contention, the verdict being: "We, the jury, find for the defendant, the R. C. Neely Company, the sum of $750, to be set off against the balance of $750 claimed in the plaintiffs' declaration."

The verdict was authorized by the evidence and is sustained by law. The rule in regard to the recovery of payments voluntarily made has no application to the case, because the contract was an entire contract. It is immaterial that the first shipments were closed by notes which were afterwards paid. Of course, as to that portion of the bagging which they accepted with full knowledge of its defects, the defendants, under the circumstances stated in the record, waived all right to rely upon the express warranty; but as to those shipments, or that portion of the bagging which they received and accepted before they knew there had been a breach of the express warranty, there can be no question upon this point. The defendants would have the right to recover whatever might be the difference between the market price of the bagging that they bought and the bagging that was shipped to them. The acceptance of the shipment would not imply a waiver of the express warranty. In fact, they would have the right to rely upon the express warranty, even if they accepted the shipment, unless it was clear that they intended to waive it. Any payments they may have made, even though it happened that the payments amounted exactly to the contract price of the first three shipments, if the contract is an entire contract, are to be treated as payments merely upon the gross amount of the contract; and if the payment was made under such circumstances as appear in this record (the defendants having given notes before the goods were delivered to them, which they were afterwards compelled to pay), any amount by which the payments exceeded the true value of the goods purchased, as determinable by the express warranty, would be money received by the plaintiffs which they would be required, ex æquo et bono, to return to the defendants.

The verdict was a special finding upon the facts. It was in accordance with the instructions of the judge as to the form of the verdict, and this finding as to the only disputed issue in the case is authorized by the evidence. There is, therefore, no need for the expense and delay of another trial; but it seems that the interest which the plaintiffs claimed upon the amount for $2,500 prior to the payment of the $1,750 was lost sight of in framing the judgment. The plaintiffs' claim in this respect was supported by the evidence. It was undisputed either by the pleading or the proof of the defendants. The defendants received by the verdict all they claimed. The judgment should have been molded in accordance with the pleadings and the evidence, as well as the verdict, especially when the finding of the jury was a special finding upon the particular facts. We do not deem it necessary, however, to order a new trial to correct this error. There should be deducted from the $750, found as a set-off in favor of the defendants, the sum of $131.25, the interest to which the plaintiffs were entitled upon $2,500 for the nine months from October 1, 1907, to July 2, 1908, when the $1,750 was paid; and the judgment should be so molded as to be one in favor of the plaintiffs for $131.25. It is directed that judgment be entered accordingly.

Judgment affirmed, with directions.

STACKHOUSE et al. v. ROWLAND et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 21, 1910.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 178*)—VALIDITY OF BONDS—RIGHT TO CALL ELECTION.

The county of Dillon was established by act approved February 5, 1910 (26 St. at Large, p. 863), and such act created a board of commissioners and directed that such board should hold an election for county officers on April 10, 1910, and provided for the erection of a courthouse and jail by a courthouse commission. An act, approved February 25, 1910 (26 St. at Large, p. 960), provided that to provide additional funds for erecting and equipping such courthouse the county board of commissioners of said county issue and deliver to the special courthouse commission bonds of said county, to be known as "courthouse bonds," in the aggregate sum of forty thousand ($40,000) dollars, and the said commissioners shall order an election to be held at Dillon on the second Tuesday in April, 1910, on the question whether the said bonds shall be issued. Held, that the board required to order the election could not have been the board of county commissioners, as such board, under the statutes, would be elected on the day appointed for the bond election, and that construing both statutes together the proper board to order the election would be the board of election commissioners who were already authorized to call an election on that day, and that the election should be held in the county of Dillon, and that the qualified electors of that county should vote at their respective precincts, and the election should not be confined to the town of Dillon.

2. STATUTES (§ 181*)—CONSTRUCTION—REJECTING ORDINARY MEANING OF WORDS.

However plain the ordinary meaning of words used in a statute may be, the courts will reject that meaning, when to accept it would lead to a result so plainly absurd that it could not possibly have been intended by the Legislature, and if possible will construe the statute so as to carry out the intention of the Legislature.

3. COUNTIES (§ 178*)—BONDS—LEGALITY OF ELECTION.

Where a statute, authorizing the issuance of county bonds for the building of a courthouse, directs that the election to determine their issuance be ordered and held by a certain board other than the board of election commissioners, and the latter board in good faith, supposing that they were authorized to hold the election, orders and holds such election, and the same is fairly conducted after due notice by the board of election commissioners, and there is no protest nor objection of any kind by the voters or taxpayers, either before or after the election, such election will be recognized as valid.

Mandamus proceedings by R. P. Stackhouse and others against J. W. Rowland and others. Writ issued.

Livingston & Gibson, for relators. W. B. Hargrove, for respondents.

WOODS, J. In this proceeding for mandamus the relators, constituting the courthouse commission of Dillon county, ask that the county board of commissioners of that county be required to execute and deliver county bonds to the amount of $40,000, to be sold by them and the proceeds expended in the construction of a courthouse and jail. The respondents allege that the statute law of the state authorizes the board of commissioners to issue bonds when such issue has been approved by a majority vote at an election held in pursuance of the statute. It is conceded that an election was held at all the election precincts in the county after due advertisement, under the order and control of the board of election commissioners of the county, and that at such election there was a majority vote in favor of the issue of the bonds; but it is contended that this election was illegal and could confer no authority to issue the bonds, in that the act required the election to be ordered and conducted by the county board of commissioners, not at all the voting precincts, but at the town of Dillon alone.

The county of Dillon was established by act of the Legislature, approved February 5, 1910 (26 St. at Large, p. 863). Among other things necessary to the organization of the new county the statute provided for the erection of a courthouse and jail by the commissioners who are the relators in these proceedings. This act authorized the commissioners to receive donations, but invested them with no power to obtain funds by pledge of the public credit or otherwise. The attempt was made to supply this deficiency, and to provide the commissioners with the funds requisite for the construction of the public buildings by an act approved on the 25th day of February, 1910 (26 St. at Large, p. 960). The first section of this statute provided: "That for the purpose of providing additional funds for erecting and furnishing or equipping a new courthouse building for the county of Dillon, at Dillon, S. C., the county board of commissioners of said county be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to issue and deliver to the special courthouse commission hereinafter named, interest-bearing coupon bonds of said county, to be known as 'courthouse bonds,' in the aggregate sum of forty thousand ($40,000) dollars, * * *: Provided, That for the purpose of determining the issue of bonds authorized in section 1 of this act, the said commissioners shall order an election to be held at Dillon, on the second Tuesday in April, 1910, on the question whether the said bonds shall be issued or not, in which election only the qualified voters residing in said district shall be allowed to vote, and said commissioners shall give notice of said election for three weeks in the Dillon Herald, a newspaper published in the town of Dillon, shall designate the time and place and appoint the managers of said election, and receive the returns of the managers and declare the result."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The difficulty is indicated by the words of the statute we have italicized. Viewing the context alone no one would hesitate to say that "the said commissioners" who are required to order the election meant the county board of commissioners, for that board of commissioners had just been referred to in the act as the commissioners authorized to issue the bonds. But it was impossible for the county board of commissioners to order an election on the second Tuesday in April, 1910, because no such board was or could have been then in existence inasmuch as the act creating the county of Dillon provided that on that same day the first county board of commissioners should be elected. Hence, if the statute providing for the election on the bond issue be construed so as to give force to all the words just as they are used, the absurd result would be reached that an election was to be held by a board which could not be in existence at the date fixed for the election; and so there could be no election. Giving the ordinary meaning to the words used, the further absurdity would be inevitable that the question of issuing bonds for county purposes, binding on the entire county, should be decided by an election held at the town of Dillon, where only the electors registered at that precinct could vote.

However plain the ordinary meaning of the words used in a statute may be, the courts will reject that meaning, when to accept it would lead to a result so plainly absurd that it could not possibly have been intended by the Legislature, or would defeat the plain legislative intention; and if possible will construe the statute so as to escape the absurdity and carry the intention into effect. The cardinal rule, that the courts should in all cases give effect to the obvious intent of the Legislature, and that every technical rule of construction should yield to the clear meaning of the statute, is stated in Endlich on Stat. Inter. § 295. Numerous cases in which clerical errors have been corrected by the courts pursuant to this principle are given in section 319 of the same work.

This rule has been followed in many cases in this and other jurisdictions. In Waring v. Cheraw, etc., Ry. Co., 16 S. C. 416, the word "hereinafter" was read "hereinbefore," when the use of the former would have destroyed the manifest purpose of the statute. In Kitchen v. Southern Ry. Co., 68 S. C. 554, 48 S. E. 4, the word "of" was construed to mean "or," in order to give full effect to the meaning of Lord Campbell's act. In Baldwin v. Travis County, 40 Tex. Civ. App. 149, 88 S. W. 480, the word "taxed" was substituted for "attached," the court holding that the use of the latter word "appears to be improper and inapt, in that it does not appear to definitely express or convey the meaning evidently intended by the Legislature." In California Loan Co. v. Wells, 118

Cal. 489, 50 Pac. 697, it was held that the word "July," which was evidently intended, should be read instead of "June," which had been used in the act under consideration. In Re Frey, 128 Pa. 593, 18 Atl. 479, the word "city" was inserted instead of "county," when the court was of opinion that "the section is senseless and absurd as it is written, while the purpose of the Legislature is perfectly obvious and certain."

While this rule is generally recognized, the courts in applying it should exercise circumspection to avoid any effort to amend statutes. The principle depends upon the absurdity being manifest and the legislative intent obvious. Here it is perfectly obvious that the purpose of the Legislature was to give the electors of Dillon county the opportunity to decide by an election whether funds should be provided by issue of county bonds for buildings absolutely indispensable. What public officials should conduct the election was an entirely subordinate matter.

A statute so plain and important in its purpose should not be declared impossible of execution merely because as to a subordinate matter—the method of holding an election—the Legislature has used words, which, given their literal meaning, would impose impossible or absurd conditions. In such a case the literal meaning of the words must be rejected, and a meaning assigned to them expressive of the legislative intent, if such intent be plainly indicated to the court by consideration of the entire statute, or other statutes on the same or similar subjects, and by taking into view all the related facts and conditions.

Looking at the matter in this way we find that the General Assembly could not have intended the county board of commissioners to order the election when there was no such board; and that therefore "the said commissioners" who were ordered to hold the election must have been some board of commissioners already in existence, whose general organization and duties made it appropriate that it should have charge of an election. Such a board was the board of election commissioners already created under the statute establishing Dillon county. That act and the act providing for the necessary public buildings of the county were passed at the same session of the General Assembly, they related to the same subject, and therefore should be read and construed as far as possible as one statute. The former act had already provided that the board of election commissioners should hold an election for county officers on April 10, 1910. When the second act provided for an election on the question of the bond issue, it was doubtless intended that this should be one of the questions voted on at the same election—not that there should be two elections. Certainly it is very improbable that the General Assembly meant that there should be two sets of commissioners ordering and conducting two elections on the same day with different machinery. We think, when the whole subject is viewed in its entirety, it is not overstraining the meaning of words to hold that the General Assembly meant that the question of the bond issue should be submitted to the people on the same day and by the same commissioners, who were required to submit the question of the election of public officers. There can be no doubt that the General Assembly meant further that the election should be held in the county of Dillon, and that the qualified electors of the county should vote at their respective precincts; not that the election should be confined literally to the town of Dillon.

The election having been ordered and held by the board of election commissioners, in accordance with the statute as we interpret it, and having resulted in favor of the issue of bonds, there is no reason why the county board of commissioners should not turn over the bonds to the relators as the courthouse commission. But even if it be assumed that the statute directed the election to be ordered and held, not by the board of election commissioners, but by some other board, that would not make the election as held a nullity. It appears to have fairly conducted, after due notice, by officers who in good faith supposed that they were authorized to hold it; and there was no protest nor objection of any kind by the voters or taxpayers, either before or after the election. Under these circumstances an election held by de facto officers will be recognized as valid. The authorities so holding are cited in Wilson v. Cox, 73 S. C. 398, 53 S. E. 613.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that a writ of mandamus issue, requiring the county board of commissioners of Dillon county to issue and deliver to the courthouse commission county bonds, in accordance with the provisions of the statute.

STATE v. SPRINGFIELD.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 14, 1910.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1043*) — APPEAL — GROUND OF ERROR.

No other ground of error than that specified to the exclusion of evidence can be considered on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2654, 2655; Dec. Dig. § 1043.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in a homicide case, a ground of error to the exclusion of evidence is that the evidence was relevant to show apprehension on the part of the defendant of violence from deceased, any error in excluding the evidence is harmless; other and stronger evidence showing that fact being admitted without objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3146; Dec. Dig. § 1170.*]

Hydrick, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Greenville County; Chas. G. Dantzer, Judge.

Young Springfield was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for appellant. P. A. Bonham, Sol., for the State.

GARY, A. J. The following statement appears in the record: "The defendant was indicted, in the court of general sessions for Greenville county, for the murder of his father, Thomas Springfield, at Greenville, S. C., on December 30, 1908, tried before Judge Robert Aldrich and a jury at Greenville at September term, 1909; verdict, guilty of manslaughter. Sentence, two years at hard labor in the state penitentiary.

Upon the trial of the case the defendant offered testimony to show that shortly before he shot and killed the deceased, the deceased was in a drunken, turbulent humor; that he abused and beat his wife, the mother of the defendant; that he pressed a hatchet against her forehead, and threatened to kill her if she spoke; that he drew a gun upon her, and threatened to take her life. This testimony was excluded by the presiding judge, upon the ground that it was irrelevant."

The ground of error is thus specified: "This testimony was competent and relevant, upon the ground that the defendant had interposed a plea of self-defense; that he was entitled to prove every fact and circumstance connected with the conduct of the deceased occurring shortly before the fatal encounter, which was fairly calculated to create an apprehension for his own safety; that particular acts of violence were relevant to show an apprehension on the part of the defendant of violence from the deceased." No other ground of error can be considered.

Sam Johnson, a witness for the state, testified on cross-examination, that he had seen the deceased draw his pistol, and heard him threaten to kill the defendant; that the deceased was drinking some about 10 o'clock on the morning of the difficulty; that he had heard him threaten Mrs. Springfield, his wife, and say to her, with an oath, "today is your last." Mrs. M. E. Springfield, wife of the deceased, was asked the question: "What was his (her husband's) condition that day, do you know?" Her answer was: "Drinking as usual."

Zed Hall, a witness for the defendant, testified as follows: "Do you know whether or not you saw Mr. Springfield take a drink before the shooting? Yes, sir. Who with? Myself. * * * Was he drinking that day? Yes, sir. How long had you been with him? Several years. I asked Mr. Stroud, who testified, if you advised him to go from the store up to the house, and he said you did. Had you been to the house just before? Yes, sir. How long was that before the shooting? Was an hour and a half; something like that. I want to ask you, what was his condition, with reference to turbulence, and violence, the frame of mind which he was in, with reference to turbulence and violence at that time? Very rough. Was it in consequence of that you asked Stroud to go up there? Yes, sir. Was there anybody else at the store? Yes, sir. You had been called to the house? Yes, sir. That was the condition in which you found him when you went over there? Yes, sir. Did you ever hear Thomas Springfield threaten the life of Young? Yes, sir. Did you ever see him do bodily violence to him or bodily harm to him? I have seen him choke him. How much did he choke him? Choked him pretty bad." * * *

Elliot Batson, another witness for the defendant, thus testified: "I want you to state whether or not you ever heard Thomas Springfield admit that he had threatened the life of Young Springfield? Yes, sir; I heard him say that he threatened the life of Young Springfield, and said that he had reconsidered it, and that it would be too bad. That was during the time that he was gone, that he said 'I have reconsidered that.' I says: 'That would be too bad; never do anything like that.' I says: 'Young will come back after awhile,' and he says, 'I will whip him for it if it takes me 50 years.'"

Young Springfield, the defendant, testified as follows: "Did you know of the way your father had mistreated and beaten your mother? Yes, sir; been knowing it for years. You heard Mrs. Springfield, your Aunt Ella, talking about what he said. What did you say there? I didn't say what they said. I said that I was going for my gun, that I might need it; I didn't say anything about any killing. Did you say anything about your father had beaten your mother? Yes, sir. Where was your mother then; was she away from home then? Yes, sir. Did you go up there while she was there? Yes, sir. Did you advise her about conditions at home? Yes, sir. What was your father's condition when you went up there? Drunk and disorderly."

The foregoing not only shows that testimony similar to that which was excluded was introduced without objection, but that other and stronger testimony was admitted without objection, tending to show the hostile attitude of the deceased towards the prisoner, and rendering it necessary for the defendant to be on the alert against attack by the deceased.

Appeal dismissed

HYDRICK, J. (concurring). In view of the circumstances under which the testimony was excluded I think the first exception, which assigns error in excluding it, without specifying the purpose for which it should have been admitted, as the other exceptions do, is sufficient to require the consideration by this court of the question of its relevancy for any purpose. The rule that an exception must specify the error complained of does not require the assignment in the exception of the reasons in detail why the matter complained of is erroneous; for that is argument, which, in my opinion, should not, but too often does, incumber the exceptions, as a result of a too rigid construction of the rule.

The record shows that the testimony was excluded on the objection of the solicitor, without stating the ground of his objection; and the court promptly ruled it out on the ground that it was irrelevant. Counsel for the defendant were not requested by the court to show its relevancy, and, under rule 11 of the circuit court (33 S. E. viii), it would have been improper for them to have attempted to do so, without a request from the court. Therefore, I think this court should, under the first exception, consider whether the testimony was relevant; and, if so, whether its exclusion was prejudicial.

Under the plea of self-defense, the defendant had the right to introduce any testimony which tended to show that immediately before the fatal encounter deceased was in a vicious humor not only towards the defendant himself, but also toward others, for that tended to throw light upon the question, who was at fault in bringing on the difficulty, which was of vital importance. That is one reason for the admission of evidence of uncommunicated threats against the defendant (State v. Falle, 43 S. C. 61, 20 S. E. 798) and of the general behavior of the accused, immediately before the difficulty, in such cases. State v. Thrailkill, 71 S. C. 140, 50 S. E. 551; State v. Miller, 73 S. C. 277, 53 S. E. 426, 114 Am. St. Rep. 82.

But, in this case, the verdict could not have been based on the finding that the defendant was at fault in bringing on the difficulty, for all the testimony, both on the part of the state and of the defense, pointed beyond all doubt to the fact that the attack upon the defendant was unprovoked by him. For that reason, I concur in affirming the judgment.

HERBERT v. PARHAM.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 284*) — BOTTLING — DANGER NOT INHERENT.

Employment in labeling bottles of beverage charged with carbonic acid gas is not dangerous as a matter of law, through their likelihood to explode while being handled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; C. G. Dantzler, Judge.

Action by James M. S. Herbert against C. W. Parham. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Huger & Wilbur, for appellant. Nathans & Sinkler, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the negligence of the defendant. The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions under consideration, are as follows: "That on or about the 10th day of August, 1908, the defendant, C. W. Parham, employed the plaintiff, James M. S. Herbert, a youth of tender years, to wit, 12 years of age, to label the bottles containing the beverage or drink called pepsi-cola and other beverages, which said employment was dangerous, in that, in the event the bottles were defective in construction, they were liable to explode after being charged with the said beverage, which danger was well known to the defendant, but unknown to the plaintiff. That on the 11th day of August, 1908, the first day after entering upon said employment, the defendant, knowing the dangerous character of said employment aforesaid, and knowing the youth and inexperience of said plaintiff, negligently, carelessly, and in disregard of the plaintiff's safety, furnished to the plaintiff to be labeled, in performance of his duties, a bottle defective in construction containing said beverage, which bottle, by reason of its defective construction, was unable to withstand the pressure of the gases with which it was charged, and, while being labeled by the plaintiff, exploded in his hands, and a piece of glass struck this plaintiff in his left eye, injuring the same severely and seriously impairing his vision."

The defendant denied the allegations of negligence, and set up the defense of contributory negligence, in which it was alleged that the plaintiff was injured "through his own misconduct, in willfully striking bottles together, after being warned and cautioned not to do so." At the close of the plaintiff's testimony the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, on the following grounds: "It is not proved that the defendant was negligent. It is not proved that the bottle was defective in construction, nor that defendant failed to use reasonable care in selecting and furnishing said bottle to the plaintiff. It is not proved that the defendant knew of any defect in construction, or ought to have known of any such defect. It is not proved that defendant failed to give any adequate warning, under the circumstances of the case. But, even if defendant had failed to give a proper warning, it is not proved that that failure was the operating or proximate cause of the injury. It is not proved that the defendant failed in any duty or care. There is no evidence to support the allegations of the complaint." This motion, as also a motion to direct a verdict, and for a new trial, were refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $900, and the plaintiff appealed.

The analysis of the complaint shows that the plaintiff relies upon the following facts to establish negligence on the part of the defendant: (1) That the work of labeling the bottles was inherently dangerous; (2) that the danger, which was known to the defendant, but unknown to the plaintiff, arose from the fact that, if the bottles were defective, they were liable to explode after being charged; (3) that the defendant, with knowledge of the plaintiff's inexperience, negligently furnished a bottle to be labeled which was defective; but it is not alleged that the defendant had knowledge of the defect.

The first question that will be considered is whether the labeling of the bottles was inherently dangerous. The plaintiff did not introduce any testimony tending to prove that there was danger, other than that arising from the bursting of the bottle, and in his testimony he admitted (which fact we desire to emphasize) that the defendant had warned him against the danger of breaking the bottles by striking them together. He also testified that the defendant showed him how to label the bottles. There is no doubt that the work of labeling bottles charged with pepsi-cola is attended with some danger; but the further question arises whether the danger is such as the law recognizes when the action is based on negligence. In Minnier v. Sedalia, W. & S. W. R. Co., 167 Mo. 112, 66 S. W. 1078, the rule is thus stated: "Absolute safety is unattainable, and employers are not insurers. They are liable for the consequences, not of danger, but of negligence; and the unbending test of methods, machinery, and appliances is the ordinary usage of the business. No man is held by law to a higher degree of skill than the fair average of his profession or trade; and the standard of due care is the conduct of the average prudent man."

It was held in Brands v. St. Louis Car Co., 213 Mo. 698, 112 S. W. 511, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 701, that a master is not negligent in failing to warn an employé of the danger of an explosion of an emery wheel, at which he is set to work, where the danger of explosion is so slight as to relieve him of the charge of negligence in furnishing such wheel. The court therein uses this language: "The second proposition is that the defendant, with actual knowledge that emery wheels were liable to explode, was negligent in not warning plaintiff of the danger incident to the working with emery wheels. But, if we are right that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant in using the said straight emery wheel, then in general use, and no testimony that such wheels were so inherently liable to break up as to require defendant to take notice that they were dangerous, it cannot be said, we think, that the defendant had actual knowledge that such wheels were inherently dangerous. The plain-tiff's own testimony demonstrates that he was directed how to work this machine, and it is not pretended that the wheel broke on account of any misuse of the same by plaintiff; and hence the fact that plaintiff was not told that emery wheels did not explode or break in some instances in no wise contributed to cause this particular one to break or explode. The mere failure to inform plaintiff that emery wheels will explode at times had nothing to do with causing this emery wheel to explode, and, had he been told that emery wheels at long intervals had been known to explode, it could not in any manner have lessened the likelihood of explosion, in this case."

In the case of Melchert v. Smith Brewing Co., 140 Pa. 448, 21 Atl. 755, which was an action for personal injuries, it appeared that the plaintiff, while at work in the defendant's brewery, transferring bottled ale from shelves into boxes, was injured by the breaking of a bottle, and it was held that the court properly refused to submit the defendant's negligence to the jury. The court used this language in that case: "The plaintiff sought to establish negligence by the defendant upon the theory that the plaintiff was put to work involving latent dangers, and it was the defendant's duty to give the plaintiff warning of the danger. The difficulty with this part of the case is, if anything, more serious than the part we have been considering. It certainly cannot be said that a service of merely removing bottles containing ale from shelves to boxes is a dangerous service in itself. In the ordinary case in which this duty is held to arise, as Rummel v. Dilworth, etc., Co., 131 Pa. 509, 19 Atl. 345, 346, 17 Am. St. Rep. 827, the employment of young and inexperienced persons to work amidst dangerous machinery is the subject of consideration, and in rare instances, as that was, it is held that such a duty is imposed upon the employer. But that case is in no sense applicable to the facts of this case. Here the service was of the most simple and apparently harmless character, and the attempt to prove that there was in point of fact a latent danger was altogether unsuccessful. * * * This kind of liability is a very refined one, at best, and the essential fact of the existence of the alleged latent danger as the source of a consequent duty as to information must necessarily be clearly established, before any charge of negligence in that respect can be sustained."

These views are in accord with our own cases of Hicks v. Sumter Mills, 39 S. C. 39, 17 S. E. 509; Gentry v. Railway, 66 S. C. 256, 44 S. E. 728; Edgens v. Manufacturing Co., 69 S. C. 529, 48 S. E. 538; Green v. Railway, 72 S. C. 398, 52 S. E. 45; Green v. Power Co., 75 S. C. 102, 55 S. E. 125. Having reached the conclusion that the labeling of the bottles was not dangerous in the eyes of the law, it was error to refuse the motion for nonsuit.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

WHISONANT v. ATLANTA & CHARLOTTE AIR LINE RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 13, 1910.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Where there was no direct and positive testimony tending to sustain the allegations of negligence of a master, but there were facts and circumstances from which the jury might properly draw inferences in favor of some of the acts of negligence specified, there was no error in refusing motion for nonsuit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1001; Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 182*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS.

Const. art. 9, § 15, providing that, every employé of any railroad corporation shall have the same rights and remedies for any injury suffered by him, from the acts or omissions of said corporations or its employes, allowed by law to persons not employes, when the injury results from the negligence of a superior agent or officer or of a person having a right to control or direct the services of the party injured, applies to a servant working as an assistant car repairer and workman about the yards and tracks of a railroad company, while working underneath a defective and overloaded car, under the directions of one in charge of the repairs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 372; Dec. Dig. § 182.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 288, 289*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Where, in an action by a servant for personal injuries, the facts were susceptible of more than one inference as to contributory negligence and assumption of risk, the case presents questions for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068, 1089; Dec. Dig. §§ 288, 289.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—KNOWLEDGE.

Const. art. 9, § 15, providing that knowledge by an employé injured by defective machinery, ways, or appliances, "shall be no defense" to an action for injury caused thereby, means that the action shall not be defeated by reason of the servant's knowledge, and it is not ground for nonsuit that the plaintiff operated voluntarily a defective appliance, after knowledge of its unsafe character.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 583; Dec. Dig. § 217.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Cherokee County; J. W. De Vose, Judge.

Action by Sallie L. Whisonant, as Administratrix, against the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sanders & De Pass, for appellant. N. W. Hardin and G. W. Speer, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained on account of the wrongful acts of the defendant, in causing the death of plaintiff's intestate.

The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions involved are as follows: "That on said ——— day of January, 1907, and before, plaintiff's said intestate was employed by said lessee company in and about the yard and tracks of the defendant company at Blacksburg, S. C., as an assistant car repairer and workman, and was on said date by the wrongful acts, neglect, and default, by the negligent, careless, wanton, and willful conduct and acts of the servants and employees of the defendant and defendant's lessee, injured so that he died on the ——— day of January, 1907, the wrongful acts, neglect, and default, negligence, and willfulness being that on the said date a very heavy and large gondola car, which had been disabled and injured seriously in a wreck on said road, in a collision near Broad River bridge, which was left in its broken, defective, and overloaded condition on the side tracks at Blacksburg, so badly overloaded and out of repair that it was dangerous to repair the same with the tools and appliances in the hands of plaintiff's intestate, who was ordered to repair same, but declined to do so on account of its condition, and because he was not supplied with jacks and other tools large enough to do the repairs in safety and with due care, whereupon a foreman was sent from the shops of said lessee at Spencer, N. C., with jacks and tools that were represented to be sound and sufficient to do the work with safety; that said foreman and 'boss' proceeded to repair the said defective and overloaded car as foreman, by constructing a foundation on insecure grounds, defective material, and with incompetent cormen, and attempted to jack up said car, for the purpose of making said repairs with jacks that, under the circumstances, with the material used, were too light for the work to be done; that when said gondola car was jacked up for repairs, plaintiff's intestate was ordered under said car to make the repairs, and while he was under the car at work, on account of the defective and insecure foundation, defective and improper material used in jacking up said car, weak and defective jacks, and incompetent servants who were helping in the work, the said foundation, material, and jacks suddenly and unexpectedly gave way, the gondola car fell upon plaintiff's intestate, and his skull was crushed between parts of the car, and was otherwise injured, from which he died, all of which was due to the negligent and willful conduct of the servants in charge of said work.

The specific acts of negligence herein alleged are: (a) Insecure foundation; (b) defective material in foundation, and jacking up the injured car; (c) weak, defective, and inefficient jacks; (d) incompetent servants; and (e) an unsafe place to work." The defendant denied all the allegations of the complaint, except the corporate existence of the defendant, and set up the defenses of assumption of risk, contributory negligence, and negligence of a fellow servant.

At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the following grounds: "First, that there is a total failure under the evidence to show any negligence, as alleged in the complaint; second, that if there is any evidence of negligence the evidence is that Mr. Whisonant's negligence combined with it as a proximate cause, and that he was guilty of contributory negligence; third, that if there was any negligence it was the negligence of a fellow servant in the same department of labor, and that Whisonant assumed the risk of that; fourth, that his injuries were caused by one of the dangers incident to his employment which was assumed by the deceased."

This motion was refused, and at the conclusion of the entire testimony, the defendant made a motion to direct a verdict on the same grounds, on which it had made a motion for a nonsuit. This motion was refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $2,500, and the defendant appealed.

The first question that will be considered is whether there was error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in refusing the motion for nonsuit. While it may be conceded there was no direct and positive testimony tending to sustain the allegations of negligence, still there were facts and circumstances from which the jury might properly have drawn the inference in favor of some of the acts of negligence specified in the complaint. The rule is thus stated in Railroad v. Partlow, 14 Rich. Law, 237 (affirmed in Dantzler v. Cox, 75 S. C. 334, 55 S. E. 774, Wertz v. Ry., 76 S. C. 388, 57 S. E. 194, and State v. Rodman, 68 S. E. 343): "It may be that no one of the facts would, of itself, warrant the inference, and yet, when taken together, they may produce belief, which is the object of all evidence." In 1 Greenl. Ev. § 51a, it is said: "It is not necessary that the evidence should bear directly upon the issue. It is admissible if it tends to prove the issue, or constitutes a link in the chain of proof; although alone, it might not justify a verdict in accordance with it. All the circumstances mentioned in this ground may be regarded as links in the chain of proof, from which the jury might deduce the inference of defendants' privity and direction, in the acts of trespass. This is usually the case where an issue depends on circumstantial evidence.

Without undertaking to state the circumstances in detail, we have reached the conclusion that there was testimony tending to prove that plaintiff's intestate was killed while assisting Hedricks, the foreman or

"boss," to repair the car; that Hedricks was his superior officer at the time, and had the right to direct and control his services; that at the time of the injury, he was performing his duty under the directions and orders of Hedricks, and his death was the direct and proximate result of such orders; that the foundation for the jacks was insecure, and the defendant, through Hedricks, its agent, failed to provide a safe place for Whilsonant to work.

The next question for consideration is whether the nonsuit should have been granted, or the verdict directed for the defendant, on the ground that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. In the case of Hallums v. Ry., 82 S. C. 299, 64 S. E. 147, it was held that article 9, § 15, of the Constitution, providing that "every employé of any railroad corporation, shall have the same rights and remedies, for any injury suffered by him, from the acts or omissions of said corporations or its employés, allowed by law to persons not employés, when the injury results from the negligence of a superior agent or officer or of a person having a right to control or direct the services of the party injured," applies to a section hand in the employment of a railroad corporation. It is the duty of the section hands to keep the track in proper repair, and free from obstacles that might endanger the safety of the trains passing over it; such, for instance, as the wreckage arising from the giving way of a defective car. And, it was the duty of Hedricks, and those whose services he had the right to control and direct, to repair the car, in order that it might be operated safely over the track. One of the risks of operating a defective car is not only to endanger the lives of the employés and the traveling public, but to injure the track itself. We are therefore unable to discover any difference in principle between this case and that of Hallums v. Ry., 82 S. C. 299, 64 S. E. 147, and the reasoning therein is, in all respects, applicable to the case under consideration. See, also, Rippy v. Ry., 80 S. C. 539, 61 S. E. 976, 1010, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 601, and note to Dunn v. Ry., 8 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 232.

The last question to be considered is whether there was error in refusing to grant the nonsuits, or direct a verdict in favor of the defendant, on the grounds that the injury was caused by contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, or that the risk was one which he assumed. The facts were susceptible of more than one inference, and therefore presented a question for the jury. Youngblood v. Ry., 60 S. C. 9, 38 S. E. 232, 85 Am. St. Rep. 824. But in the last-mentioned case, another reason is assigned why the said defenses could not defeat the plaintiff's right of recovery.

"Section 15, art. 9, of the Constitution, sets at rest any doubts that might be entertained on this question. It provides that 'knowledge by an employé injured of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, or appliances, shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby, except as to the conductors or engineers, in charge of dangerous or unsafe cars or engines, voluntarily operated by them.' In other words, where an employé is injured while voluntarily operating machinery, after knowledge of its unsafe condition, his action for injury caused thereby shall not be defeated by reason of this fact. The word 'defense,' is not used in its technical sense. The words, 'shall be no defense to an action,' are to be understood as meaning, 'shall not defeat an action.' The Constitution did not intend to deal with pleadings, but with a principle of law. It did not intend that a defendant, on a motion for nonsuit, should get the benefit of a state of facts, which the Constitution declared should be no defense of the action. The object of this provision was to take from a defendant that failed to furnish suitable machinery the right to defeat an action by the employé, by showing that he did not act with due care in voluntarily operating the machinery, after knowledge of its defective condition. The only ground of the motion for nonsuit was the fact that the plaintiff operated voluntarily the defective appliances, after knowledge of their unsafe character, which we have shown could not defeat the plaintiff's action."

The foregoing disposes of all questions argued by the appellant's attorneys.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

STATE v. VAN BUREN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 13, 1910.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 198, 369*) — FORMER JEOPARDY—ACQUITTAL—EVIDENCE.

Acquittal under an indictment for practicing medicine without a license on two specified dates by prescribing for unnamed persons does not bar a subsequent indictment for unlawful practice by prescribing for and treating a specified person on a specified day between such dates, since, because the first indictment failed to specify the places of the offenses and the names of the patients, it was necessary under it to prove the dates as alleged, but evidence of offenses on those dates is inadmissible under the second indictment.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 196*)—FORMER JEOPARDY.

A test whether two indictments charge the same offense, as affecting a plea of former jeopardy, is whether the evidence necessary to support the second indictment would have sustained a conviction under the first.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Richland County; G. E. Prince, Judge.

H. Van Buren was indicted for practicing medicine without a license, and the State appeals from a judgment sustaining a plea of former acquittal. Reversed.

Wade Hampton Cobb, Sol., for the State.
James S. Verner, for the respondent.

WOODS, J. The defendant was indicted for practicing medicine without the license required by statute. The circuit court, without submitting the issue to the jury, sustained the plea of former jeopardy and acquittal, and the state appeals.

The portion of the first indictment material to the issue was: " * * * The jurors of and for the county aforesaid, in the state aforesaid, upon their oath present: That H. Van Buren, * * * on the fifth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eight, * * * did practice medicine, in that he, the said Van Buren, did prescribe for the physical ailment of another. * * * And * * * that H. Van Buren, on the tenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eight, * * * did practice medicine, in that he, the said Van Buren, did prescribe for a physical ailment of another. * * * " On this indictment the defendant was tried and acquitted. The second indictment charged: " * * * The jurors of and for the county aforesaid, in the state aforesaid, upon their oath present that H. Van Buren, * * * on the 28th day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eight, * * * did unlawfully practice medicine by prescribing for the physical ailments of Mary Crim and by treating the physical ailments of the said Mary Crim. * * * " The statute contemplates that every violation of its provisions shall be a separate offense. The question is whether it appeared from the face of the indictment that the offenses charged were the same, so that an acquittal under the first indictment would be a bar to a trial under the second.

It will be observed that the charge in the first indictment is entirely indefinite, except as to the time. No person or place is mentioned, and no circumstances or particular description, except the dates of the alleged offenses. For this reason the time mentioned was a material part of the description of the offense, and it was necessary to prove the dates as alleged. The court says, in State v. Reynolds, 48 S. C. 384, 26 S. E. 679: "It is well settled that it is not necessary to prove the precise day, or even year, laid in the indictment, except where time enters into the nature of the offense, or is made part of the description of it. State v. Anderson, 3 Rich. Law, 176; State v. Porter, 10 Rich. Law, 148; State v. Branham, 13 S. C. 392." The state, therefore, on the trial under this indictment, was limited in its proof to showing that the defendant practiced medicine without a license on the 10th day of October, 1908, and the 5th of November, 1908. This being so, it seems perfectly clear that the defendant was never tried and was never acquitted of any charge except that of practicing medicine without a license on the days named. Whether he had practiced medicine on other days in violation of the statute, not being a question in issue, could not have been decided. The test laid down as useful and generally adequate, though not infallible, by which it may be decided whether two indictments charge the same offense, is: "Would the evidence necessary to support the second indictment have been sufficient to procure a legal conviction upon the first?" State v. Glasgow, Dud. 42; State v. Thurston, 2 McM. 395; State v. Switzer, 65 S. C. 187, 43 S. E. 513; State v. Dewees, 76 S. C. 72, 56 S. E. 674.

Apply this test. Obviously evidence necessary to support the second indictment, charging the practice of medicine without a license by prescribing for the physical ailments of Mary Crim on the 28th day of October, 1908, could have been introduced which would have been entirely insufficient to produce conviction upon the first indictment; for no evidence would have supported the first indictment except evidence of practicing medicine on the days therein named, while the evidence necessary to support the second indictment could well have been of practicing medicine by prescribing for Mary Crim on other days than those to which the first indictment was confined. The circuit court, therefore, erred in laying down as a legal inference that the second indictment necessarily charged the same offense as the first. On the trial upon the second indictment no evidence of practicing medicine without a license on the days named in the first indictment will be admissible, because the defendant has already been tried for those alleged offenses and acquitted; but he has not been tried for a like offense committed at any other time, and therefore the first trial and acquittal is ineffectual as a plea against the charge alleged in the second indictment to have been committed at a different time. This conclusion is in accord with the principle laid down in the cases in this state above cited, and the precise point has been so decided by other courts of high authority. State v. Blanut, 48 Ark. 34, 2 S. W. 190; Commonwealth v. Hanley, 140 Mass. 457, 5 N. E. 468; People v. Gault, 104 Mich. 575, 62 N. W. 724; 12 Cyc. 281.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

A. No; they have a block and they take them on that block, and ship them out; it is the standard thing. Q. But the only difference was the equipment of the lenses and shutters and the rheostat? A. Yes, sir."

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $73, and the defendant appealed.

The first exception is as follows: "That his honor erred in allowing W. P. Dowling, the plaintiff, to testify over the objection of the defendant, as to the contents of an alleged lost letter, written subsequent to the alleged contract, to establish the existence of the contract sued upon. Whereas, it is respectfully submitted, that under the provisions of the statute of frauds, his honor should have held that the letter should have been produced, and that secondary evidence of its contents was not admissible to establish the existence and the production of a written memorandum of the sale, made at the time."

This exception cannot be sustained for the following reasons: (1) Oral evidence as to the contents of the letter was admitted without objection. (2) When plaintiff offered to introduce a copy of the letter in evidence, the defendant did not specify the grounds, but merely interposed a general objection. This was not sufficient. Allen v. Cooley, 53 S. C. 77, 30 S. E. 721. (3) There was other testimony introduced without objection, sustaining the allegations of the complaint. (4) The answer of the defendant not only failed to deny, but admitted, the contract. "Having acknowledged the agreement, the court considers it such an assent in writing, as overrules his plea of the statute of frauds." Smith v. Brallsford, 1 Desaus. 350.

The second exception was withdrawn. The remaining exceptions will be considered together and are as follows: Third. "That his honor erred in refusing to charge the jury the fourth request of the defendant, to wit: 'The jury is instructed that in order to recover any damages for an alleged breach of contract, the plaintiff must establish by the preponderance of the evidence, if the contract be for the sale and delivery of goods, wares, and merchandise for the price of $50 and upwards, that the said contract was in writing, or that the buyer received part of the goods so sold, or paid something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment, or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain was made and signed by the parties to be charged by such contract, or their agents thereunto lawfully authorized.'" Fourth. "His honor erred in refusing to charge the seventh request of the defendant, to wit: 'The jury is instructed that the mere fact that goods are not, at the time of making the contract, in the condition in which they are to be delivered does not take the case out of the statute, and that if the bargain be to deliver certain goods of a certain description at a future time, and they are not existing at the time of the contract, but the seller does not stipulate to manufacture them himself, or a particular person to do so, the contract is within the statute.'"

In regard to the request mentioned in the third of these exceptions, his honor, the presiding judge, said: "I refuse to charge you that, gentlemen, in this particular case, because I have virtually covered, in my own language, the law in regard to the statute of frauds here, which I conceive to be applicable to this case." He refused the other request without comment. In his general charge the presiding judge instructed the jury as follows:

"Now for the purposes of this case, I charge you, that in order to enter into a valid contract for the purchase of goods, over or above the value of fifty dollars ($50), that the contract is required by law to be in writing. * * * Now I charge you further that where the goods to be delivered are to be manufactured, and that is a part of the contract, that the goods are to be manufactured and then delivered, that would take it out of the statute of frauds, and the party would be entitled to recover under a contract of that sort. * * * So I charge you that if the machine, described in this complaint here, was to be manufactured or any extensive part of it was to be manufactured, out of the ordinary run of machines of that class, if the amount of work to be done on it was an important item in the case, I charge you that such a contract as that would not have to be in writing; but if there was just a slight change to be made in it, it didn't have to be manufactured, such a slight change to be in the way of work and labor that it would not make an item in the cost of the machine, why, under those circumstances, a contract of that sort would have to be in writing. Now you understand, Mr. Foreman, that where the goods are to be manufactured, where there is to be work and labor performed on them, to such an extent as to cause that labor and work to enter considerably into the cost and price of the goods or the machine, if that was the contract, it would not have to be in writing, if the goods or the articles didn't have to be manufactured, and yet there might be still a little work or labor to be performed, or a little change to be made, which would not enter into the cost of the articles, then a contract of that sort, would have to be in writing."

The ruling of the circuit judge is sustained by the case of Bird v. Muhlinbrink, 1 Rich. Law, 199, 44 Am. Dec. 247, in which it was held that the fourteenth section of the statute of frauds extends to contracts executory, as well as to contracts executed, for the sale of goods above the value of $50, which exist in solido at the time of the contract. But if the contract is for the sale of goods in futuro, which are not in existence at the time, and for work and labor to be bestowed upon them by the vendor, or procured at his expense, so as to make the work and labor the essential consideration of the contract, it is not within the statute of frauds. Also, by the case of Gadsden v. Lance, McMul. Eq. 87, 37 Am. Dec. 548, in which it is said that "It is now the settled rule that when the goods contracted for exist in solido, and are capable of delivery at the time, it is within the statute; but where they are to be made, or something is to be done, to put them in a condition to be delivered, according to the terms of the contract, it is not within the statute."

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

(86 S. C. 220)

STATE v. BOYER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 7, 1910.)

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 232*)—UNLAWFUL DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY—EVIDENCE—CONFORMITY TO INDICTMENT.

Evidence of a chattel mortgage signed by defendant, and another individually by a company and by defendant as manager, and another mortgage signed by the company and by defendant individually and as treasurer, both mortgages being given to secure the company's notes, was proper under an indictment for disposing of property covered by chattel mortgages, executed by defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 487; Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 234*)—UNLAWFUL DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a trial for disposing of mortgaged products an instruction that accused was guilty if he disposed of the products with intent to defeat the lien, without the mortgagee bank's consent, and failed to deposit the proceeds, was not improper as conflicting with provisions of the mortgages that on sales with drafts and bills of lading attached the drafts should be handled by the bank with permission to apply the proceeds to the debt, and that the mortgagor might remain in possession, until default or attempt to dispose of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 495; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

3. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 232*)—UNLAWFUL DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY.

In a trial for disposing of products covered by two chattel mortgages, acquittal was not warranted by want of proof of unlawful disposition under one of the mortgages, where there was evidence tending to show unlawful disposition under the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 487; Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

4. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 234*)—UNLAWFUL DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

Under the evidence in a trial for disposing of mortgaged products, held proper to refuse to direct an acquittal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 495; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

5. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 230*)—"UNLAWFUL DISPOSITION OF MORTGAGED GOODS"—PROOF REQUIRED.

To constitute an unlawful disposition of mortgaged goods, they need not be taken beyond the state, nor with intent to defeat the lien, disposal with notice of the lien without the lienor's written consent and without payment or deposit as required by statute being sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 489; Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

6. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 233*)—UNLAWFUL DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to sustain a conviction of unlawfully disposing of mortgaged cotton products.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 494; Dec. Dig. § 233.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lee County; T. S. Sease, Judge.

J. R. C. Boyer was convicted of disposing of property under lien, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank G. Tompkins, for appellant. Solicitor P. H. Stoll and J. B. McLaughlin, for the State.

JONES, C. J. The defendant was convicted and sentenced under an indictment for disposing of property under lien in violation of section 337 of the Criminal Code. The indictment describes the lien covering the property as "certain chattel mortgages in favor of the Bank of Bishopville and the Farmer's Loan & Trust Company, corporations duly chartered by law, made and duly executed by J. R. C. Boyer to secure the payment of $5,000."

In support of this allegation the court, over objection, permitted the state, after proof of execution, to offer in evidence a chattel mortgage dated October 21, 1908, executed by W. Newton Smith, individually, and Bishopville Oil Mill Company, J. R. C. Boyer, individually, J. R. C. Boyer, manager, to the Bank of Bishopville to secure the payment of a note of the Bishopville Oil Mill for $4,000, payable January 1, 1909, on all the cotton seed now on hand and hereafter purchased, or otherwise acquired during the season of 1908-1909, and also all the products of every kind and description manufactured therefrom; also another chattel mortgage dated November 7, 1908, executed by Bishopville Oil Mill, J. R. C. Boyer, treasurer, and J. R. C. Boyer, individually, to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company to secure a note of the Bishopville Oil Mill for $1,000, payable January 1, 1909, on "60 tons of good merchantable cotton seed now stored in our seedhouse in Bishopville."

Exception is taken to the admission of these mortgages in evidence on the ground that they were not the same as charged in the indictment. This exception was not pressed in argument, and cannot be sustained, as the testimony was responsive to the indictment.

The second exception alleges error in the following portion of the charge: "Still, if the defendant, however, disposed of the products of that mill in such way and in such manner that the jury is convinced that he did it with the intention to defeat the proposed lien, then, if he failed to have the written consent of the bank, and failed to deposit the amount here within 10 days, then he would be guilty under the law." The error assigned is "that said charge is in conflict with the terms of the mortgage which gave the defendant the right to sell or dispose of the products of the mill, and his honor, the presiding judge, should have charged that the said mortgage, covering the products proved to have been shipped by the defendant, gave written consent for him to sell and dispose of the said products; the construction of said mortgage being a matter of law for the court, and not a matter of fact for the jury."

The mortgage, dated October 21, 1908, contains this stipulation: "It is agreed that whenever any of said manufactured products are sold or disposed of, subject to drafts with bills of lading attached, said drafts shall be deposited with and handled by the mortgagee, and so much of said proceeds as may be necessary to pay said note may be applied to the payment of the same, as may be determined by said bank, without any additional agreement or further consent on the part of mortgagors." No other stipulation appears which might be construed as a written consent to sell or dispose of the mortgaged property, but this applies only to sales with drafts and bills of lading attached, and it is not contended that in this case the sale or disposal was made in such manner.

The mortgage of November 7, 1908, does not contain the provision last above quoted. Both mortgages, however, contain a provision: "That said mortgagor may retain possession of said goods and chattels until default be made in the payment of the said note, but if the same is not paid when due, or if before the said note is due, the said mortgagor shall attempt to make way with or remove said goods and chattels, or any part thereof, from the place where they now are, or abuse or not properly care for said property, then, and in either event, the said mortgagee, or its agent, shall have the right, without suit or process, to take possession of the said goods and chattels, wherever they may be found, and may sell the same, etc." Hence it is manifest this exception cannot be sustained.

The third exception is as follows: 8. In that his honor, the presiding judge, refused to charge defendant's first request; the evidence of Mr. Scarborough and the defendant showing that they construed the mortgage to give the defendant the right to sell and dispose of the property so sold or disposed, and there being no other evidence showing the sale or the disposal of the cotton seed covered by the mortgage to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, the jury should have been instructed to bring in a verdict of "not guilty."

The first request was in these words: "1. The jury is instructed that under the testimony submitted by the plaintiff, consisting of the four thousand ($4,000) dollar mortgage given by the Bishopville Oil Mill and J. R. C. Boyer to the Bank of Bishopville, and the evidence of Mr. Scarborough, cashier of said bank, the contract embodied in the mortgage and explained by him shows that it was not the purpose of said mortgagor or said contract to prevent a sale or disposal of the products of the said mill in the regular course of business, and no testimony having been submitted showing a sale or disposal of the seed covered by the mortgage of the Loan & Trust Company, the jury is instructed to bring in a verdict of not guilty." For the purpose of this exception it may be conceded that there was no testimony that the cotton seed or products thereof, covered by the mortgage to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company were sold or disposed of contrary to statute, but as there was some testimony of a disposal by defendant of the property covered by the mortgage of the Bank of Bishopville, contrary to the provisions of the statute, it was proper to refuse to direct a verdict of acquittal.

The testimony of Mr. Scarborough who was cashier of the Bank of Bishopville on this point was as follows: "Q. Now, Mr. Scarborough, at the time you took this mortgage, did you intend that the Bishopville Oil Mill should sell these products after they were manufactured? A. Yes, sir. Q. Or did you propose that they should keep them until you got ready to foreclose that mortgage? A. We had no objection to disposing of the property. Q. To sell these products, did you require a part of the money paid on those products, a proportionate amount as they got it in? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that was the understanding of the contract expressed in this mortgage that they drew on people for money; they must draw on them through your bank, and you reserved the right to keep as much as you thought fair and apply it to their debt? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you did not have any objection to their making a small sale or shipment when they did not draw with bill of lading attached? A. We had no objection, if it was not a very large amount. Q. You had no objection to selling a reasonable amount? A. Yes, sir."

The testimony of defendant Boyer on this point was as follows: "Q. What had been the custom between you and Mr. Scarborough as to your selling products of the mill other than oil? A. They had no objection to us selling anything at all. We sold meal and hulls, and oil stuff right along. Q. Did he require you to return the money to him for those sales? A. Yes, sir; we deposited the drafts; when we made drafts we deposited them in his bank. Q. And when the draft came back what was done with the money? A. He took out what money he thought was right in his judgment to take out and apply to the mortgage, and left us to take the balance and operate with. * * * Q. And you were selling right along the meal and hulls to the farmers here? A. Yes, sir. Q. And was expected to turn that over to the bank, and make your payments, was what they thought necessary? A. Yes, sir."

* * * Q. This contract between you and Mr. Scarborough, was that construed by you all or understanding to give you written permission to dispose of the products? A. Yes, sir; most certainly. We did not go to him every time we wanted to make a sale. Q. This mortgage gave you the right? A. Yes, sir; that was the understanding at the time, and I think he so understood it."

The foregoing testimony was not sufficient to authorize direction of verdict. The testimony upon which the state relied was to the effect that about the 1st of December, 1908, the defendant shipped from the Bishopville Oil Mill at Bishopville, Lee county, S. C., to Cross Hill Mill at Cross Hill, Laurens county, S. C., in two car load shipments, 600 sacks of cotton seed meal, worth $1.25 per sack, and 20 tons of hulls, worth $5 per ton, that said property was subject to the lien of the mortgage to the Bank of Bishopville, that the property was disposed of without the written consent of the mortgagee, and defendant failed to pay the debt secured by the mortgage within 10 days after said disposal, and failed to deposit the amount of the debt with the clerk of court of common pleas. There was testimony that practically the same persons were stockholders of both mills, although each was incorporated, and that defendant Boyer was treasurer of both mills and manager of the Bishopville mill. The defendant testified that the meal and hulls were consigned to the Cross Hill Mill to be used by that mill in its business, and the money to be paid to the Bishopville Mill, that no price was fixed and no time was fixed for payment, and that no charge was made therefor on the books of the Bishopville Mill, and no bill of lading with draft was issued, as it was shipped out on consignment.

It further appeared that the Baileys of Clinton, S. C., had a mortgage on similar property of the Cross Hill Mill, and when the meal and hulls from the Bishopville Mill entered the Cross Hill Mill the Baileys claimed that the property became subject to their mortgage, and declined to permit its reshipment to the Bishopville Mill. Notwithstanding instructions from the Bank of Bishopville to have the meal and hulls sent back to the Bishopville Mill, the defendant Boyer refused to carry out the instruction, giving as his reason for not doing so that he had got into trouble for shipping the property from the Bishopville Mill and did not care to get into further trouble. The result was that the property was never returned to the Bishopville Mill and was never paid for by the Cross Hill Mill, although disposed of by that mill, and the lien thereon defeated.

The fourth, sixth, and seventh exceptions allege error in refusing to charge that if the goods were not sold, the removal, in order to constitute a disposal, must be without the state, with the purpose or necessary effect of defeating the lien. The court committed no error. As this case does not require a consideration of the effect of a removal of property under lien beyond the limits of the state, we need not refer to the cases of State v. Rice, 43 S. C. 200, 20 S. E. 986, and State v. Haynes, 74 S. C. 450, 55 S. E. 118. The case presented here is a disposition of property under a lien within the state. It was not essential for the state to show that the property was disposed of with intent to defeat the lien. State v. Reeder, 36 S. C. 497, 15 S. E. 544. It is sufficient to show that the property under lien was sold or disposed of by one with notice of the lien, without the written consent of the lienor, and without payment or deposit as required by the statute. Nor is the case as made by the state a mere removal of the property under lien from one county to another, which might be done under circumstances not affecting the lien and might not be in violation of the statute (Whaley v. Lawton, 57 S. C. 264, 35 S. E. 558), but testimony was offered from which a jury might infer a sale or disposition in violation of the statute.

Appellant declines to argue the fifth exception.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

(36 S. C. 280)

TOWN OF BRANCHVILLE v. FELDER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 216*)—PRELIMINARY WARRANT—NECESSITY.

Where there is nothing to indicate that the offense was committed in the presence of the officer who made the arrest, or that there were such circumstances of emergency as to justify an arrest without a warrant, defendant was entitled to demand that a warrant be issued before trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 435-438; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 238*)—PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION—STATEMENTS OF WITNESS—SIGNATURE.

Defendant may waive the requirement of the statute that witnesses should sign their statements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 489-491; Dec. Dig. § 238.*]

3. JURY (§ 25*)—DEMAND—TIME.

Demand for jury not made until the court has entered on the trial and taken part of the testimony is too late.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 156; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Orangeburg County; G. W. Gage, Judge.

Warren Felder was convicted of selling liquor in violation of ordinance and appeals. Reversed.

John J. Jones, for appellant. Solicitor Hildebrand, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The defendant was convicted before the mayor's court of the town of Branchville of the offense of selling liquor in violation of the town ordinance. The appeal is from an order of the circuit court affirming the judgment of the mayor's court.

At the call of the case in the mayor's court defendant's counsel demanded that a warrant be issued before trial. The demand was refused. There is nothing in the record to indicate that the offense was committed in the presence of the officer who made the arrest, or that there were such circumstances of emergency as to justify the officer in arresting without a warrant. This being so, the defendant was entitled to demand that a warrant be issued before his trial. State v. Sims, 16 S. C. 486; Percival v. Bailey, 70 S. C. 72, 49 S. E. 7; State v. Byrd, 72 S. C. 104, 51 S. E. 342. The exception on this point must be sustained.

It appears from the report of the mayor that the defendant expressly waived the requirement of the statute that the witnesses should sign their statements, and that the defendant's demand for a jury trial was not made until the court had entered on the trial and taken a part of the testimony. Hence the exceptions on these points must be overruled.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

(86 S. C. 341)

HOTTAL v. EKART et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910.)

CONVERSION (§ 7*)—PROCEEDS OF SALE—PERSONALTY.

The proceeds of lands sold for partition become personalty upon distribution under an order of the court, and in the absence of any statute directing otherwise, this rule is applicable when distribution is made to the guardian of an infant, though a different rule may prevail where the court retains control of the fund.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conversion, Cent. Dig. §§ 13-15; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Walter H. Hunt, Judge.

Action by J. K. Hottal as administrator of the estate of Mossie M. Ekart, deceased, against Frank Ekart, Addie Pearl Gault, and her guardian, B. K. Wingo. From a judgment of the circuit court affirming a judgment of the probate court in favor of defendant Ekart, defendant Gault and her guardian appeal. Affirmed.

Simpson & Bomar, for appellants. Nicholls & Nicholls, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. This action was begun in the probate court of Spartanburg county for the settlement and distribution of the estate of Mossie M. Ekart, deceased. Defendant Frank Ekart, as surviving husband of Mossie M. Ekart, claimed the entire estate under the laws of North Carolina. Defendant Addie Pearl Gault and her guardian, defendant B. K. Wingo, claimed that the estate was divisible under the laws of South Carolina, and that she, as heir at law of her sister, Mossie M. Ekart, was entitled to one-half of the estate.

This appeal is from the judgment of Hon. Walter H. Hunt, special judge, affirming the judgment of the probate court, holding that the estate was personal property and should be distributed according to the law of North Carolina, and that defendant Frank Ekart, the husband, was entitled to the whole estate, after paying costs of administration and certain debts.

The statute of North Carolina (Revisal 1908, § 4) introduced in evidence is as follows: "Husband, on wife's estate; his interest therein. If any married woman shall die wholly or partially intestate, the surviving husband shall be entitled to administer on her personal estate, and shall hold the same, subject to the claims of her creditors and others having rightful demands against her, to his own use, except as hereinafter provided. If the husband shall die after his wife, but before administering, his executor or administrator or assignee shall receive the personal property of the said wife, as a part of the estate of the husband, subject as aforesaid, and except as provided by law."

Mossie M. Ekart was a minor residing in North Carolina at the time of her death on September 6, 1907, or 1908, intestate, leaving no children, leaving surviving husband, Frank Ekart, and her sister, Addie Pearl Gault, a minor residing in Spartanburg county, S. C. Plaintiff became administrator de bonis non of estate of Mossie M. Ekart in April, 1909; B. K. Wingo became guardian of Mossie M. Ekart and Addie Pearl Gault, and on November 17, 1902, as such, received the proceeds of certain real estate belonging to the estate of their mother, Sarah Ann Gault, in Spartanburg county, which had been sold for partition and division, under an order of Judge Buchanan, dated September 22, 1902, requiring the master to pay the balance of the proceeds of the sale of the land, after charges, commissions, and costs, to the guardian of said Mossie and Addie or to the parties themselves, upon their reaching their majority.

The appeal depends upon the question whether the proceeds of real estate became personalty when paid over to the guardian Wingo under the order of the court. We think the proceeds of lands sold for partition became personalty upon distribution under the order of the court. The purpose of such a proceeding is to change land into money, and when distribution is made in money the distributees hold money, not land. This is undoubtedly true as to adults and, in the absence of any statute directing otherwise, there is no good reason to have a different rule when distribution is made to the guardian of an infant.

This result was recognized in Major v. Hunt, 64 S. C. 102, 41 S. E. 818, where the court said: "If the order of sale had contained a provision that the proceeds of sale when paid into court should be delivered to the infant or her guardian, it might be contended with effect that this would manifest an intention to convert the realty in all events into personalty, and that equity which considers that as done which should have been done would stamp the proceeds with the impress of personalty." A different rule may prevail where the court retains control of the fund. Ex parte John W. Mobley, 2 Rich. Eq. 56; Major v. Hunt, 64 S. C. 97, 41 S. E. 816.

This fund in the hands of the guardian being personal estate of Mossie M. Ekart, domiciled in North Carolina, upon her death intestate, became the property of her surviving husband, subject to the conditions of the statute.

We do not construe the statute as making the right of the husband to succeed to the wife's personal estate depend upon the husband becoming administrator thereof. He is given the right to administer, but is not compelled to do so. It is sufficient if there be administration by another, as in this case. No decision of the Supreme Court of North Carolina giving a contrary construction was introduced in evidence, or even cited in argument.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

HUTCHISON v. YORK COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 20, 1910.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 144*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION.

While on the application for a temporary injunction, the case is not tried upon its merits, it is incumbent upon plaintiff to make out a prima facie showing that a temporary injunction is reasonably essential to protect his rights, and a temporary injunction does not follow automatically when a complaint states a cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 316; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 840*)—REVIEW OF CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—HEARING.

In proceedings to obtain a temporary injunction where plaintiff's prima facie case depends upon allegations that a statute is unconstitutional, the judge hearing the application must consider that matter in determining the reasonable necessity for a temporary injunction, and the question is one of law with the presumption in favor of the validity of the statute, and in order to reverse the refusal of a temporary injunction in a case where the court has held the law valid, the constitutional question must be reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3305; Dec. Dig. § 840.*]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 274*)—RESTRAINING ACTION OF COUNTY AUTHORITIES—CONDEMNATION OF LAND FOR COUNTY ROAD.

Civ. Code 1902, § 1343, and Act Feb. 26, 1902 (23 St. at Large, p. 998), authorize the county board of commissioners to open new public roads or change the location of old ones, where such change would be for the material interests of the traveling public, and authorize them to condemn the land therefor. A complaint, in an action to restrain the county authorities from condemning land for a public highway through plaintiff's plantation, alleged that there already existed a public highway extending through plaintiff's plantation connecting the same communities that are proposed to be connected by the new highway, "which present highway according to the best knowledge, information, and belief of plaintiff, is as convenient and affords as short a route to the traveling public of the neighborhood as would this proposed new road," and plaintiff's amended complaint alleged that "according to her best knowledge and belief, it is entirely practicable to make the said established highway into a highly improved and wholly efficient highway, at very slightly, if any, greater expense to the county than will be required for the opening and establishing of said proposed new highway, and she charges that there is no necessity for such new highway." There was no allegation showing abuse of discretion, bad faith, or oppression, and there was nothing to show that the commissioners did not in good faith consider and determine the matter with a view to the material interests of the general traveling public, nor was there anything to show that the laying out and constructing of the new road would entail irreparable damage to plaintiff's land. Held, that the statute confides the matter of determining the necessity for the new road to the judgment and discretion of the commissioners, and an injunction was properly denied.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Ernest Moore, Special Judge.

Kate J. Hutchison brought action to restrain York County, Clem F. Gordon as Supervisor, and others, from vacating a public highway through her plantation and from taking land for the purpose of establishing a new and different highway. Injunction refused, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. J. Cherry, for appellant. W. B. Wilson, Jr., for respondent.

JONES, C. J. The judgment of the circuit court herewith reported, together with the exceptions thereto, should be affirmed for the reasons therein stated.

While the judge hearing the application does not try the case upon its merits, it is incumbent upon plaintiff to make out a prima facie case that temporary injunction is reasonably essential to protect his rights. Temporary injunction does not follow automatically when the complaint states a cause of action. Northrop v. Simpson, 69 S. C. 554. 48 S. E. 613; Marion Company v. Tilghman

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Co., 75 S. C. 221, 55 S. E. 337; Crawford v. Lumber Corporation, 77 S. C. 83, 57 S. E. 670. If plaintiff's prima facie case depends upon allegations that a statute is unconstitutional, the judge hearing the application must consider that matter in determining the reasonable necessity for temporary injunction, and if he holds the statute valid, the necessity is not made to appear. The question is one of law, in which the presumption is in favor of the validity of the statute. In order to reverse the refusal of temporary injunction in such a case, this court must review the constitutional question.

In Riley v. Union Station Co., 67 S. C. 84, 45 S. E. 149, the judge hearing the application for injunction did not consider the constitutional question; hence there was no basis for a review of that matter by this court, but in that case the circuit judge held that there was no prima facie showing that the lands proposed to be condemned were not necessary for the construction of the proposed Union Station, and this court reversed the order of refusal upon the grounds: 1. Because the statute did not furnish an adequate remedy when the right to condemn was in issue. 2. Because the allegations of the fact made a prima facie case showing that injunction was necessary to preserve plaintiff's rights.

In that case there were allegations showing that the taking of the proposed land would prevent plaintiff from further use and occupation of her home, and would destroy an established industry and business thereon, to her irreparable injury, and that the taking of the property was not necessary, but oppressive. After trial upon the merits, Riley v. Union Station was again appealed to this court (71 S. C. 482, 51 S. E. 498, 110 Am. St. Rep. 579), and this court held "that the grantee of the power to condemn must not abuse the discretion confided by the Legislature and spoliolate private property by taking for pretended public use more than a reasonable necessity requires. We find no abuse of discretion or bad faith in defendant's proposal to condemn plaintiff's property, and the general rule is that if there be no bad faith or abuse of discretion on the part of the grantee in the matter of location, his discretion will not be interfered with."

From this it appears that in order to prevent a mere quasi public corporation, organized for private gain, authorized by law to condemn land, from proceeding to condemn what it decides to be necessary, it must be shown that there was abuse of discretion or bad faith in the location and selection of property to be condemned. But we are dealing now with a strictly public corporation which seeks merely an easement over plaintiff's land for strictly public use. The danger of oppression or spoliation of private property for gain is very slight, if any. Hence there is greater reason in this case to require a showing that the public officers are about to abuse their discretion or act in bad faith, or oppressively, in changing the location of the old road.

The statute, section 1343, Civ. Code 1902, as well as Act Feb. 26, 1902 (23 St. at Large, p. 998), authorizes the county board of commissioners to "open new public roads and widen or change the location of old public roads where, in their judgment, such change would be for the material interests of the traveling public. They may obtain the right of way by gift or purchase, or they may condemn the land therefor and assess the compensation and damages therefor as hereinafter provided." The statute thus plainly confides the matter of determining the necessity for the new road or alteration of the old road to the judgment and discretion of the commissioners, and the complaint shows that the commissioners have determined that the proposed change in the old road will be material for the interests of the traveling public.

The original and amended complaint contained this allegation that might be regarded as having some bearing: "That there is at present, and has been for a number of years, a public highway extending through plaintiff's said plantation, connecting the same communities that are proposed to be connected by the said proposed highway, which present highway, according to the best knowledge, information, and belief of plaintiff, is as convenient and affords as short a route to the traveling public of the neighborhood as would this proposed new road." The amended complaint contains this additional allegation: "That, according to her best knowledge and belief, it is entirely practicable to make the said established highway into a highly improved and wholly efficient highway at very slightly, if any, greater expense to the county than will be required for the opening and establishing of said proposed new highway, and she charges that there is no necessity for such new highway."

There is no allegation showing abuse of discretion, bad faith, or oppression. It is greatly in favor of the new road that it may be opened and established at an expense not exceeding what would be necessary to repair and improve the old road, and it may well be inferred that the future cost of maintenance would be greatly in favor of the new road, and it may be that the new road would be safer than the old. Moreover, the commissioners are to consider what is the material interest of the "traveling public," a much broader scope than the "traveling public of the neighborhood," to which the allegation of the complaint is confined. There is nothing to show that the commissioners did not in good faith consider and determine the matter with a view to the material interests of the traveling public, as required by the statute. Furthermore, there is nothing in the complaint to show that the mere work of laying out and constructing the new road would entail irreparable damage to plaintiff's land, and if, on the trial of the case on its merits, the court should enjoin the new and restore the old road, for all that appears plaintiff would be restored to her alleged rights; the loss of construction, etc., falling upon the county. Northrop v. Simpson, 69 S. C. 554, 48 S. E. 613.

The exceptions should be overruled, and the order of the circuit judge affirmed.

RAGAN, MALONE & CO. v. TAFF.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 15, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

HOMESTEAD (§§ 170, 175*)—WAIVER—GENERAL WAIVER—EFFECT.

A general waiver of homestead only operates in favor of the specific liability referred to in the waiver or obligation containing the waiver. Such waiver may be stated in the contract of indebtedness, or contemporaneously therewith or subsequently thereto in a separate paper. But a waiver of all homestead rights, in an application for a general line of credit, is not effectual to bar the debtor's right to homestead as against a debt thereafter contracted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 336; Dec. Dig. §§ 170, 175.*]

Holden, J., dissenting

Error from Superior Court, Bartow County; A. M. Foute, Judge.

In an action against J. C. Taff, Ragan, Malone & Co. sought to intervene. From an order dismissing intervention, they bring error. Affirmed.

The firm of Taff & Conyers were adjudged involuntary bankrupts, and J. C. Taff, a member of the firm, applied in the United States court for the exemption of certain property as a homestead. Certain creditors filed their suit in the superior court of Bartow county, alleging that they were creditors of the bankrupt, that their indebtedness was evidenced by notes containing a waiver of homestead, and that they had not proved their claims in the bankrupt court; and they prayed the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the property of the bankrupt, which he was seeking to have set apart for a homestead, and that the same be sold and the proceeds distributed among the complaining creditors. To this petition Ragan, Malone & Co. filed an intervention, in which they alleged: On March 20, 1907, the firm of Taff & Conyers, of which J. C. Taff was a member, made a statement to them of their financial condition, for the purpose of obtaining credit, which contained the following provision: "In consideration of credit extended and to be extended on the faith of my (or our) solvency as shown by this statement, I (or we) hereby waive and renounce for myself (or ourselves) and family any and all homestead exemption rights under the laws of the United States, or of any state, as against the payment of any indebtedness now owing or hereafter existing in favor of the said Ragan, Malone & Co.; and this waiver shall apply to all property now owned or hereafter acquired by the undersigned." Thereafter, on September 9th, they sold to Taff & Conyers a certain quantity of goods amounting to $767.60, upon which account, after applying all credits, there was due $632.12 principal. Prior to the giving of the statement by Taff & Conyers, in the years 1905 and 1906, J. C. Taff had executed to them similar statements upon which they extended him credit. They prayed that they be allowed to intervene and participate in the fund derived from the sale of the goods sought to be exempted by the bankrupt. A demurrer was interposed, on the ground that under the facts alleged J. C. Taff had not waived his right to a homestead in favor of interveners. The court dismissed the intervention, and the interveners excepted.

Paul F. Akin, for plaintiffs in error. J. M. Neel, O. T. Peebles, and Thos. W. & Watt H. Milner, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). The constitutional and statutory rights of homestead and exemption are intended to reserve to a debtor, for a limited time, the use and enjoyment of a certain amount of his property from the processes of his creditors. It may not be necessary that an applicant for a homestead be a debtor; yet, as the homestead exemption only serves as a barrier against creditors, it is hardly supposable that one who does not owe any debt will ever apply for an exemption or homestead in his property. In making provision for notice to creditors, both the Constitution and statutes contemplate that the applicant is in debt and is seeking protection from his creditors. Under the Constitution of 1868 the debtor could make a special waiver, but was not allowed to defeat his right of homestead by a general waiver. A general waiver was pronounced void, as being opposed to public policy, in Stafford v. Elliott, 59 Ga. 837. The Constitution of 1877 (Civ. Code, § 5914) declares that "the debtor shall have power to waive or renounce in writing his right to the benefit of the exemption provided for," except $300 of household and kitchen furniture and provisions. It is further provided in this Constitution (Civ. Code, § 5916) that the "debtor" shall have authority to waive the benefit of the exemption known as the short homestead. The General Assembly at its first session after the promulgation of the Constitution enacted that "any debtor may, except as to wearing apparel and three hundred dollars worth of household and kitchen furniture, and provisions, waive or renounce his right to the benefit of the exemption provided for by the Constitution and laws of this state, by a waiver, either general or specific, in writing, simply stating that he does so waive or renounce such right, which waiver may be stated in the contract of indebtedness, or contemporaneously therewith or subsequently thereto in a separate paper." Civ. Code, § 2863. It will thus be seen, from the object and purpose of the homestead and exemption allowance, as well as from the phraseology of the organic and statute law, it is essential that the relation of creditor and debtor shall subsist before a valid waiver of homestead shall be effective. A mere written declaration to the public, or to one not a creditor, that the declarant waives all benefit to the homestead laws, would be no more effectual to deprive him of afterwards changing his mind than if the renunciation was of any other law designed for individual protection and benefit, such as the usury law, the statute of limitations, and the like.

Such a renunciation would be purely voluntary. In order to bind the debtor by the waiver, he must either have incurred the debt or contracted for it at the time of the waiver. Suppose a debtor gave his note to his creditor, and in the note he renounced his right of homestead generally, without reference to the particular debt evidenced by the note; can any one contend, should the maker subsequently become indebted to the payee upon a distinct matter, that the homestead waiver in the note would bar the debtor of his right to a homestead as against the subsequent debt? We think not. We do not mean to say that the debtor must have received the entire consideration of the debt before he can waive his right of homestead, but only that the relation of debtor and creditor with respect to a specific debt must exist between the parties before one can bind the other bound by his waiver. To illustrate: If a customer arrange with his merchant that the latter shall sell to him a certain amount of goods, and give his obligation therefor, containing a waiver of homestead, such waiver would prevent the customer from asserting against his contract with the merchant a homestead subsequently set aside, though the goods were furnished under such contract after the execution of the waiver. The case at bar is not like this illustration. Here a retail merchant gave to a wholesale merchant a statement of his financial condition which contained a general waiver and renunciation of his homestead rights. The retail merchant did not order the goods at the time he gave this statement, nor did the wholesale merchant contract at that time to sell him any goods. There was absolutely no privity of contract between them. The goods were sold six months thereafter on open account, and we do not think the homestead waiver in the statement prepared for credit barred the retail merchant from applying for a homestead as against debts subsequently contracted.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur except HOLDEN, J. (dissenting). Taff & Conyers made to Ragan, Malone & Co. a statement of their financial condition, wherein it was stipulated, according to the proper construction of the statement, that they waived and renounced any and all homestead and exemption rights as to any debt they might create in favor of Ragan, Malone & Co., by reason of the latter extending credit to them on the faith of such statement. Ragan, Malone & Co. afterwards extended credit to Taff & Conyers on the faith of such statement, and the waiver in the statement was valid as against the debt thus created. It is true that the relation of debtor and creditor did not exist between the parties until Ragan, Malone & Co. sold the goods to Taff & Conyers. When the goods were sold on the faith of the statement, the stipulations therein became a part of the contract, and, as far as the agreement therein waiving all homestead and exemption rights was concerned, it had the same effect as if it was made at the time the goods were sold and the contract creating the indebtedness was made. Such agreement waiving homestead and exemption rights became a part of the contract whereby Taff & Conyers became a debtor of Ragan, Malone & Co. by reason of the latter selling the former goods on the faith of the statement, and the waiver was binding.

I cannot concur in the views of the majority of the court, and must dissent therefrom.

JEFFERSON v. GLAZE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 15, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 298*)—WARRANT TO DISPOSSESS—RECOUPMENT OF DAMAGES.

Where a landlord sues out a warrant to dispossess his tenant because of nonpayment of rent under a lease contract, and the tenant arrests such proceedings by filing a counter affidavit and giving the required bond, and where the allegations contained in the counter affidavit show that the landlord was indebted to the tenant at the time of suing out the warrant, by reason of damages resulting from the failure of the landlord to comply with certain obligations imposed upon him under the terms of the contract, and there is some evidence to support such allegations, it is error for the court to direct a verdict in favor of the landlord for double the amount of rent claimed to be due, as it is competent for the tenant, in proceedings of the nature indicated, under proper pleadings, to recoup the damages which he has sustained. Weaver v. Roberson, 134 Ga. —, 67 S. E. 662.

EVANS, P. J. I concur in the judgment, but dissent from the intimation of the majority of the court that the tenant may recoup damages arising out of the landlord's violation of his contract. I think the tenant may defeat the action by showing that he has suffered damages to the amount of the rent or in excess thereof, but the tenant cannot recover any damages in excess of the rent by way of recoupment in a dispossessory proceeding.

HATCHER et al. v. EQUITABLE LIFE ASSUR. SOCIETY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 23, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 368*)—FORFEITURE—NONPAYMENT OF PREMIUMS—PAID-UP POLICY.

Where a life insurance policy, issued in the year 1884, stipulated that the insurance should become forfeited upon failure to pay an annual premium when due, but also provided that after three payments had been made the insured might, within six months after default, surrender the policy and receive a paid-up policy for an amount to be fixed according to data provided for in the policy, and where the insured defaulted in the payment of the annual premium due in the year 1893, and did not surrender or offer to surrender the policy according to the terms of the provision referred to above, the beneficiaries would not be entitled to recover upon the policy after the death of the insured, which took place in 1907, although, as appears from the allegations in the petition, at the time of the lapse of the policy it had been lost or stolen, no effort having been made, in the long interval between the date of the lapse of the policy and the death of the insured, to have another policy issued to the insured, or a copy of the policy established which he might surrender up for cancellation in accordance with the provisions relative to surrender and cancellation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 194, 936-939; Dec. Dig. § 368.*]

2. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Under the ruling made in the foregoing headnote, the court did not err in sustaining a general demurrer to the plaintiffs' petition.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Hammie F. Hatcher and others against the Equitable Life Assurance Society. A demurrer to the petition was sustained, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Hammie F. Hatcher, the surviving wife of Marshall J. Hatcher, deceased, and M. Felton Hatcher and Mrs. M. F. H. Clarke, who are his only surviving children, brought suit as individuals and as the executors of his will against the Equitable Life Assurance Society to recover upon a policy of insurance issued by the defendant upon the life of the deceased, in which the plaintiffs were named as beneficiaries. They alleged that the insured had paid each annual premium due from the time the policy was issued up to November 15, 1893, but that he failed to pay the annual premium due on the last-named date. The policy, a copy of which was attached to the petition, contained, in addition to the forfeiture clause stated in the headnote, the following: "And, further, that if premiums upon this policy, for not less than three complete years of assurance, shall have been duly received by said society, and this policy should thereafter become void in consequence of default in payment of a subsequent premium, said society will issue, in lieu of such policy, a new paid-up policy, without participation in profits, in favor of said beneficiaries as aforesaid, his executors, administrators, or assigns, for the entire amount which the full reserve on this policy, according to the present legal standard of the state of New York, will then purchase as a single premium, calculated by the regular table for single-premium policies now published and in use by the society; provided, however, that this policy shall be surrendered duly receipted within six months of the date of default in payment of premium as mentioned above." The application for the insurance, which by the terms of the policy was made a part thereof, contained the following question and answer: "If a tontine savings fund policy be not selected, is it agreed, in consideration of the agreements contained in the policy hereby applied for, that any allowance for the reserve value which may be due or made in the case of the lapse of policy proposed shall be applied to the purchase of paid-up assurance, payable at the same time as the original policy, and not to the purchase of temporary assurance; and all right or claim to any other surrender value than that provided in the policy shall be specifically waived and relinquished, whether required by the statute of any state or not? Yes."

The assured died in April, 1907. The plaintiffs alleged that in December, 1907, the defendant company having denied liability under the policy on account of its having lapsed, they wrote the company, claiming that they were entitled to the paid-up policy called for by the contract above described, and demanding blanks for the proof of death; that the original policy was lost or stolen at the time of the default in the payment of premium in 1893, without any fault of the decedent, who used due diligence to find it, but failed; and that the policy, or any interest therein, had never been assigned to any person. The plaintiffs sued to recover the amount of paid-up insurance which the full reserve on the policy at the time of its lapse would purchase as a single premium, calculated by the regular table for single-premium policies, which was alleged to be a stated sum, and prayed that the defendant be required to issue said paid-up policy for the amount named, and that plaintiffs have judgment thereon. The court sustained a general demurrer to the petition, and the plaintiffs excepted.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). No elaboration of the doctrine announced in the headnotes is necessary. Questions identical with that decided, or very similar thereto, have been passed upon and elaborately discussed by the courts of last resort in many of the states, and the line of authority supporting the proposition announced is almost unbroken. ROBINSON v. CARMICHAEL et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 23, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTION (§ 171*)—VACATING—INJUNCTION—ACCIDENT.

The injunction should have been granted. The case differs from that of Ayer v. James, 120 Ga. 578, 48 S. E. 154, and the cases therein cited; all being from courts where the dockets were not so crowded as were those of the city court of Atlanta, and where the practice of the assignment of cases was not the same. It was more like the case of Howell v. Ware & Harper, 133 Ga. 674, 66 S. E. 884, where a proceeding to set aside a judgment rendered by default in the city court of Atlanta, on the ground that the sudden illness of counsel had prevented him from filing a defense until the time for filing defenses had expired, was held not to be demurrable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 497-518; Dec. Dig. § 171.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by J. M. Robinson against W. A. Carmichael and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiff instituted suit to set aside a judgment and enjoin the enforcement of an execution, upon the grounds that it was obtained by accident, as shown by the following facts: The suit in which judgment was obtained was filed on August 18, 1908, returnable to the September term of the city court of Atlanta. The defendant therein employed counsel who, at the first term, filed a meritorious defense. The defendant was unfamiliar with the method of procedure in the court, and did not know what to do, except to employ an attorney to look after the case. The attorney employed agreed to represent the defendant, and to notify him when there was anything for him to do with reference to the case. The defendant did not hear anything more with reference to the case until November 1, 1909, after the date of the judgment, when the sheriff called upon him to pay the amount recovered. The illness of his attorney, hereinafter mentioned, had been unknown to the defendant, and he did not know when the case was to be tried. Though residing in Fulton county, there was no evidence to show that, after employing an attorney and receiving the assurance that he would look after the case, the defendant ever made inquiry of his counsel or of the officers of the court in any manner concerning the case; but, for all that appears, he remained passive, trusting altogether to his attorney. There was a custom in the city court of Atlanta for the judge, on Friday of every week, to have "bar calls" of the docket for the assignment of cases on the "trial calendar" to be tried during the succeeding week. It was the custom for attorneys representing parties to cases likely to be called and assigned on the trial calendar to attend the bar calls, but it was not customary for parties to attend the bar calls. At the bar call on October 15, 1909, the case in question, being No. 19,822, was called for the first time from the general docket and placed on the trial calendar for October 18, 1909. On October 25th a judgment was rendered in the absence of the defendant and of his counsel. That was during the September term, 1909, of court, which adjourned October 30th. The attorney was not present at the trial, because on the 5th or 6th of October he was taken seriously ill with nervous prostration, and from that time until November 6th he was unable to attend to any business, or to see any one, or to discuss business, nor was he permitted to do so by his family or physician. It was not until November 5th, after the court had adjourned, that he knew that the case had been assigned to the trial calendar, or that a judgment had been rendered. The attorney did not have any partner or associate. After the sheriff's demand, on November 1st, defendant learned of the illness of his attorney, and employed other counsel, who, on November 2d, filed the suit to set aside the judgment and enjoin the enforcement of the execution. Uncontradicted evidence, substantially as above set forth, was introduced at the hearing of the application for interlocutory injunction. The judge denied the application, and the plaintiff excepted.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF STEPHENS COUNTY v. PALMER.

SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 144*)—TEACHERS—CONTRACTS OF EMPLOYMENT.

P. contracted with the board of education of the county of S. to teach a common school, located near the county line between the county of S. and the county of F., at a salary of $40 per month. The board of education of S. county having refused to pay the teacher's demand for the full amount of his salary at the rate of $40 per month, he brought suit against the board of education of that county. The defendant denied owing the amount claimed ($120, the aggregate amount of salary for three months), but admitted that it was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $19.79; this being the amount of the teacher's salary for three months, less $100.21 which had been paid by the county school commissioner of the county of F. from the common school fund on account of children from that county who attended the school which the plaintiff had been employed to teach. Held that, the uncontroverted evidence showing that the plaintiff had received $100.21 on account of the attendance of children from the county of F. at the school taught by him, the court erred in giving a charge which authorized the jury to return a verdict for the full amount of the salary claimed, with no deduction on account of the amount paid by the county school commissioner for the county of F.

Error from Superior Court, Stephens County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by C. C. Palmer against the Board of Education of Stephens County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The contract sued on was signed by Palmer and by the county school commissioner on behalf of the board of education. It contained (among others not here material) the following terms: "The board of education of Stephens county promises to pay of the common school fund to Prof. C. C. Palmer for teaching a school for white children in _____ subdistrict of said county, at Martin schoolhouse, for five months of the school year ending December 31, 1906, a salary of ($40.00) forty dollars per month. The board reserves the right to diminish equitably said salary, or to suspend said school, if the regular attendance falls below 12; and if the regular attendance exceeds 50 pupils then the board shall employ, or have employed, an assistant, and pay said assistant, upon separate written contract, such salary as may be deemed just and reasonable. The spring term to continue three months; the summer term to begin July 16, 1906." Palmer sued the board of education of Stephens county to recover $120 and interest, for teaching three months, alleging that he had complied fully with the terms of the contract, and that the county refused to pay him the amount due and sued for. The defendant answered by setting up that Palmer had collected from Franklin county the sum of $100.21 on account of pupils from that county who attended the school during the three months in question, and contended that his time belonged to Stephens county, and that it was entitled to have this amount deducted from the salary which defendant had contracted to pay plaintiff, and therefore that it owed plaintiff only $19.79. Under instructions from the court the jury found for the plaintiff the full amount sued for, with interest. The case was brought to this court by direct bill of exceptions.

N. R. C. Ramey and J. B. Jones, for plaintiff in error. Robert McMillan, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Under the terms of the contract set forth in the statement of facts, the teacher, the plaintiff in this case, was entitled to receive $40 per month as his entire compensation, and he was not entitled to any additional pay from the county school fund of either the county of Franklin or the county of Stephens. The board of education of Stephens county had authority, under the provisions of section 1370 of the Political Code of 1895, to make employment of teachers at a salary; and when Palmer accepted this it was in lieu of the right to participate in the common school fund which, in proportion to the attendance of pupils upon the school, he could have claimed in the absence of a contract to teach at a salary. The school taught by the plaintiff was located near the county line of Stephens and Franklin counties; and section 1378 of the Political Code provides in such cases that, "when a common school is located near a county line, children from an adjoining county may, by consent of the county boards of the respective counties, be permitted to attend the school. In such cases the teacher shall make out two accounts, one against each county board, in amount proportioned to the number of children in the school from the respective counties." Under the provisions of that part of the section just quoted, while it was the duty of the teacher to make out two accounts, one against the board of Franklin county, as well as one against the board of Stephens county, he was not entitled to receive any portion of the common school fund from either county in addition to the salary stipulated in the contract; and inasmuch as payments amounting in the aggregate to $100.21 were actually made to him by the county school commissioner of Franklin county, upon the approval of the county school commissioner of Stephens county, the amount so paid should have been treated as a credit upon the amount of salary due for three months' teaching, and a verdict for the full amount of the salary stipulated in the contract, without allowance of such credit, was unauthorized by the evidence.

Under the ruling which we have made above, it is unnecessary to consider the question as to whether the contract which is under consideration was entire, and of such character that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover unless he had completed the term of five months during which he had agreed to teach, because in the answer of the defendant it is distinctly admitted that defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $19.79, which was the aggregate amount of the salary contracted to be paid for a period of three months, diminished by the amount which the teacher had received from the county school commissioner of Franklin county.

DARNALL v. GEORGIA RY. & ELECTRIC CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 23, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 113*)—RIGHT OF WAY—RIGHT TO EXCAVATE.

Where a grantor in a deed conveys to the grantee a strip of land "for the purpose of a right of way for a street railroad," and subsequently the same grantor conveys a lot of land to another party by deed in which the right of way of the railway company is called for as the southern boundary of the lot conveyed to such other party, the latter is not entitled to maintain an action for damages against the railway company for excavations made upon its right of way in broadening and lowering its bed for a railway track, where there is no physical invasion of the property of such other party, and no negligence upon the part of the company in constructing its roadbed, affecting the property rights of the complainant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 230, 351-364; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

2. DAMAGES (§ 188*)—EXCAVATIONS—ACTIONS.

The plaintiff having alleged that excavations made by the railway company on the south side and east side of her lot of land had injured and damaged her property in a certain sum, and evidence having been introduced to show the aggregate amount of the damages to her premises resulting from the excavations both on the south and on the east, and it appearing that in no event was the defendant liable for the excavations made on the south, the court did not err in charging the jury that the plaintiff would not be entitled to damages for injury resulting from the excavations made on the east side unless there was evidence before them from which they could determine the proportionate amount of the damages resulting to her property in consequence of the excavations made on the east side.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 511; Dec. Dig. § 188.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 99*)—RELEVANCY.

The rulings of the court in excluding certain testimony offered in evidence were not erroneous; it appearing that the testimony thus repelled was irrelevant to the issues involved.

Error from Superior Court, Dekalb County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by Miss Mattie H. Darnall against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Miss Mattie H. Darnall brought suit against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company, alleging injury and damage to certain real estate owned by her. She alleged that the defendant company operated a street car line from the city of Atlanta to the town of Decatur, on the north side of the Georgia Railroad; that the defendant's line of railway crosses the wagon road from Decatur to Atlanta at a station on the street car line known as "Rose Hill"; that the lot of land alleged to have been damaged is bounded on the east by the said Decatur and Atlanta road, and on the south by the defendant company's right of way; that the company, which had been operating a single line of track during the year 1907, constructed an additional line of track, and in order to do this the company made an excavation of land, 10 to 15 feet wide, north of its original single track, and lowered the grade of both the old and the new tracks, so that the bed of the railway is about 10 feet below the surface of petitioner's lot; that the company also lowered the grade of the Decatur and Atlanta road on the east side of her lot, where the road crosses the car line, so as to adjust the grade of the wagon road to the grade of the railway tracks, and petitioner's house and the surface of her lot were thus left at an elevation of 10 feet; that these acts of the company were wrongful; that petitioner's property has been rendered more difficult of access, and its value has been decreased in a stated sum; and that in order to protect her land from washing away, she will have to construct retaining walls of brick or stone, and can approach the same only by constructing steps leading from the road grade up to the surface of her lot, all of which will be expensive. On the trial the plaintiff introduced, as a muniment of title to the property alleged to have been damaged, a deed from the Germania Savings Bank, formerly the Germania Loan & Banking Company, dated August 15, 1904, conveying to the plaintiff a lot described as beginning at a point on the northeast corner of Atlanta road, and right of way of Georgia Railway & Electric Company at what is now Rose Hill station, thence extending north along Atlanta road 145 feet, thence west 128 feet, thence a little east of south 167 feet, thence east along right of way 97.9 feet to point of beginning. Also in evidence was a deed from the Germania Loan & Banking Company to the Atlanta Rapid Transit Company, the predecessor in title of the defendant railway company, dated August 16, 1900, and reciting, that "the said party of the second part is desirous of acquiring a right of way over certain portions of the land of said party of the first part, * * * for the purpose of building its line of road upon the same, which road is now about to be built from the city of Atlanta to Decatur, Ga.; and * * * the said party of the first part is also desirous of having a street extended through the southern portion of their said property;" and therefore, in consideration of $1 in hand paid, the party of the first part sold and quitclaimed to the party of the second part, its successors and assigns, a strip of land 50 feet wide and 832 feet long, more or less, bounded on the south by the Georgia Railroad right of way 832 feet, on the east by Decatur wagon road 50 feet, and on the north by the lands of the vendee, "said lands being conveyed for the purpose of a right of way for a street railroad; and should the grantee, its successors or assigns, ever abandon the use of said lands as a street railroad right of way, then and in that event the same shall revert to and become the property of the vendor, its successors and assigns. The vendee, by acceptance of this deed, is bound and obligates itself to have at least one station on the right of way hereby conveyed, at which its cars shall stop to receive and discharge passengers. It is understood and agreed that if the party of the first part, or their successors, desires, they can, at any time they see fit, put in spur tracks to connect their land with the Georgia Railroad tracks, and shall not be hindered in any manner by said party from crossing their tracks. This deed not to become effective until said line is built through said property and in running order," etc. Upon the trial the jury rendered a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial, and to the order of the court overruling the same she excepted.

Green, Tilson & McKinney, for plaintiff in error. Rosser & Brandon and Colquitt & Conyers, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). Under the conveyance from the Germania Loan & Banking Company to the Atlanta Rapid Transit Company, the predecessor in title of the defendant company, the latter acquired the right of way over the strip of land described in that deed, and had a right to construct and operate a line of railway with single or double tracks over the same; and, in order to do this, the railway company had the right to make such excavations opposite the southern boundary of the plaintiff's lot, for the adaptation of the grade of its line of railway at that place to the grade of other portions of its tracks, as might be dictated by reason of economy, convenience, and safety; and if in doing this they did not invade the property rights of the plaintiff, she would have no ground of complaint. Under the undisputed testimony, after the excavation had been made in the cut south of the premises of the plaintiff, there was an intervening space of five feet or more between the top of the cut and her land. There was no evidence whatever that the lateral support to her land had in any way been interfered with, or that a retaining wall was necessary to support her land after the cut made by the railway company had been completed. Her deed was executed subsequently to the deed conveying the strip of land to the predecessor in title of the defendant. There is no reference in her deed to a street as the southern boundary of the plaintiff's lot, but in the deed itself the call is for the right of way of the Georgia Railway & Electric Company as the southern boundary of said lot. What may have been the nature of the estate of the railway company in the strip of land it is unnecessary for us to discuss, further than to hold that the railway company had the right to construct a line of railway over this strip of land, and to make such excavations on that strip as were necessary in properly grading the same, and to use all or any part of the right of way as described in their deed for that purpose, so long as there was no physical invasion or injury to the plaintiff's property. And if by the proper construction of its tracks and roadbed there was a consequent damage to plaintiff's property, by causing a decrease in its market value, it was damnum absque injuria.

2. The plaintiff also contended that she was entitled to damages on account of lowering the grade of the road upon the east side of her premises, which was necessary in consequence of lowering of the roadbed of the railway company in order to adapt the grade of the dirt road to the railroad. The question of the amount of damages which the plaintiff had sustained in consequence of the lowering of the grade of the wagon road on the east side of her lot was submitted by the court to the jury under instructions as favorable to the plaintiff as she was entitled to. The jury found against her; and rightly so, as appears from the evidence under proper instructions from the court, informing them that they could not find for the plaintiff on account of the injury to her premises in consequence of lowering the grade of the road on the east side of her lot of land, unless there was evidence from which they could determine the damages flowing from the alleged wrong in deepening the cut on the east side. And, inasmuch as there was no evidence as to the damages to plaintiff's property, save that which included the damages resulting from the excavation on the south as well as from the excavation on the east, and nothing to show or indicate the proportionate part of the damages flowing from the excavations on the south or on the east, the jury had before them no evidence from which they could determine the amount of the damages to the premises inflicted as a consequence of the excavations on the east side of plaintiff's lot. Brooks v. Camak, 130 Ga. 213, 60 S. E. 458.

3. The rulings of the court in excluding certain testimony offered in evidence were not erroneous, it appearing that the testimony thus repelled was irrelevant to the issues involved.

Error from Superior Court, Jackson County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Action by M. M. Randolph against W. C. Howard and others, executors of J. E. Randolph. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

J. A. B. Mahaffey and Jno. J. Strickland, for plaintiffs in error. J. S. Ayers and H. H. Dean, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. This is a suit to recover upon a quantum meruit $3,949 principal, besides interest, for services alleged to have been rendered to J. E. Randolph, the defendants' testator. The greater part of the recovery sought is claimed for services alleged to have been rendered during the plaintiff's minority. The jury rendered a verdict in her favor for $3,240.10 principal and $929.50 interest. The plaintiff voluntarily wrote off from the amount of interest recovered $343.60. The court refused the defendants a new trial.

We gather from the record that J. E. Randolph, who was without children, and whose household consisted of himself and wife, about the year 1885 took the plaintiff, then a child of about three years, from an orphanage, and received her into his household as a member of his family, where she remained until his death in 1905. Though of no kin to her, he gave to her his surname, maintained and educated her, and in all respects treated her as a daughter and a member of his household. He was a man in easy circumstances, always provided his household with two servants, and the plaintiff was not called upon to discharge any domestic services, except as are usually rendered by a daughter under like circumstances. Her education was not confined to the elementary branches of a common-school education, but she was taught music and art, and graduated from an institution of learning about the year 1899. After her graduation in 1899 she taught school five months, and again taught school in 1901 about five months. She was teaching school in 1905, when, about the 1st of February, she was summoned to the bedside of Mrs. Randolph, who died about a month later, and about a month thereafter Mr. Randolph died. Mr. Randolph owned several small tenant houses near a factory, some storehouses, and some land. He also conducted an undertaking business in Jefferson, a town of 1,500 or 1,800 population. When the plaintiff was about 12 or 14 years of age, she began to assist Mr. Randolph in dressing coffins as he would sell them, and she assisted in collecting the rents from the small houses, and in keeping his accounts with respect to these matters. To what extent she assisted in the collection of rents, and the character of the accounts which she and Mr. Randolph kept appertaining to the rent and undertaking business, does not appear with much precision in the record. Mr. Randolph was accustomed to use intoxicants, and sometimes got drunk, and the plaintiff always administered unto his wants on these occasions. Whenever Mrs. Randolph was sick, she would nurse her. Mr. Randolph left an estate of about $60,000, and in his will bequeathed to the plaintiff $1,000 in cash and a third interest in the undertaking business, from which she realized $450. The whole evidence tended to show that the relations between the plaintiff and Mr. Randolph and his wife were cordial, and such as might be expected between parent and child. No hint of unkind, disrespectful, or inconsiderate treatment from one to the other is suggested.

1, 2. Until majority the child remains under the control of the father, who is entitled to its services and the proceeds of its labor. Civ. Code, § 2502. Likewise one who stands in loco parentis to such a child is entitled to the proceeds of its labor, and is bound for its care, maintenance, and support. Eaves v. Fears, 181 Ga. 820, 64 S. E. 269. A person who means to put himself in the situation of the lawful father of the child stands, with respect to the father's office and duty of making provision for the child, in loco parentis to the child. Brinkeroff v. Merselis, 24 N. J. Law, 683; Powys v. Mansfield, 19 Vesey, Jr., 154. Sir William Grant said that one sustained this relation "by assuming the parental character and discharging parental duties." Weatherby v. Dixon, 19 Vesey, Jr., 412. Where a person voluntarily assumes the relation of a parent to a child, whom he is under no obligation to support, and faithfully discharges the duties of that relation by receiving such child into his family and educating and supporting him on the same footing as if the child were his own, in the absence of an express agreement the child cannot maintain an action against such person for services rendered while a minor, although the value of such services may exceed the expenses of such education and support. Under such circumstances a promise to pay wages will not be implied. Williams v. Hutchinson, 3 N. Y. 812, 53 Am. Dec. 301; Tyler v. Burrington, 39 Wis. 376. As was said in Schrimpf v. Settegast, 36 Tex. 296:

"The weight of authority has established a doctrine that would hold a person who had, through motives of kindness or charity, received an orphan child into his family, whether it be a stepchild or an entire stranger, and treated it as a member of his family, as standing in loco parentis, so long as such child should see fit to remain in such family, or so long as it should be permitted thus to remain; and while that relation should exist, the party who stood in loco parentis would be bound for the maintenance, care, and education of such child, and would be entitled to his reasonable services, without being liable to pay for the same, only in the way of support, unless there had been an express promise to that effect."

The record is silent as to whether the plaintiff, at the time she was received into the family of the defendant's testator, had father or mother or any one else to whom she could look for support and maintenance. As she was taken from an orphanage at such a tender age, we may indulge the inference that she was an orphan. Her introduction into the family of Mr. Randolph was as a member of his household. Indeed, the plaintiff only begins to claim remuneration for services rendered after she had been in the household of her benefactor for some eight or nine years. At the time she was taken from the orphanage she was altogether too young to raise any inference that she was to be requited for services. There is no conflict in the testimony that Mr. Randolph faithfully discharged his assumed duty of a foster parent during the minority of the plaintiff; and consequently his estate is not liable for services rendered during her minority. There are several reported cases in this state (Hudson v. Hudson, 90 Ga. 581, 16 S. E. 349; Phinazee v. Bunn, 123 Ga. 230, 51 S. E. 300) where recoveries were sustained in suits by children against parents upon implied contract; but in these cases compensation was claimed for services rendered after the child's majority.

3. The plaintiff embraced in her suit items for services rendered subsequently to her majority. With respect to her right to compensation for services rendered since her majority, it may be stated as a general rule that, when services are rendered and voluntarily accepted, the law will imply a promise on the part of the recipient to pay for them. There are exceptions to, and limitations upon, this general rule, one of which is that, where services are rendered by members of a family living in one household, no such implication will arise from the mere rendition and acceptance of the service. This exception is not confined to cases where the parties sustain the relation of parent and child, but is extended also to strangers who have been received into the family as members of the household. Williams v. Hutchinson, Tyler v. Burrington, supra; Hogg v. Laster, 56 Ark. 382, 19 S. W. 975; Scully v. Scully, 28 Iowa,

548. The reason for the exception is thus stated by Chancellor McGill: "The household family relationship is presumed to abound in reciprocal acts of kindness and good will, which tend to the mutual comfort and convenience of the members of the family, and are gratuitously performed; and where that relation appears, the ordinary implication of a promise to pay for services does not arise, because the presumption which supports such implication is nullified by the presumption that between members of a household services are gratuitously rendered. The proof of the services and as well as the family relation leaves the case in equipoise, from which the plaintiff must remove it, or fail." Disbrow v. Durand, 54 N. J. Law, 343, 24 Atl. 545, 33 Am. St. Rep. 678. Therefore, where one who has been received in infancy into a family not of kin to her seeks to recover for services rendered to such family after her majority, the burden is upon her to show either an express contract, or circumstances from which a contract of remuneration for such services may be implied. What circumstances might be sufficient to imply a promise to pay for services rendered would depend upon the special facts of the case, taking into account the nature of the services, the relation of the parties, declarations made at the time, indicating an intent of the recipient to compensate for the services rendered, and the like. As the case is to be tried again, we will forbear a discussion of the evidence submitted as a basis for such inference, further than to say that there was sufficient evidence to submit to the jury the plaintiff's right to recover for services rendered after she attained her majority.

4. Error is assigned upon the action of the court allowing certain evidence. The character of the evidence was such as to bring it within the rule announced in the last headnote, and was admissible.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1234*)—LIABILITY ON SUPERSEDEAS BOND—EXTENT.

The petition was not open to general demurrer, as it set forth a cause of action for the breach of a supersedeas bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1234.*]

Error from Superior Court, Screven County; B. L. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by the Sylvania & Girard Railroad Company and others against J. J. B. Morel and others. A demurrer to the petition was overruled, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The Sylvania & Girard Railroad Company and certain individuals, one of whom was alleged to be the president and the others directors of the corporation, applied for the writ of mandamus against Morel, Overstreet, and Mock, and certain agents of the corporation, to compel the defendants to deliver to them all the books, papers, money, and other property of the company in their possession or control; it being alleged that one of the defendants was the former president and the other two were directors of the corporation, but that they were no longer so. The defendants claimed to be still in the office and entitled to retain custody of the books, money, and other property of the company. The judge granted the writ of mandamus absolute. Defendants excepted, and brought the case to this court, where the judgment of the lower court was affirmed. Morel v. Hoge, 130 Ga. 625, 61 S. E. 487, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1136. In order to obtain a supersedeas, the defendants gave a bond in the sum of $5,000, payable to the plaintiffs, and containing the following condition: "Should the said principal obligors well and truly pay or cause to be paid to the said obligees all damages that may be sustained by said obligees by virtue of the issuing out of a bill of exceptions to the Supreme Court, and a granting of a supersedeas by the court, upon the giving of this bond as required by the court, in granting said supersedeas, in the mandamus case brought by the said obligees against the said obligors, in the superior court of said county of Screven, in which a mandamus absolute was granted by the judge of the superior court of said county on the 31st day of January, 1908, and the said principal obligors have filed their bill of exceptions to the Supreme Court of this state, then and in that event this bond to be void; otherwise, to be of force."

After the termination of the former case, suit was brought by the obligees in the bond against the obligors. It was alleged that, by reason of the exceptions to the Supreme Court and the granting of the supersedeas, Morel, acting as president, and two of the other defendants, "acting as superintendent," illegally and without authority, and contrary to the authority of the railroad company, remained in possession of the offices mentioned, to which others had been regularly and legally elected, and that they "were illegally and without the authority of said corporation paid out of the funds of said railroad corporation specified amounts," and "that by reason of said funds having been illegally paid to the said [named persons], they being in illegal possession of the offices aforesaid, the said railroad company has also been forced to pay to the officers, in whom legal possession of such offices was vested at the time aforesaid," an amount by way of salaries in addition to the funds paid out as above stated, thereby being forced to pay salaries twice. The defendants filed a general demurrer, which was overruled by the court, and they excepted.

J. W. Overstreet, for plaintiffs in error.
White & Lovett, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). Fairly construed, we understand the petition to mean that the defendants, after a judgment had been rendered against them, declaring that they were illegally holding the books, money, and property of the railroad company and ought to deliver them to the plaintiffs in the former proceeding, brought the case to this court, retained possession of the money and property, gave the bond above indicated in order that they might do so pending the exception to this court, and by virtue of the possession thus retained salaries were paid to the acting president and acting superintendents, who were no longer acting officers of the corporation, and that this was done without the authority of the railroad company. There was no special demurrer, but the defendants relied solely upon a general demurrer. If an illegal appropriation of the funds of the corporation to pay the salaries of persons acting as officers of the corporation, who were no longer lawfully in office, as had been declared by the judgment of the court, pending an exception to this court, did not fall within the terms of the bond, it is not easy to see just what damages were intended by the presiding judge in requiring it, or by the parties in giving it. According to the allegations of the plaintiffs in the present case, a person claiming to be the president of the company, but who had ceased to be such, and other defendants, held the money of the company in their possession while the case was in this court by virtue of the supersedeas bond given, and while the matter was in that condition some of the funds of the company were appropriated, or caused to be appropriated, to the payment of salaries to some of the defendants, who were not entitled thereto. The judgment of the superior court was affirmed, by which it had been directed that the defendants deliver up the books, money, and property of the company; but, pending exception, some of it had been appropriated to salaries for some of the defendants who had been found to be out of office. The present petition alleges that this was without authority of the corporation and contrary to its authority. We think that this makes a case of damages falling within the purpose and intent of the supersedeas bond. Waycross Air Line Ry. Co. v. Offerman & Western R. Co., 114 Ga. 727, 40 S. E. 738; Id., 119 Ga. 983, 47 S. E. 582.

It has been held by a number of courts that a de jure officer cannot recover from the government, or its subordinate corporations, the amount of salary paid to a de facto officer while the latter occupied the office and discharged its duties, although he was subsequently ousted at the instance of the de jure officer, but that the de jure officer, after judgment of ouster, might bring an action against the de facto officer for money had and received to his use. It has also been held that if the de facto officer, who is not de jure entitled to the office, brings suit against a municipality or county to recover his salary, the defendant may call in question his right to the office. It is unnecessary to discuss the question whether all the rulings made on this subject are theoretically logical, or the conflict which exists in the authorities in regard to some of these questions. For the present purpose it is enough to call attention to the fact that the basis on which many of the decisions in regard to public officers rest is the necessity for the government to proceed with the exercise of its functions and for the public to be able to deal with some person apparently rightfully discharging the duties of the office, and in order that this may be done, that the organized public in the form of the government itself may, if it sees fit, recognize the de facto officer and pay his salary while he discharges the duties of the office. See Mayfield v. Moore, 53 Ill. 423, 5 Am. Rep. 52; McCue v. County of Wapello, 56 Iowa, 698, 10 N. W. 248, 41 Am. Rep. 134; Dolan v. Mayor, etc., 68 N. Y. 280, 23 Am. Rep. 168; Commissioners of Saline County v. Anderson, 20 Kan. 298, 27 Am. Rep. 171. The present case does not involve a governmental corporation, but a case of an ex-president and ex-officials of a railroad corporation, remaining in possession and causing salaries to be paid to themselves, without authority of the company, pending an appeal from a judgment commanding them to deliver up the custody to their lawful successors. The rights of the public in dealing with de facto officers are not involved. According to the allegations, it is the persons claiming to be de facto officers of this railroad company, while seeking to reverse a judgment commanding them to deliver up its property, who are setting up their own de facto position as justifying payment to themselves of salaries from the funds of the company, without its authority. See Waterman v. Chicago & Iowa R. Co., 139 Ill. 658, 29 N. E. 689, 15 L. R. A. 418, 32 Am. St. Rep. 228.

We deal with this case as we find it under the allegations of the plaintiffs, which are admitted by the general demurrer, and do not discuss other questions not raised by the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

JOHNSON et al. v. BREWER et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 15, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS (§ 7)—WHAT CONSTITUTES—CONSTRUCTION OF INSTRUMENT.

Where a person borrowed money and gave a note therefor, with 16 accommodation indorsers and executed to 2 of them an absolute conveyance of real and personal property, in which they were "authorized to sell the same or any part thereof at private sale, or at public sale, for cash, paying the purchase price thereof on the promissory note," and to make such deeds, bills of sale, or other conveyances, in the name of the creditor, as might be necessary for carrying into effect the intention of the deed, and where it was provided that, if either of the grantees should fail or refuse to act in pursuance of the terms and conditions of the deed, the remaining grantee alone might do so, and that in the event of the death or resignation of both of them the indorsers should name a successor or successors, who should have all the powers of the original grantees, such a conveyance was a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, and a compliance with the essential requirements of the statute was necessary to its validity.

2. ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS (§ 7*)—CONSTRUCTION OF INSTRUMENT.

This is true although the deed declared that it was made in order to indemnify the indorsers against loss; "the intention of this deed being for the express purpose of vesting the title of the property herein conveyed in the said parties of the second part, for the use and benefit of them, the said indorsers." The instrument contained no clause of defeasance, and was not in the nature of a mortgage or mere security, but was an absolute conveyance to trustees to sell property and apply the proceeds to the payment of the note held by the creditor.

Error from Superior Court, Liberty County; P. E. Seabrook, Judge.

Action by C. G. Johnson and others against W. P. Brewer and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

W. T. Brewer, as tax collector of Liberty county, became indebted to it on account of taxes. In order to raise money to pay the amount thus due, he made a note to N. McQueen. On the same day, August 27, 1903, he executed a conveyance of certain real and personal property, including a mortgage held by him, to J. R. Ryon and C. W. Hendry; the instrument being executed like a deed, and duly attested and recorded. After the description of the property, it proceeded as follows: "To have and to hold the above-described realty and personalty unto them, the said parties of the second part, with all and singular the rights, members, and appurtenances thereto appertaining, to the only proper use, benefit, and behoof of them, the said parties of the second part, and their heirs and assigns, in fee simple. The condition of the above conveyance is such, that, whereas the said party of the first part has this day made his promissory note for the sum of $2,645 payable to N. McQueen, in which he has become indebted to said McQueen in the sum above named, which said promissory note has, by [sixteen named persons, two of whom were the grantees, been] indorsed, whereby the said indorsers have become liable for the payment of the amount of the said promissory note; now in order to indemnify them, the said indorsers against loss by reason of said indorsement, the said party of the first part has this day sold and conveyed to the said parties of the second part all of the above-described property, who are authorized to sell the same or any part thereof at private sale, or at public sale for cash, paying the purchase price thereof on the promissory note above described, and in my name to make or cause to be made all deeds, bills of sale, or such other conveyances as may be necessary for the carrying into effect the intention of this deed, in as full and complete a manner as the said party of the first part could have done. And should either of the parties herein named as parties of the second part for any reason fail and refuse to act in pursuance of the terms and conditions of this deed, then the remaining party therein named as party of the second part may act as if no other party had been named; and in the event of death or resignation of both of the parties of the second part, then the indorsers of the said promissory note above referred to, or a majority of the same, shall name a successor or successors who shall have all the powers herein granted to the said parties of the second part; the intention of this deed being for the express pur pose of vesting the title of the property hereinafter conveyed in the said parties of the second part, for the use and benefit of them, the said indorsers." At the time of the execution of this conveyance, Brewer was insolvent, and was not indebted to McQueen, Ryon, or Hendry in any other manner than as above stated. On June 18, 1904, Ryon and Hendry, by virtue of the power contained in the deed to them from Brewer, conveyed the property to McQueen for the recited consideration of "$1,800 cash in hand paid." Several creditors of Brewer filed an equitable petition attacking these conveyances. The facts were not in controversy, and it was agreed that the case would be controlled by a determination of the question whether the transaction constituted an assignment or only a deed to indemnify certain indorsers. The presiding judge held that the deed did not constitute an assignment, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendants. The plaintiffs excepted.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The word "assignment" has several meanings. In a broad sense it is used to signify the act by which one person transfers to another, or causes to vest in such other, the entire right, interest, or property which he has in any realty or personalty, in possession or in action, or some share, interest, or subsidiary estate therein. It is more particularly applied to a written transfer, as distinguished from a transfer by mere delivery. An assignment for the benefit of creditors has been defined to be "an assignment whereby a debtor, generally an insolvent, transfers to another his property, in trust to pay his debts or apply the property upon their payment." Black's L. Dic. The distinction between an assignment for the benefit of creditors and a conveyance to secure an indebtedness or to secure an indorser or security against loss is illustrated by two cases decided by this court in February, 1892. Kiser & Co. v. Dannenberg Co., 88 Ga. 541, 15 S. E. 17, and Importers' and Traders' Bank v. McGhees & Co., 88 Ga. 702, 16 S. E. 27. In the former case an insolvent debtor assigned to one of his creditors notes and accounts to the amount of about $3,000 as collateral security, and made to him a mortgage upon a stock of goods and other personal property to secure an indebtedness of $3,400, the mortgage containing a power to sell the goods at wholesale or retail; and the creditor, by contemporaneous writings, stipulated to pay off the debt of another creditor out of the proceeds of the notes, accounts, and mortgaged property, and also to pay over to such other creditor all the money realized over and above $2,000, and further that the stock when sold should bring 80 per cent. of invoice cost. It was held that the mortgage, together with the contemporaneous writings, constituted an assignment, and that it was void for failure to comply with the requirements of the statute on the subject of assignments for the benefit of creditors. In the opinion Mr. Justice Simmons said: "Whether the trust was merely for one of the defendants, or, as was contended, for the entire body of creditors, we need not consider. It is the element of trust which brings it within the statute. Nor does it matter that the conveyance was in form a mortgage. It is sufficient that the security inures not merely for the benefit of the mortgagee, but also to that of another creditor for whom he holds in trust." In the second of the two cases cited a mortgage was given by the principal debtor to his indorser, not as a security for the debt, but solely for the indemnity of the indorser, to secure him against any loss that he might sustain by reason of such indorsement. It was held that, under section 2164 of the Code of 1882 (section 2983 of the Civil Code of 1895), the indorser could not proceed against the mortgaged property until judgment had been rendered against him in favor of the creditor; and that prior to that time the creditor could not claim any right of subrogation to enforce the mortgage. In the opinion Chief Justice Bleckley said: "Notwithstanding decisions of some other courts to the contrary, there is manifestly no element of trust in a mortgage of this character. It does not by its own vigor devote or appropriate the property embraced in it to the payment of the debt, but only to the indemnity of the indorser in the event he should sustain loss by reason of his indorsement, and it is recited that he indorsed the notes for accommodation. The mortgage created a mere lien, and therefore could not raise any trust by reason of passing title into the mortgagee. It passed no title," under the law of this state.

In Hoffman v. Mackall, 5 Ohio St. 124, 64 Am. Dec. 637, an assignment or unconditional deed of trust was distinguished from a mortgage, or deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage, thus: "There is a manifest and well-settled distinction between an unconditional deed of trust and a mortgage, or deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage. The former is an absolute and indefeasible conveyance of the subject-matter thereof for the purposes expressed; whereas, the latter is conditional and defeasible. A mortgage is the conveyance of an estate, or pledge of property, as security for the payment of money or the performance of some other act, and conditioned to become void upon such payment or performance. A deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage is a conveyance in trust by way of security, subject to a condition of defeasance, or redeemable at any time before the sale of the property. A deed conveying land to a trustee as a mere collateral security for the payment of a debt, with the condition that it shall become void on the payment of the debt when due, and with power to the trustee to sell the land and pay the debt in case of default on the part of the debtor, is a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage. By an absolute deed of trust the grantor parts absolutely with the title, which rests in the grantee unconditionally for the purpose of the trust. The latter is a conveyance to a trustee for the purpose of raising a fund to pay debts, while the former is a conveyance in trust for the purpose of securing a debt, subject to a condition of defeasance." See, also, Crow v. Beardsley, 68 Mo. 435, 438; De Wolf v. Sprague Mfg. Co., 49 Conn. 282; Burrell on Assignments (6th Ed.) § 8.

Tested by the principles above announced, the deed from Brewer to Ryon and Hendry was a voluntary assignment. Brewer made a promissory note to McQueen, with 16 indorsers. Being insolvent at the time, he conveyed realty and personalty to 2 of these indorsers. It was stated in the deed that it was made in order to indemnify the indorsers against loss, and that it was for the express purpose "of vesting the title of the property herein conveyed in the said parties of the second part, for the use and benefit of them the said indorsers." But it was not conditioned upon the indorsers being held liable, or suffering loss. There was no clause of defeasance in case they did not have to pay the indebtedness or did not incur any loss. The conveyance was absolute. It was not a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage. The two grantees named were trustees to do certain acts. It was expressly declared that, if either of them failed or refused "to act in pursuance of the terms and conditions of this deed," the other should have power to do so; and that, in the event of the death or resignation of both of them, the indorsers should name a successor or successors, who should have all the powers of the original grantees. Clearly this created a trust with certain powers to be executed. What they were to do is thus stated in the deed: They "are authorized to sell the same or any part thereof at private sale, or at public sale for cash, paying the purchase price therefor on the promissory note above described, and in my name to make or cause to be made all deeds, bills of sale, or such other conveyances as may be necessary for the carrying into effect the intention of this deed." There was no conveyance by the debtor to the principal creditor, either in payment of the debt or to secure it. There was not a mere security given to the indorsers to indemnify them against loss. There was an absolute trust deed to two of the indorsers, with power in the trustees to sell and convey the property, and appropriate the proceeds to the payment of the note. Under such a deed, they could not exercise the power for any other purpose. Even precatory or recommendatory words will suffice to create a trust if they are sufficiently imperative to show that it is not left discretionary with the party to act or not, and if the subject-matter of the trust is defined with sufficient certainty, and if the object is also clearly defined, and the mode in which the trust is to be executed. Civ. Code, § 3162. While the primary purpose alleged for the making of the deed was the benefit of the indorsers, yet that benefit was to be worked out, without regard to any loss or payment by the indorsers or judgment against them, by means of a payment to the creditor, to be made by the trustees. This constituted an assignment.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HOLDEN, J., who dissents.

HOLDEN, J. I cannot concur in the judgment of the other members of the court, but must dissent therefrom. The deed in question expressly stated that it was made "in order to indemnify them, the said indorsers, against loss by reason of said indorsement," and further declares: "The intention of this deed being for the express purpose of vesting the title of the property herein conveyed in the said parties of the second part, for the use and benefit of them the said indorsers." The indorsers were not creditors of the grantor. The fact that authority was given for a sale of the property and the payment of the proceeds thereof to the payee of the note did not make the deed one of assignment. The cardinal rule of construction of instruments in writing is to arrive at the intention of the parties. The intention of the parties to this instrument was that the deed should operate merely as a security to the indorsers. As before stated, the deed expressly declares that it is made "in order to indemnify them, the said indorsers, against loss by reason of said indorsement," and Civ. Code, § 2983, provides: "If the principal executes any mortgage or gives other security to the surety or indorser to indemnify him against loss by reason of his suretyship, the surety or indorser may proceed to foreclose such mortgage, or enforce such other lien or security, as soon as judgment shall be rendered against him on his contract." In Importers' Bank v. McGhees, 88 Ga. 702, 708, 16 S. E. 27, 28, in discussing the section just quoted, the court says: "We think this prescribes a rule which was intended to be general, and that it comprehends all cases of the class mentioned. By clear implication it negatives any right of foreclosure until the surety or indorser has paid something on the debt, or judgment has been rendered against him on his contract. In the present case neither of these events has occurred. The indorser is consequently without any right to inaugurate any proceeding to foreclose the mortgage. As to him the mortgage is immature, there has been no breach of its condition, it is not yet due and payable, and may never become so. It logically follows that the creditor cannot proceed on his own behalf to enforce the mortgage, although the petition alleges that the indorser, as well as the principal debtors, is insolvent. Notwithstanding decisions of some other courts to the contrary, there is manifestly no element of trust in a mortgage of this character. It does not by its own vigor devote or appropriate the property embraced in it to the payment of the debt, but only to the indemnity of the indorser in the event he should sustain loss by reason of his indorsement, and it is recited that he indorsed the notes for accommodation." Under the Code section above quoted, the indorsers would have no right to exercise the power of sale contained in the deed to them until judgment had been rendered against them, or until they had paid the debt, or some part thereof. The deed recites that it was made "in order to indemnify them, the said indorsers, against loss by reason of said indorsement," and further recited: "The intention of this deed being for the express purpose of vesting the title of the property herein conveyed in the said parties of the second part, for the use and benefit of them, the indorsers." In view of these statements in the deed, and the provision of the Code section above quoted (the meaning of which is that the power of sale could not be exercised until judgment had been rendered against the indorsers or until they have paid the debt, or some part thereof), the deed, properly construed, conveyed the title to the property simply for the purpose of indemnifying the indorsers, and cannot properly be held to be an assignment for the benefit of any creditor or creditors of the maker of the deed.

ATLANTIC & B. R. CO. v. SUMNER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 24, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1061*)—HARMLESS ERROR—REFUSAL OF NONSUIT.

Whether a nonsuit could or could not have been properly awarded when the plaintiff closed his case, there being sufficient evidence, when the evidence was all in, to support the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, the refusal to grant a nonsuit affords no cause for a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4210; Dec. Dig. § 1061.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 368*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—PRIVATE MEMORANDA—COMPELLING PRODUCTION BY ADVERSE PARTY.

Where, on the trial of a civil case, the evidence was stenographically reported, but a mistrial was had, and in preparing for a second trial one side procured the stenographer to write out notes of the evidence, if this was done at the expense of such party and was its private memorandum, the presiding judge should not have required such party to deliver to the adversary party or his counsel such memorandum, unless it was either used in evidence by the party holding it, or witnesses were examined in relation thereto, or in some manner it became a document present in the courtroom which it was proper for the adverse party to have in order to introduce in evidence. One party or counsel should not ordinarily be required to deliver such private memoranda used in preparation for a trial to his adversary merely for the convenience of the latter, though in response to a notice to produce. But, under the facts as they appear in the motion for a new trial, it is not apparent that the ruling made was of such a character as to require a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1540, 1541; Dec. Dig. § 368.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 481*)—FIRES—ACTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Upon the trial of an action against a railroad company for the recovery of damages alleged to have been caused by the destruction of the plaintiff's property by fire started by sparks emitted from the smokestack of a particular locomotive operated by the defendant, it was competent for the plaintiff to show that all locomotives with straight smokestacks of the same construction as that on the engine alleged to have caused the fire threw out sparks.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1721, 1722; Dec. Dig. § 481.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1067*)—HARMLESS ERROR—REFUSAL OF REQUEST.

The refusal of the court, upon written request, to charge that the jury were not bound by the valuation of the property as testified to by witnesses, was not hurtful to the defendant, when the jury found for the plaintiff much less than the estimated value of the property according to the testimony of any witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4229; Dec. Dig. § 1067.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 302*)—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY OF GROUND.

A ground of a motion for a new trial which is equivalent to an assignment of error upon the whole charge is too general to present any question for determination, unless the whole charge appears to be erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1748; Dec. Dig. § 302.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 255*)—FIRES—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, upon the trial of a case of the character indicated in the third headnote, the charge to the jury covered the issues made by the pleadings, the court was not bound, in the absence of a timely written request, to instruct the jury that "defendant had a right to operate its trains by the use of steam produced by fire, and that persons placing combustible property close alongside the track . . . took chances of fire from locomotives equipped and operated with due caution on the part of the defendant."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 628-641; Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 260*)—FIRES—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Failure to charge that the presumption against a railroad company, arising from proof of injury caused by the running of its locomotives, machinery, etc., is a rebuttable presumption, is not cause for a new trial, when it appears that the judge charged section 2321 of the Civil Code of 1895 in its entirety, the language of which shows that the presumption therein referred to is rebuttable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

8. FAILURE TO CHARGE NOT ERROR.

Under the pleadings and evidence in this case, the failure of the court to charge upon the subject of contributory negligence, or as to the duty of one injured by the negligence of another to use ordinary care to diminish the extent of the injury, furnishes no ground for a new trial.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 216*)—HARMLESS ERROR—FAILURE TO CHARGE.

In an action brought against a railroad company for damages alleged to have been caused by fire arising from sparks emitted from one of its locomotives, where the charge of the court showed that the grounds of negligence on which the action was based were the improper construction of the locomotive and its improper handling at the time the injury occurred, and the judge gave in charge section 2321 of the Civil Code of 1895, in the absence of any request for a more specific instruction to the effect that the presumption arising against the company, upon proof that the damage was caused by the running of its locomotive, was only in respect to the acts of negligence charged in the petition, the failure to give such specific instruction furnishes no cause for a new trial. Georgia, Fla. & A. 10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1170)—REVIEW—INSTRUCTIONS.

Mere failure to charge the rule as to the preponderance of evidence affords no cause for a new trial. Georgia, Fla. & A. Ry. Co. v. Sumner, supra (1a).

DAVIS v. DAVIS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DIVORCE (§§ 50, 51*)—CONDONATION—EFFECT.

If a husband is guilty of cruel treatment toward his wife, or of adultery, and with full knowledge thereof she condones the offense and cohabits with him, and he is not guilty of any further misconduct, she cannot thereafter, at her mere will, desert him, and, if suit is brought against her for a divorce on the ground of willful and continued desertion for three years before the filing of the suit, set up the condoned acts, and thereby prevent the granting of a divorce.

(a) If after the condonation the conduct of the husband is such as to revive the condoned acts and give her a right to assert them, she is not debarred from so doing; nor is she prevented from setting up misconduct on his part after the condonation, for the consideration of the jury in determining whether a divorce should be granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 180-187; Dec. Dig. §§ 50, 51.*]

2. DIVORCE (§§ 238, 239*)—ALIMONY TO WIFE—ALLOWANCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Under the statutes of this state (Civ. Code 1895, § 2435), although a husband may obtain a divorce from his wife on the ground of willful and continued desertion for more than three years before the filing of the suit, it is not an inflexible rule of law that the wife shall not be allowed alimony. On the other hand, it does not follow that the divorced wife would be entitled to alimony as of course, when her conduct has been grossly improper and caused her husband to obtain a total divorce from her.

(a) Under the facts of the present case, the judge should have submitted to the jury the question of whether alimony should be allowed to the wife, if a divorce should be granted to the husband.

Action by Hugh F. Davis against Marie A. Davis. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Oliver & Oliver, for plaintiff in error. Robt. L. Colding, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Hugh F. Davis brought suit against his wife, Marie A. Davis, for divorce on the ground of willful and continued desertion for more than three years. She denied the allegation of the plaintiff, and, by way of cross-libel, alleged that the plaintiff had deserted her, had cruelly treated her, and had been guilty of adultery. She prayed that a divorce be granted to her, and that she have a judgment for alimony. The jury found for the plaintiff a total divorce. In the second verdict they declared: "We fix the rights and disabilities of the parties as follows: That neither of the parties be at liberty to marry again." The defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and she excepted.

1. "Condonation" has been defined to be the forgiveness, either express or implied, by a husband of his wife, or by a wife of her husband, for a breach of marital duty, with an implied condition that the offense shall not be repeated. Webster's Dictionary; Odom v. Odom, 36 Ga. 286. Voluntary condonation and cohabitation subsequently to the acts complained of, and with notice thereof, prevents the grant of a divorce on account of them. Civ. Code 1895, § 2429. But if the implied condition be broken, the right to set up such wrongful acts is revived, and the innocent party is not prevented from obtaining a divorce. What character of misconduct will serve to revive the right to rely upon acts previously condoned, and whether 't is necessary that such reviving acts shall be sufficient to furnish a ground for divorce, is not here involved. Ozmore v. Ozmore, 41 Ga. 46; 14 Cyc. 642. If, however, there is no breach of the condition after condonation and cohabitation, the forgiveness stands as complete and absolute. The condoning party cannot forgive the acts, and cohabit voluntarily with the forgiven one, and at the same time reserve the right to assert them as a means of obtaining a divorce, if there be no further misconduct, or as a screen to prevent a divorce being obtained on account of subsequent breaches of marital duty by such condoning party. To permit this would be to attach a different condition to condonation from that which the law attaches, and to make forgiveness such only in name. Condonation is not revocable at will.

It was argued that section 2429 of the Civil Code 1895, above cited, closes with the words: "And in all cases, the party sued may plead in defense the conduct of the party suing, and the jury may, on examination of the whole case, refuse a divorce." This statement follows certain provisions to the effect that "if the adultery, desertion, cruel treatment, or intoxication complained of shall have been occasioned by the collusion of the parties and with the intention of causing a divorce, or if the party complaining was consenting thereto, or if both parties have been guilty of like conduct, or if there has been a voluntary condonation and cohabitation subsequent to the acts complained of, and with notice thereof, then no divorce shall be granted." The last clause of the section (quoted first above) was not intended to destroy entirely the effects of the condonation, so that a person, after condoning a ground for divorce and cohabiting with the offender, could at some later period, and with no further reason, desert the person so forgiven, persist in such desertion for the statutory period, and yet prevent a divorce by reason of the condoned acts. If there were a breach of the implied condition on the part of the person whose offense had been condoned, or if there were other acts or grounds authorizing the refusal of the divorce, this could be pleaded and proved for the consideration of the jury. The charge of the court on this subject was not erroneous.

2. The court charged the jury that, if they found a total divorce for the plaintiff, they would put their verdict in a certain form, "and, in that event, you would not allow the defendant alimony." This in effect instructed the jury, as a rule of law, that, if they should find a total divorce in favor of the husband against the wife, they would allow the latter no alimony. At common law (including in that term the canon or ecclesiastical law) the ecclesiastical courts did not grant total divorces except for such cause as rendered the marriage void ab initio. This was rather an adjudication that there had never been a binding marriage than a dissolution of one originally valid. Partial divorces were granted on account of adultery and cruel treatment. Prior to 1858 in England no judicial divorces dissolving the bonds of matrimony, if originally valid, were allowed. Parliament exercised that authority. In its origin alimony was the method by which the spiritual courts enforced the duty of support owed by a husband to his wife during such time as they were legally separated. It was not an incident to declaring the marriage void ab initio, since, if there were no marriage, the duty of maintenance had not been undertaken. The question of awarding alimony upon the dissolution of a valid marriage for a postnuptial cause could not therefore have been decided in England prior to the time when the common law was adopted in this state. In regard to partial divorces it has been declared that where the wife, by her fault, forfeited all claim upon her husband for necessities or other support, and he obtained a divorce from her on that ground, she could not, after this fact had been adjudged against her, have alimony from him. Thus where a divorce was granted to a husband on account of the adultery of the wife, she was held to be entitled to no alimony: 3 Bl. Com. 94. As late as 1859, in White v. White, 24 Jurist, 28, upon the granting of a petition for a judicial separation presented by a man against his wife, on account of her violent and cruel conduct towards him, Cresswell, Judge Ordinary, held that the wife was entitled to no permanent alimony, saying that he found no precedent for granting it in such case. But in 1864, in Prichard v. Prichard, Law Times Reports, 789, Wilde, Judge Ordinary, overruled the decision in the White Case and another similar case, saying: "I am aware of the cases to which you allude, but I think if there is no precedent I ought to make one."

It has been decided by a number of courts that, in the absence of any statute, if a divorce be granted to a husband against the wife, she is not entitled to alimony. This at times worked a great hardship on the wife, especially under the common law, where the marital right of the husband attached to her property; and, while it was said to be strict justice, it was also said that it sometimes drove the wife to starvation or a life of shame. The English Parliament adopted a practice, when granting to a husband a total divorce, of requiring him to make some provision for his wife. In England, and in a number of the United States, statutes have been enacted which authorize the courts to grant alimony to wives against whom judgments of divorce are rendered, or to require some other provision to be made by the husbands, when the courts deem it best. In some of these statutes the provision is express, in others the terms are general; but the courts have construed them to have the effect above indicated. Where, under the statute, discretion is vested in the court, it is to be exercised with care. In such jurisdictions it has been said to be the exception, rather than the rule, that the wife shall cause the matrimonial tie to be sundered by reason of her own conduct, and still have alimony; but, on the other hand, that the wife may have collaborated with her husband in acquiring the property held by the latter, that she may have greatly aided in establishing his fortune, that her conduct may not have been justifiable, so as to prevent a divorce, and yet the conduct of the husband may not have been exemplary. She may have no property, and be broken in health. In other words, under such statutes, while the law does not hold out to a wife who deserts the matrimonial domicile the promise of a right to alimony, but rather discourages divorces coupled with pecuniary claims upon the part of the party at fault, yet there may be circumstances which may render it just and proper that some alimony should be allowed to the wife, although the divorce should be granted against her. In such instances the judge or the jury, as the case may be, in passing upon the question of alimony should take into consideration the situation and circumstances of the parties, the property owned by them respectively, the conduct of each, and all the facts which would throw light on the proper exercise of the discretionary power. 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 861 et seq., and citations.

The question is: Where does Georgia take position on this subject? At first the Legislature granted total divorces. The first general rule in regard to the matter which the writer has found laid down is contained in the Constitution of 1798 (article 3, § 9), where it was declared: "Divorces shall not be granted by the Legislature, until the parties shall have had a fair trial before the superior court, and a verdict shall have been obtained, authorizing a divorce upon legal principles. In such cases, two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature may pass acts of divorce accordingly." Marbury & Crawford's Dig. 29. By the act of December 5, 1806 (Cobb's Dig. p. 224), it was declared that in all cases where the jury "shall determine in favor of a conditional divorce, they shall by their verdict or decree make provision, out of the property of which the husband may be possessed, for the separate maintenance and support of the wife and the issue of such marriage, which verdict or decree the said court shall cause to be carried into effect according to the rules of law, or according to the practice of chancery, as the nature of the case may require." By amendment to the Constitution divorces were made final and conclusive upon the concurrent verdicts of two special juries, authorizing a divorce upon such legal principles "as the General Assembly may by law prescribe." The last of these amendments doubtless resulted from the decision in Head v. Head, 2 Ga. 191. See, also, Cobb's Dig. 1123. By the act of February 22, 1850 (Cobb's Dig. p. 226), the grounds of divorce, both total and partial, were declared. These are now embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 2426 et seq. The Constitution of 1861 contained the following provision: "The superior court shall have exclusive jurisdiction in all cases of divorce, both total and partial; but no total divorce shall be granted except on the concurrent verdicts of two special juries. In each divorce case, the court shall regulate the rights and disabilities of the parties." Code 1861, § 4974. Thus the entire subject of granting divorces and alimony became fixed by constitutional provision in the superior court, and ceased to be a matter of legislative grant. By the act of 1806 (Cobb's Dig. p. 225) requirement had been made that the party applying for a divorce should file a schedule of the property owned by the parties respectively, and that, after all just debts had been paid, it should be subject to a division or equal distribution between the children of such parties, unless the jury should think proper to allow either party a part thereof. When the first Code was adopted, instead of providing for a division of the property, it was declared that: "In all suits for divorce, the party applying shall render a schedule, on oath, of the property owned or possessed by the parties at the time of the application—or at the time of the separation, if the parties have separated—distinguishing the separate estate of the wife, if there be any, which shall be filed with the petition, or pending the suit, under the order of the court. The jury rendering the final verdict in the cause may provide permanent alimony for the wife, either from the corpus of the estate or otherwise, according to the condition of the husband and the source from which the property came into the coverture." Code 1861, § 1676. This language, "in all suits for divorce * * * the jury * * * may provide permanent alimony for the wife," has been preserved and again adopted in section 2435 of the Civil Code of 1895, although the husband's marital right no longer attaches to the wife's property. Perhaps the possibility that the labor and services of the wife may have contributed to build up the fortune of the husband may have been in the legislative mind. Thus it will be seen that the trend of legislation in Georgia has not been to restrict the powers of the jury or to confine them rigidly to the rule that, if a divorce shall be granted to the husband against his wife, no provision for her support shall be made. The authority given to the jury by the act of 1806 to divide the property among the children, but to make an allowance to either party, should they think proper, and the later provisions in regard to the powers of the jury, negative the idea of an absolute limitation in regard to alimony if a divorce should be granted to the husband.

In Campbell v. Campbell, 90 Ga. 687, 16 S. E. 960, Mr. Justice Simmons said: "A wife is entitled to support by her husband until the right is forfeited by her own misconduct; and in some cases alimony has been allowed her even where the divorce was in favor of the husband." He also said that in this state the right of a wife to a provision by the husband in her favor is the same, whether the divorce is from bed and board only or a total dissolution of the marriage—at least if a valid marriage has subsisted. In that case the divorce was granted on the application of the wife. We have not overlooked the fact that section 2462 of the Civil Code 1895 says that: "If the jury, on the second or final verdict, find in favor of the wife, they shall also, in providing permanent alimony for her, specify what amount the minor children shall be entitled to for their permanent support, * * * and this they may also do if, from any legal cause, the wife may not be entitled to permanent alimony, and the children are not in the same category." We do not think that the expression, "if the jury, on the second or final verdict, find in favor of the wife," means that in no event can alimony be awarded unless the wife shall obtain a divorce. In such a case, the law provides, in awarding alimony to her, for specifying the amount to which the minor children should be entitled; and also for finding alimony for the children, should she be debarred from obtaining it for any legal reason. That section was derived from the act of October 28, 1870 (Acts 1870, p. 413). Its title was "An act to extend the provision for alimony to the family of the husband; to provide for the custody of the children, and for other purposes, connected therewith." Under section 2478 of the Civil Code, the husband is bound for necessities furnished to his wife when living separate from him; but, if she voluntarily abandons him without sufficient provocation, notice by the husband shall relieve him of all liability for necessities furnished to her. This deals with the authority of the wife, as matter of right, to charge her husband with necessities, when living separate from him. It does not deal with divorce cases, or the power of the judge to award temporary alimony, or absolutely prevent a jury from allowing permanent alimony in a proper case. They may allow it or refuse it, or may allow less than full maintenance, according to circumstances.

The construction of statutes of one state often throws little light on the construction of those of another, as a slight difference in language may make a great difference in construction. But an examination of the statutes of other states and their construction by the courts show that the trend of authority is in harmony with this decision. In Deenis v. Deenis, 79 Ill. 74, a statute was under consideration which declared that, "when a di-vorice shall be decreed, it shall and may be lawful for the court to make such order touching the alimony and maintenance of the wife, the care, custody, and support of the children, or any of them, as from the circumstances of the parties and the nature of the case shall be fair, reasonable, and just." It was held that alimony might be allowed, notwithstanding the divorce was granted for the fault of the wife. The opinion of Mr. Justice Scholfield strongly presents the grounds of equity and justice for such a construction. In Spitler v. Spitler, 108 Ill. 120, the former ruling was adhered to; but it was said that it was not the object of the Legislature in adopting the provision of the statute relating to alimony to abrogate the general principles or policy of the law relating to that subject, but rather to clothe the court with power to mitigate occasional hardships that might otherwise occur. In Graves v. Graves, 108 Mass. 314, 317, a somewhat similar statute of Massachusetts was construed, and it was held that alimony might be awarded to the wife upon granting to the husband a divorce for her fault. Gray, J., clearly stated the reason for giving such a construction to the statute.

An application for temporary alimony is made to the presiding judge pending the litigation. He is vested with considerable discretion on the subject. It is sometimes granted where permanent alimony is ultimately refused, on the ground that the wife must be maintained and furnished reasonable opportunity for pressing her suit or defending herself against charges made against her. If she willfully deserts her husband without cause, this may furnish a ground for refusing temporary alimony, in the discretion of the judge; and in some cases, where the separation was clearly shown to have resulted from the adultery of the wife, or to have been without any shadow of excuse, and there were other circumstances of hardship in requiring the husband to thus support her, it has been held to be an abuse of discretion to allow her alimony. Vinson v. Vinson, 94 Ga. 492, 19 S. E. 898; Kendrick v. Kendrick, 105 Ga. 38, 31 S. E. 115; Williams v. Williams, 114 Ga. 772, 40 S. E. 782.

In this case the evidence of the wife tended to show bad conduct on the part of the husband; that she had always helped support the family by sewing; that her eyesight was failing, and her health was becoming so poor that she was scarcely able to do any work, and was not able to support herself without assistance; and there was evidence tending to show that the husband was able-bodied and earned about $18 per week. It was admitted in the pleadings that neither the husband nor the wife had any property. We do not mean that courts or juries should make matrimonial dissensions attractive as a source of profit. The reverse is true. It was declared by McCay, J., as long ago as 1872 (Hill

v. HUL, 47 Ga. 332, 336), that "suits for divorce and alimony ought not to be encouraged."

The jury might perhaps have found against the present plaintiff's application for alimony; but under the evidence the judge erred in declaring, as a fixed rule of law, that, if the jury found a divorce for the husband on the ground of desertion, the wife would be entitled to no alimony.

4. The verdict was somewhat unusual in form; but it is unnecessary to deal with that point, as the case is to be tried again on its merits.

Judgment reversed.

FISH, C. J., and ATKINSON, J., dissent.
The other Justices concur.

FISH, C. J. I am constrained to dissent from the proposition announced in the second headnote to the opinion of the majority of the court. I understand the rule to be that, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, permanent alimony will not be awarded a wife when a decree for divorce is rendered against her. 14 Cyc. 767; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 118 (3). The provisions of sections 2435, 2462, and 2478 of the Civil Code of 1895, quoted in the opinion, when construed in pari materia, do not, in my opinion, change the rule. If, under the law of this state, a husband is not bound for necessities furnished his wife if she be living in adultery with another man (Civ. Code 1895, § 2478), and if temporary alimony cannot be awarded a wife where the separation has been caused solely by adultery on her part (Williams v. Williams, 114 Ga. 772, 40 S. E. 782), I am unable to understand why the husband should be required to support her by the payment of permanent alimony when he procures a divorce from her because of her adultery, or because of her guilt in any other respect authorizing a divorce. I am authorized by Justice ATKINSON to state that he concurs in this dissent.

CLARK, County Treasurer, v. EVE.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. STATUTES (§ 124*)—SUBJECTS AND TITLES.

The act of 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 201) prescribed the salary for the judge of the city court of Savannah and defined his duties, which were purely judicial. The act of 1881 (Acts 1880-81, p. 574) established the city court of Richmond county, provided for the appointment of a judge and a solicitor, prescribed the salary for the judge, and defined his duties, which were purely judicial. The act of 1883 (Acts 1882-83, p. 524) declared that the judge of the city court of Richmond county should be ex officio commissioner of roads and revenue for that county, and declared his duties as such relating to county matters. The act of 1886 (Acts 1886, p. 264) prescribed the compensation for his duties in the management of the county business. All of these acts were in effect at the date of the passage of the act approved August 15, 1905. (Acts 1905, p. 100), the caption and body of which are as follows: "An act to fix the salary of the judges of the city courts of the state in counties where there are cities having a population of not less than 39,000 nor more than 75,000, to provide for the payment of such salary, and for other purposes. Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of Georgia, and it is hereby enacted by authority of the same, that from and after the passage of this act, the judge of the city courts in all counties having therein a city with a population of not less than 39,000 nor more than 75,000, according to the United States census of 1900, shall have an annual salary of $5,000, payable in monthly installments, out of the treasury in such counties in the same manner as the judges of said courts are now paid. The salary herein provided for shall cover all duties incident to, or connected with, the office of judge of the city courts of the state, whether said duties are provided for in local or general acts. Section 2. Be it further enacted, that all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act be and the same are hereby repealed as far as they conflict." At the date of the passage of the act just quoted, only the counties of Chatham and Richmond had therein cities having population of not less than 39,000 nor more than 75,000 according to the United States census of 1900. Held, that the existence of the several acts above mentioned at the time of the passage of the act of 1905, supra, did not render the latter act obnoxious to article 3, § 7, par. 8, of the Constitution (Civ. Code, § 5771), which provides that no law shall pass which refers to more than one subject-matter; nor to article 3, § 7, par. 8, of the Constitution (Civ. Code, § 5771), which prohibits the passage of an act which contains in the body thereof matter not expressed in the caption.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 184, 186; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

2. COUNTIES (§ 151*)—LIMITATION OF INDEBTEDNESS—SUBMISSION OF QUESTION TO VOTERS.

The act of 1905, above set out, does not violate article 7, § 7, par. 1, of the Constitution (Civ. Code, § 5893), on the ground that it creates a new debt of $5,000 a year in favor of the judge of the city court of Richmond county without the assent thereto of two-thirds of the qualified voters of the county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 218; Dec. Dig. § 151.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 8½*)—LOCAL ACTS—PUBLICATION OF NOTICE—LEGISLATIVE QUESTION.

If it be conceded that the act of August 15, 1905, supra, was a local act of the character requiring publication, under the provisions of article 3, § 7, par. 16, of the Constitution (Civ. Code, § 5778), the question of whether or not it had been duly published was a legislative question, and will not be inquired into by the courts. Speer v. Athens, 85 Ga. 49, 11 S. E. 802, 9 L. R. A. 402; Burge v. Mangum, 134 Ga. —, 67 S. E. 857; White v. City of Atlanta, 134 Ga. —, 68 S. E. 103.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 8½.*]

4. COUNTIES (§ 190*)—TAXATION—POWER TO LEVY—"EXPENSES OF COURT."

The act approved August 15, 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 100), was not violative of article 7, § 8, par. 2, of the Constitution (Civ. Code, § 5892), on the ground that the section of the Constitution referred to restricted the purposes for which county taxes might be levied in such manner as to exclude from them the power to levy a county tax for the purpose of paying the salary of the judge of the city court of Richmond county. Among the purposes for which county taxes might be levied under that provision of the Constitution is one for the payment of "expenses of court." Article 3, § 1, par. 1, of the Constitution (Civ. Code, § 5831), provides that the judicial powers of this state shall be vested in a supreme court, superior courts, courts of ordinary, justices of the peace, commissioned notaries public, and such other courts as may be established by law. Paragraph 5 of the same article (Civ. Code, § 5836), providing for writs of error, declares that they may be taken from the superior courts and from the city courts of Atlanta and Savannah, and such other like city courts as may be established in other cities. Thus the power to create local city courts is recognized in the Constitution. At the time of the adoption of the constitutional provision above mentioned, city courts were in existence, and the salaries of the judges were paid by local taxation. The recognition of such courts by the Constitution also embraces the recognition of the organization thereof and the manner of payment of the salaries of the judges. The several provisions of the Constitution above mentioned should be construed together, and, so construing them, salaries of judges of the city courts may be properly classed as expenses of court within the meaning of the Constitution relative to the levy of taxes by counties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 300; Dec. Dig. § 190.*]

5. CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION IMMATERIAL.

Attacks were made upon the constitutionality of the act of July 31, 1906 (Acts 1906, pp. 58, 59). This act purports to amend the act of August 15, 1905, quoted in the first headnote, by striking therefrom the words "nor more than 75,000," thus leaving the act of 1905 applicable to all counties having cities therein with a population of not less than 39,000. The act did not purport to do more. At the time of its passage the only city in the county of Richmond having a population of not less than 39,000 was the city of Augusta, which had a population of 39,441. Hence the act of 1905 was applicable to the county of Richmond, without regard to the amending act of 1906; and it becomes immaterial to inquire into the constitutionality of the latter act upon any ground of attack.

6. COUNTIES (§§ 165, 197*)—CLAIMS—COMPENSATION OF JUDGES—NECESSITY FOR WARRANT—PAYMENT—MANDAMUS.

Formerly it was provided that justices of the inferior courts "must audit all claims against their respective counties, and every claim, or such part thereof as may be allowed, must be registered by the clerk, and said justices must give the claimant an order on the treasurer for the amount." Irwin's Code 1867, § 540. By subsequent acts of the Legislature all of the powers of the justices of the inferior court in Richmond county relative to county matters were vested successively in other county officers, and finally, by the act approved August 19, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 324), the board of commissioners of roads and revenues for the county of Richmond, became vested with those powers. The act of 1825 (Cobb's Dig. p. 211, § 4), which has never been repealed, declared: "It shall be the duty of the county treasurer to pay without delay all warrants passed by the inferior court and directed to him, provided he has funds so to do, and shall upon paying same take receipt upon such order for his justification, and shall keep the same on file in his office." For a number of years, while the plaintiff was judge of the city court of Richmond county and ex officio commissioner of roads and revenue in Richmond county, he drew his salary by orders approved by himself as county commissioner and presented to the county treasurer as warrants, and no salary was paid to him without a warrant. Held, that the enactments above referred to, and the custom observed in the matter of collecting from the treasurer of the county the salary of the judge of the city court and ex officio commissioner of roads and revenues above described, were not sufficient to justify the treasurer of Richmond county in refusing payment of the salary of the judge of the city court of Richmond county for the month of December, 1909, on the ground that he failed to present a formal warrant for the same.

(a) Under the provisions of the act approved August 15, 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 100), as applicable to the county of Richmond, the salary of the judge of the city court of Richmond became fixed by law, payable out of the county treasury in monthly installments; and it was unnecessary for the judge of the city court to have his claim for salary audited and a warrant on the county treasurer issued therefor. See Gamble v. Clark, 92 Ga. 696, 19 S. E. 54; Lamb v. Toomer, 91 Ga. 621, 17 S. E. 966; Chatham County v. Gaudry, 120 Ga. 121, 47 S. E. 634, and citations. Upon the refusal to pay, mandamus will lie against the treasurer of the county to compel payment of any part of the salary when by law it is payable and after it has been demanded, although at the time of making demand no formal warrant had issued therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 246, 247, 309-311; Dec. Dig. §§ 165, 197.*]

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Mandamus by William F. Eve against W. A. Clark, treasurer of Richmond county. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Wm. F. Eve, being judge of the city court of Richmond county, instituted suit for a writ of mandamus against Walter A. Clark, as treasurer, to compel the payment of the sum of $416.68, alleged to be due as his salary for the month of December, 1909. The claim was based on the act approved August 15, 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 100), as amended by the act approved July 31, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 58), it being alleged that the acts referred to provided for the payment of a salary amounting to $5,000 annually, payable in monthly installments, out of the treasury of the county. The defendant filed a plea in bar, and also a demurrer, in which the acts of the Legislature above mentioned were attacked as being void, on the ground that they were violative of the Constitution in several particulars fully set forth. The defendant also filed an answer, wherein certain of the allegations of the petition were admitted and others denied; and set up further that there was no legal duty upon the treasurer to pay the demand referred to in the plaintiff's petition, because under the several acts defining the duties of the treasurer he was required to pay only such demands as were audited and ordered paid by the board of county commissioners, and that the plaintiff's demand had not been approved by the county commissioners and ordered paid. Later, the defendant amended his answer, alleging that during his tenure of office, which commenced in 1897, the plaintiff had been commissioner of roads and revenues of the county, and that it had been customary for the plaintiff to present warrants issued by the county commissioners for the payment of his salary, and that he had never been paid any salary except upon warrant. In the amendment further reasons were urged as showing the unconstitutionality of the acts of the Legislature relied upon by plaintiff to establish the amount of his salary. On the trial the judge passed an order making the mandamus absolute, and required the defendant to pay over the sum demanded. The defendant excepted.

Salem Dutcher and Wm. H. Fleming, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Lamar and Austin Branch, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

CLARK, County Treasurer, v. HAMMOND.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

JUDGES (§ 22*)—COMPENSATION.

Under a proper construction of article 6, § 13, pars. 1, 2, of the Constitution of 1877, salaries of the judges of the superior courts are payable exclusively from the state treasury. In so far as the Act of 1904, p. 73, as amended by the Acts of 1905, p. 100, and the Act of 1906, p. 56, purports to supplement salaries of the judges of the superior courts from county treasuries it is void.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Mandamus by H. C. Hammond against W. A. Clark, Treasurer of Richmond County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Henry C. Hammond, being judge of the superior courts of the Augusta circuit, instituted suit for a writ of mandamus against Walter A. Clark, as treasurer of Richmond county, to compel the payment of $106.66, alleged to be due for part of his salary as judge for the month of December, 1909. It was alleged that the petitioner was entitled to a salary of $5,000 per annum, $3,000 to be paid by the state and $2,000 by the county of Richmond, under certain acts of the Legislature. The defendant filed a plea in bar and a demurrer, in which the acts of the Legislature relied upon by the plaintiff as authorizing the payment of that part of the salary alleged to be due were attacked as being void on the ground that they were violative of the Constitution in several particulars fully set forth. The defendant also filed an answer, wherein certain of the allegations of the petition were admitted and others denied, and set up further that there was no legal duty upon the treasurer to pay the demand referred to in the plaintiff's petition, because under the several acts defining the duties of the treasurer he was required to pay only such demands as were audited and ordered paid by the board of county commissioners, and that the plaintiff's demand had not been approved by the county commissioners and ordered paid. On the trial a certain document was admitted in evidence over objection and exception taken. The judge passed an order making the mandamus nisi absolute, and required the defendant to pay over the sum demanded. The defendant excepted.

Salem Dutcher and Wm. H. Fleming, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Lamar and Austin Branch, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. 1. The law relied on as a basis for the writ of mandamus was the act approved August 6, 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 73), as amended by the act approved August 15, 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 100), and later by the act approved July 31, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 56). As thus amended the act declared, among other things, the following: "That the judges of the superior courts of all the judicial circuits, which are now or may hereafter be established in this state, having therein a city with a population of not less than 34,000 inhabitants, according to the United States census of 1900, shall receive a salary of five thousand dollars per annum, the difference in amount between the sum paid said judges out of the treasury of the state, and said five thousand dollars to be paid out of the treasury of the counties in which said cities are located, as other court expenses of said counties are paid; provided, that the provisions of this act shall not affect the salaries of such judges as are now in commission." One ground of attack upon the validity of this statute was that it was violative of article 6, § 13, par. 1, of the Constitution of the state of Georgia (Civ. Code 1895, § 5864), because under that provision of the Constitution salaries of the judges of the superior courts were required to be paid out of the treasury of the state exclusively, and that the Legislature was prohibited from making any part of the salary chargeable upon the county treasury. The provision of the Constitution referred to is as follows: "The judges of the Supreme Court shall have, out of the treasury of the state, salaries not to exceed three thousand dollars per annum; the judges of the superior courts shall have salaries not to exceed two thousand dollars per annum; the Attorney General shall have a salary not to exceed two thousand dollars per annum; and the Solicitors General each shall have salaries not to exceed two hundred and fifty dollars per annum; but the Attorney General shall not have any fee or perquisite in any cases arising after the adoption of this Constitution; but the provisions of this section shall not affect the salaries of those now in office." Under the view we take of the case, the decision is controlled by the construction to be placed upon this clause of the Constitution. Article 3, § 2, of the Constitution of 1798, declared: "The judges shall have salaries, adequate to their services, established by law, which shall not be increased or diminished during their continuance in office; but shall not receive any other perquisites or emoluments whatever, from parties or others, on account of any duty required of them." Watkins' Dig. p. 89. Thus it was declared at that early date that judges of the superior courts should have salaries, but nothing was said as to the source from which they should be paid. Subsequent enactments by the Legislature provided the amount of the salaries, and designated that they were "payable quarterly out of any money in the treasury." Act 1804 (Clayton's Dig. p. 178); Act 1819 (Cobb's Dig. p. 1023). Later, the act of 1857 (page 129) increased the salaries of the judges of the superior courts, but did not specify expressly the source from which they should be paid. In 1865 the Constitution again dealt with the matter, making provision with reference thereto substantially the same as those contained in the Constitution of 1798, as appears in the foregoing excerpt. See Const. 1865, art. 4, § 3, par. 1 (Irwin's Code 1867, § 4975). The Constitution being silent as to the source from which the salary should be paid, provision was made, in section 8 of the act approved March 13, 1866 (Acts 1865-66, p. 11), for a standing appropriation to pay the salaries of all the officers of this state, whose salaries are fixed by law, out of the general taxes. This included, among others, the salaries of the judges of the superior courts. It thus appears that up to 1866 the salaries of the judges of the superior courts had never been paid elsewhere than out of the state treasury, though the Constitution had not declared in express terms the source from which they should be paid. It was not until 1868 that the Constitution declared, in so many words, that they were payable from the state treasury. By article 5, § 10, par. 1, of the Constitution of 1868 (Code 1873, § 5113), it was declared: "The judges of the Supreme and superior courts, and the Attorney and Solicitors General shall have, out of the state treasury, adequate and honorable salaries on the specie basis, which shall not be increased or diminished during their continuance in office. The district judges and district attorneys shall receive, out of the treasuries of the several counties of their districts, adequate compensation, on the specie basis, which shall not be increased or diminished during their term of office; but said judges shall not receive any other perquisites, or emoluments whatever, from parties, or others, on account of any duty required of them." The introduction of district courts into the state's judicial system, with the salaries of the judges intended to be payable out of the county treasuries, furnished a sufficient reason for the makers of the Constitution to exercise greater particularity in specifying the source from which judicial salaries should be paid. As the different courts were intended to be paid from separate sources, the source from which each was intended to be paid was expressly and explicitly stated. After the district courts were abolished (Acts 1871-72, p. 68), the fact of their introduction in the manner above indicated no longer afforded a reason for the same particularity in designating the source from which the salaries of the judges of the other courts should be paid. No other law was made on the subject by any of the lawmaking powers until action was taken by the constitutional convention which assembled in 1877. At that time the provision was made which we are now undertaking to construe. In the debates before the convention no reference was made to the source from which the salaries of the judges of the superior courts should be paid. See Small's Notes of the Constitutional Convention of Georgia, pp. 246, 247.

It thus appears from the history of the subject, as derived from the provisions of all the Constitutions and acts of the Legislature with reference thereto, that there was an uninterrupted practice upon the part of the lawmaking powers, up to the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1877, of making provision for payment of the salaries of the judges of the superior courts out of the treasury of the state. There was never any suggestion that the salaries might be paid from different sources, but the uniform practice was to provide for payment of each salary as a whole from one source—the treasury of the state. When the Constitution of 1877 came to deal with the subject, the district court no longer being a factor, the language was varied somewhat, as set forth in article 6, § 13, par. 1, of that Constitution, as quoted above. In that clause of the Constitution of 1877, the words "out of the state treasury" were employed in immediate connection with the provision for salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court, but were not repeated in such connection with any of the other salaries mentioned. This change in the phraseology in the Constitution of 1877 from that of previous Constitutions was no doubt the result of the introduction into the Constitution of 1865 of district courts, and the abolition of those courts by the act of 1871, supra. As stated before, the salaries of the judges of the district courts were intended to be paid out of the county treasuries, and consequently particular language was employed in the Constitution of 1865, but when those courts were abolished in 1872, and there was no longer a necessity for payment of salaries from county treasuries, the language of the Constitution of 1877 on the subject was again changed, so that it more nearly resembled the language employed in previous Constitutions. Except for the advent and passing from the judicial system of the state of the district courts, the language of the Constitution of 1877, in regard to the payment of salaries of the judges of the superior courts, would probably have been as embraced in the Constitution of 1798, and substantially repeated in the Constitution of 1865, which merely provided that salaries should be paid without designating the source of payment. The omission of the Constitution of 1877 to repeat the words "out of the state treasury" in immediate connection with the salaries of each of the officers, other than the judges of the Supreme Court, could hardly be said to signify any intent that those salaries might be paid from any other source than the state treasury. The language of the act of 1906, quoted above, which is attacked as being unconstitutional, recognizes that the salaries theretofore payable to judges of the superior courts were payable out of the state treasury, and refers to that fact in express language. The uniform practice, for so many years, of paying from the state treasury the salaries of the judges of the superior courts under legislative enactments and constitutional sanction indicates a marked design upon the part of the framers of the Constitution that the salaries should be paid from that source; otherwise it would have been expressly prohibited. Another indication of such design is the provision in the Constitution for the levy of an ad valorem tax upon all property in the state for the support of the state government and the public institutions, which included the superior courts. Article 7, § 1, par. 1, of the Constitution of 1877 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5882). Again, the Constitution of 1877 made provision for the levy of an ad valorem tax by counties, but expressly restricted it to certain purposes. Article 7, § 6, par. 2 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5892). The language of this provision of the Constitution was: "The General Assembly shall not have power to delegate to any county the right to levy a tax for any purpose, except for educational purposes in instructing children in the elementary branches of an English education only; to build and repair the public buildings and bridges; to maintain and support prisoners; to pay jurors and coroners, and for litigation, quarantine, roads, and expenses of courts; to support paupers and pay debts heretofore existing." It could not be contended that any of the purposes specified contemplated the payment of the salaries of the judges of the superior courts, unless it should be the provision for payment of "expenses of court." We shall see presently that this provision does not refer to salaries of judges of the superior courts. As it did not, and the other purposes to which the levy of the county tax had been restricted by the Constitution did not authorize the levy of a county tax to pay salaries of judges of the superior courts, there was no constitutional provision for the payment of salaries of the judges of the superior courts out of the county treasuries. Thus an additional light is afforded, tending to show, by the language of article 6, § 13, par. 1, of the Constitution of 1877, a design to limit the payment of salaries of judges of the superior courts to funds derived from the treasury of the state. The paragraph of the Constitution of 1877 which succeeded and immediately followed article 6, § 13, par. 1, declared: "The General Assembly may at any time, by a two-thirds vote of each branch, prescribe other and different salaries for any, or all of the above officers, but no such change shall affect the officers then in commission." While by this language the Legislature was authorized to designate other and different salaries, there was no express declaration that they should be paid elsewhere than from the state treasury. A salary for a different amount, either larger or smaller than one existing, would satisfy the words "other" and "different," whether it be paid from the state treasury or some other source. Giving the words their ordinary significance, if there was no change in amount, but only a change in the source from which it was to be paid, it would be more appropriate to say that the officer received the same salary, but obtained it from a different source. In order to give effect to the words "other and different," as employed, it is not necessary to say that the salary which the Legislature was authorized to provide should be paid from a different source than that contemplated in the preceding paragraph of the Constitution. It might be suggested that, on account of the inequality of labor imposed upon the different judges of the superior courts, the framers of the Constitution would not have prescribed a uniform salary for them. Whatever bearing this argument might have upon the construction to be placed upon article 6, § 13, par. 1, of the Constitution, its effect is greatly overcome by reference to an ordinance adopted by the constitutional convention, which declared: "There shall be sixteen judicial circuits in this state, and it shall be the duty of the General Assembly to organize and proportion the same in such manner as to equalize the business and labor of the judges in said several circuits, as far as may be practicable. But the General Assembly shall have power hereafter to reorganize, increase, or diminish the number of circuits; provided, however, that the circuits shall remain as now organized, until changed by law." Civ. Code 1895, § 5946. This ordinance shows a design upon the part of the members of the convention that there should be equalization as nearly as possible of labor imposed upon the judges, with uniformity of salary, rather than unequal labor and unequal salary.

It was urged that the salaries of the judges of the superior courts might be supplemented from the county treasuries on the ground that the salaries of the judges are "expenses of court," and as such are authorized to be paid under the provisions of article 7, § 6, par. 2, of the Constitution of 1877. That provision of the Constitution does not purport to deal with the source from which salaries of the judges might be paid, but only declares for what purposes county taxes might be levied, and includes among them "expenses of court." There are other expenses attending the holding of courts in the several counties; and this power of counties to tax for "expenses of court" would not fail for want of subject-matter upon which to operate, if the provisions should not be held applicable to salaries of judges of the superior courts. The case of Anderson v. Ryan, 82 Ga. 559, 9 S. E. 331, involving the payment of the salary of the judge of a county court out of a county treasury, and Adam v. Wright, 84 Ga. 720, 11 S. E. 893, involving the payment of the insolvent fees of the Solicitor General out of the county treasury, and Adam v. Cohen, 84 Ga. 725, 11 S. E. 895, involving the payment of the fees of a solicitor of a county court out of a county treasury, and Chatham County v. Gaudry, 120 Ga. 121, 47 S. E. 634, involving the payment of a certain amount out of the county treasury to a committee of citizens appointed by the grand jury to inspect the record of county officers, have been cited as supporting the contention that the salaries of the judges of the superior courts might be paid out of the county treasury as "expenses of court." No constitutional question was raised or decided in Anderson v. Ryan. The constitutional questions made in the other cases were different from that under discussion in the case at bar. The salaries of judges of the superior courts were not involved in either, and in none of them were construed or applied article 6, § 13, pars. 1 and 2, of the Constitution of 1877. It is not necessary to decide all that the term "expenses of court" might embrace, but in view of the other provisions of the Constitution mentioned in this opinion, it does not include the salaries of the judges of the superior courts. What has been said relates exclusively to the salaries of the judges of the superior courts, and is not intended to apply to the salaries of judges of county courts, city courts or other courts, which existed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, or which may have been subsequently created by law, as authorized in article 6, § 1, par. 1, of the Constitution of 1877 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5831). That provision of the Constitution declared: "The judicial powers of this state shall be vested in a Supreme Court, superior courts, courts of ordinary, justices of the peace, commissioned notaries public, and such other courts as have been or may be established by law." At the time of its adoption the city courts of Atlanta and Savannah were in existence, and the salaries of the judges were payable from sources other than the state treasury. The same may be said of the county courts. The provision for other courts in this article of the Constitution, at a time when such courts as city courts and county courts actually existed, and the salaries of the judges thereof were being paid from local sources, was a distinct recognition that as to such courts the salaries of the judges were not intended to be paid by the state. Under the act of 1875 (Acts 1875, p. 40), the salary of the judge of the city court of Atlanta was payable from the treasury of Fulton county. The salary of the judge of the city court of Savannah, under the act of 1819 (Cobb's Dig. p. 617) and the act of 1853-54 (Acts 1853-54, p. 281), was payable out of the city treasury. The salaries of the judges of the county courts, under the act approved January 19, 1872 (Acts 1871-72, p. 288), were payable by local taxation in the several counties. The reasoning which favors the constitutionality of local taxation for the payment of the salaries of judges of other courts might have had some bearing upon the question relative to the payment of the salaries of the judges of the superior courts, if the construction of article 6, § 13, par. 1, were doubtful, and if at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1877 such salaries were payable under any existing statute in part or wholly from the county treasuries; but the statutes relative to the payment of the judges of the superior courts were not of that character. On the contrary, under them such salaries were payable exclusively from the state treasury.

Under a proper construction of the Constitution the salaries of the judges of the superior courts are payable exclusively from the treasury of the state; and so much of the act of 1904, as amended by the subsequent acts of 1905 and 1906, hereinbefore mentioned, as purports to authorize such salaries to be supplemented by funds from county treasuries is void. Owing to the difference in the Constitutions and statutes involved, rulings of courts from other states are not very helpful; but see, on the general subject, County of Shelby v. Six Judges, 3 Tenn. Cas. 508; Colbert v. Bond and Glisson v. Calloway, 110 Tenn. 370, 75 S. W. 1061; also cases cited in 23 Cyc. 528 (7); and in American Digest (Cent. Ed.) §§ 76, 78, pp. 1649, 1652.

MOODY v. MUSCOGEE MFG. CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 870*)—JURY (§ 19*)—REVIVAL—SCIRE FACIAS—CONSIDERATION OF RECORD—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL.

Upon a petition for scire facias to revive a dormant judgment, wherein the plaintiff alleges that the judgment was rendered in a named cause in the same court, a transcript of which is not attached as an exhibit, but full reference to the cause is prayed, and the defendant by his pleadings invokes a construction of the record in aid of his defense, he cannot complain that the court considers such record in determining whether the judgment was void for uncertainty, or whether it was final or interlocutory.

(a) Even if the defendant's answer be construed to be a plea of nul tiel record, he was not entitled to a jury trial on the issue whether a given judgment had been rendered, as such issue is for decision by the court on an inspection of the record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 870; * Jury, Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 217*)—FINALITY OF DETERMINATION.

A decree may be partly final and partly interlocutory; final as to its determination of all issues of law and fact, and interlocutory as to its mode of execution. A final decree disposing of all the substantial equities of the case is not made interlocutory by the mere reservation of the right to direct the mode of its execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 394; Dec. Dig. § 217.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 222*)—ESSENTIALS—CERTAINTY AND DEFINITENESS.

Every judgment must be certain and definite as to its amount. This element of certainty is present when the exact amount of the judgment may be ascertained by the subtraction of one named sum from another named sum, as provided in the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 402; Dec. Dig. § 222.*]

4. BANKRUPTCY (§ 423*)—DEBTS DISCHARGED—“JUDGMENTS IN ACTIONS FOR FRAUD.”

Subdivision 2, § 17, of the original bankruptcy act of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 550 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3428]), providing “that judgments in actions for fraud or obtaining property by false pretensions or false representations” are not released by a discharge in bankruptcy, comprehends judgments rendered in actions, the gist of which is the actual fraud of the defendants. In determining this question the courts will look to the pleadings and judgment; and if the relief granted in the judgment is based upon actual, as distinguished from constructive, fraud of the bankrupt, the bankrupt shall not be discharged from its obligation, notwithstanding the action may not be strictly ex delicto in form.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Suit by the Muscogee Manufacturing Company and others against M. H. Moody, administratrix of John T. Moody. From the judgment, defendant brings error. Affirmed as to certain parties, and reversed as to others. See, also, 66 S. E. 908.

In the fall of 1908 the Muscogee Manufacturing Company and 19 other parties, whose names will hereafter appear, filed their several petitions against John T. Moody in the superior court of Fulton county, alleging that at the March term, 1898, an equitable petition was filed by the Park Woolen Mills et al. against Moody & Brewster, a firm composed of John T. Moody and G. S. Brewster, in which case Brewster was not served; that petitioners were parties plaintiff to the cause and on June 30, 1900, a final verdict and decree were rendered in the case, under which each petitioner was given a judgment for an amount, which was stated; that no fi. fa. was ever issued upon the judgment; that none of the principal, interest, and costs had been paid; and that by reason of the lapse of time the judgment was dormant; wherefore they prayed that scire facias be issued, and that judgment thereon be revived. Full reference to the cause in which the judgment was rendered was made. The defendant Moody answered the scire facias in each case, admitting that an equitable petition was filed in the superior court of Fulton county by the Park Woolen Mills et al. against Moody & Brewster, a firm composed of himself and G. S. Brewster, in which case Brewster was not served; “that on June 30, 1900, a final decree was rendered in said cause;” and that no fi. fa. had ever been issued upon this decree. He alleged that the judgment, if ever valid, is now dormant; that the alleged judgment sought to be revived in each instance is void for vagueness, indefiniteness, and uncertainty, in that the judgment is not, in practical effect, awarded for any definite sum, and the amount for which the judgment should have been or might have been rendered cannot be determined, either from the judgment or the pleadings in the cause of the Park Woolen Mills et al. against Moody & Brewster, since the amount stated in the alleged judgment for each one of the plaintiffs is subject to uncertain deductions or credits which must be proved by aliunde evidence; that the several plaintiffs are not entitled to revive their alleged judgments, for the reason that, if ever valid, the judgments have been released by the discharge in bankruptcy of J. T. Moody, granted on May 3, 1902, in a voluntary bankruptcy proceeding, in which the several plaintiffs were listed as creditors of Moody in his schedule filed in that proceeding; and that the debt of each plaintiff was a provable debt in bankruptcy. The defendants in error severally demurred to the answer, on the grounds: (a) The answer set up no legal reason why the judgment should not be revived; (b) the record discloses that the judgment rendered in the case of Park Woolen Mills et al. against Moody & Brewster is neither vague, indefinite, nor uncertain; (c) the discharge in bankruptcy granted to John T. Moody on May 3, 1902, did not apply to the judgments rendered in favor of the several plaintiffs, because the judgments were based upon fraud; (d) the defendant is not entitled under the facts set up in his answer to a trial by jury. The answer was amended, alleging that the decree of June 30, 1900, in the case of Park Woolen Mills et al. against Moody & Brewster, referred to in the petitions for scire facias, did not contain a final judgment against the defendant or the firm of Moody & Brewster; that the alleged judgment was interlocutory only, and did not finally fix and settle the rights of the parties to the litigation, but left the rights to be determined at some future date, the cause being retained for that purpose; that no final judgment was ever rendered; and therefore that the plaintiffs have no judgments in their favor, capable of being revived against the defendant. The demurrers to the answer were renewed, and sustained by the court, who struck the answers as amended, and entered up judgment reviving the alleged dormant judgments in favor of the respective applicants.

The cause of the Park Woolen Mills et al. v. Moody & Brewster (wherein the decree of June 30, 1900, was rendered and to which reference is made in the several petitions for scire facias and the answers thereto) was an equitable petition by the creditors, alleging, in substance, that in 1897 and 1898 J. T. Moody and G. S. Brewster were engaged in several businesses under different trade-names in the city of Atlanta, and in the latter part of 1897 they entered into a general dry goods and notion business, opening several stores in Atlanta, and were traders engaged in such business; that the defendants were insolvent; that Brewster had absconded; that Moody, in behalf of the partnership, had on the previous day executed a large number of mortgages, approximating $77,000; that the goods covered by these mortgages were goods bought from complainants and other creditors, and utilized by the defendants as a basis for loans to pay antecedent debts not arising from the purchase of the goods, the genuineness of which debts was not admitted; that these acts amounted to a fraud upon defendants' creditors; that the goods of petitioners were purchased by Moody & Brewster without any intention at the time to pay for same; that the mortgages are void, and petitioners had a right to identify and reclaim their goods. The prayers were: That the defendants be restrained from further changing the status of their business; that a receiver be appointed; that the assets of the firm be marshaled; that they be allowed to reclaim their goods as against all of the mortgages, except one which was not attacked; and that they have a judgment for whatever goods they could not claim. The original petition was amended by alleging that the firm of Moody & Brewster had been operating in many lines of business under different names (stating them); that they had indiscriminately used the money from each of the concerns operated by them and the dry goods business for the furtherance of their interests; and that the business of one could not be separated from that of the other; and by further alleging fraud in certain transactions between J. T. Moody and his sister, in that Moody had conveyed to her certain land, which conveyances were made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding creditors, and in a similar transaction with the nephew of the absconding partner, G. S. Brewster. The petition was again amended, making the Laurel Mills Manufacturing Company and the Tennessee Woolen Mills, two of the plaintiffs in the present litigation, parties to the case, and alleging that the defendants purchased goods from interveners, representing themselves to be solvent, and that the goods were sold upon the credit of these statements, when as a matter of fact the defendants had no intention of paying for the goods, and fraudulently concealed this intent. This amendment adopted all of the prayers of the original petition. Numerous other creditors filed their interventions (20 of them being parties to the present litigation), all of them, except as hereinafter noted, setting up substantially (and severally expressly adopting) the allegations and prayers of the original bill, and alleging in substance as follows: That they sold and delivered to Moody & Brewster goods amounting to a certain sum, as shown by their attached bill of particulars; that in order to obtain this credit the defendants made fraudulent statements, to the mercantile agencies, of their wealth and financial responsibility, for the purpose of having said statements communicated to petitioners (interveners in each case), which statements were actually communicated, upon the faith of which petitioners sold the goods; that these statements were made and the goods purchased under a scheme to defraud, and with no intention to pay for the goods; that the defendants engaged in the general scheme of purchasing a large quantity of goods, far in excess of their needs, procuring them on credit by false representations, with the deliberate purpose and intention of placing mortgages upon them to further their general scheme of fraud, and prefer certain creditors. The prayers were that it be adjudged that the title to the goods did not pass, because of the fraud, and that they be allowed to identify and recapture their goods, and have judgment for such as may not be reclaimed. The substance of the interventions of the Third National Bank of Atlanta and the Leibig Manufacturing Company appear in the last division of the opinion. The questions of the priorities of liens held by the various interveners, as between themselves, were also raised by some of the interveners. The defendant Moody answered for himself individually, and for the firm. The allegations of the various interventions, as well as the original petition, respecting the amounts of indebtedness, the dates, amounts, and execution of the various mortgages as set out, were all admitted. He denied all allegations of fraud or false statements or representations in the procurement of the goods; and alleged that they did represent themselves to be solvent and fully able to pay, that they were at the time solvent, and that the firm had been rendered insolvent since that time on account of the conduct of Brewster, who had absconded.

The court appointed a receiver to take charge of the assets, and referred the case to an auditor, with direction to hear the evidence and various contentions of the parties and determine their rights. The auditor filed a report covering the various issues, and exceptions were filed by certain creditors relating to contests with other creditors over the funds. These exceptions were passed upon by a jury, and a decree was entered in general accord with the auditor's report as modified by the verdict upon the issues raised by the exceptions. On June 30, 1900, a decree was entered, adjudging that the various partnerships under which Moody & Brewster did business were insolvent, and the members thereof were likewise insolvent; "that on or about January 1, 1898, Moody & Brewster, under whatsoever style they were doing business, and as individuals, were insolvent; and that on or about said date they entered into a general scheme having for its purpose the purchase of goods and the obtaining of credit, both for the money and goods, to defraud those with whom they might deal, and that they then and thereafter purchased goods and obtained credits with no intention to pay therefor, and with intent generally to defraud their creditors; and as to individual instances where parties to said cause have been found by the auditor to be entitled to rescind their sales and reclaim goods identified, the auditor's report as to them is hereby adopted and made a part of this decree, both as to findings of a general scheme to defraud and as to special frauds perpetrated upon particular parties." After fixing the priority of certain liens in accordance with the auditor's report, the decree then proceeds: "The following complainants and interveners in said cause, having chosen to rescind their sales, and having identified certain goods in the hands of the receiver, are decreed to be entitled to rescind said sales because of fraud practiced upon them by Moody & Brewster, and to be entitled to reclaim the proceeds of the goods so identified by them and sold by the receiver; subject, nevertheless, to their proportionate part of such costs as are hereinafter taxed against them, and subject to such other prior claims and liens as in this decree have been found to be superior to their right of reclamation, which they are hereby likewise charged with proportionately. The amounts realized from the sale of said goods are respectively set opposite the names of the parties." Then follow the names of these interveners, and the amounts opposite their names: Abegg & Rush, $1,381; Atlanta Woolen Mills, $3,276.14; Cleveland Woolen Mills, $90.43; Glen Falls Shirt Company, $500.17; Laurel Mills Manufacturing Company, $1,917.17; Owensboro Woolen Mills, $4,553.83; Old Kentucky Woolen Mills, $1,800.47; Porter Bros. & Co., $138.61; Roaring Springs Blank Book Company, $384.64; Strauss, Sach & Co., $209.81; E. T. Steele & Co., $946.49; Scheuer Bros., $374.38; Silverstein, Hecht & Co., $1,620.07; Tennessee Woolen Mills, $1,394.59. The next paragraph of the decree is: "The following complainants and interveners, who under previous orders of this court have been allowed to take from the possession of the receiver certain goods identified by them, are hereby decreed to be entitled to reclaim said goods and to retain the same, but are hereby required to pay into the hands of the receiver such a proportion of the costs and expenses and liens, which are by this decree fixed as prior to their right of reclamation, as may be necessary to comply with the terms of this decree, less 10 per cent. of the invoice cost thereof already paid into the hands of the receiver under the orders of court. The invoice cost of the goods so taken out by them is respectively set opposite their names as follows: "Guiterman Brothers, $586.11, were the only interveners, parties to the present litigation, who reclaimed their goods under this paragraph of the decree." The Atlanta Woolen Mills were also "decreed to recover of and from the Fourth National Bank of Atlanta the following accounts, proceeds of goods sold by it to Moody & Brewster, or, where the same have been collected by said bank, the full proceeds of such collection; said accounts being as follows." Then follows a list of such accounts, giving the amount of each account, aggregating $1,822.04. In the twenty-eighth paragraph the Cleveland Woolen Mills were "decreed to recover of the Fourth National Bank of Atlanta the following accounts, proceeds of goods sold by it to Moody & Brewster, where said accounts or any of them have been collected by said bank, the full proceeds thereof collected by said bank shall be paid by said bank to said receiver, said accounts being as follows." Then follows a list of the accounts, aggregating $2,174.22. It is "further ordered and decreed that the following named accounts are the proceeds of the goods of the Berkeley Chemical Company which were sold by it to Moody & Brewster under such fraudulent circumstances as hereinbefore found as authorized them to rescind said sale upon discovery of said fraud, and to reclaim said goods or their proceeds wherever found, except in the hands of innocent purchasers for value and without notice; and that said Berkeley Chemical Company is hereby awarded the open accounts hereinafter set forth, and the receiver is directed to turn over said accounts to said Berkeley Chemical Company. And the Fourth National Bank is decreed not to be entitled to any part of said open accounts which it may have received as security for the pre-existing indebtedness to said bank at the time of the failure of the said Moody & Brewster, or the cash collections on any such open account so received. The items of said accounts as appearing by the books of Moody & Brewster, as shown on page 152 of the brief in evidence in said cause, being as follows." These items aggregate $3,440.50. The next paragraph was as follows: "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the following parties are entitled to recover of the defendants, Moody & Brewster, by general judgment the gross amounts which are respectively set opposite their names, which amounts and judgments are to be respectively, credited with any sums which any of said parties received from the receiver in this under this decree, and from collateral securities which they may have held as security therefor, namely." Then follow: Abegg & Rusch, $1,764.37; Atlanta Woolen Mills, $5,675.52; Berkeley Chemical Company, $25,121.48; Cleveland Woolen Mills, $2,589.94; Glens Falls Shirt Company, $630.65; Gutterman Bros., $659.23; Leibig Manufacturing Company, $14,756.70; Laurel Manufacturing Company, $3,724.52; Muscogee Manufacturing Company, $1,338.57; Mechanics' National Bank, $21,036.48; Owensboro Woolen Mills, $5,552.39; Old Kentucky Woolen Mills, $2,378.90; Porter Bros. & Co., $374.65; Roaring Springs Blank Book Company, $496.31; Strauss, Sach & Co., $345.23; Steele & Co., $1,050.26; Schuer Bros., $700.62; Silverstein, Hecht & Co., $3,032.78; Tennessee Woolen Mills, $1,917.51; Third National Bank, $8,500. Then follows: "For the balances for which general judgments are hereby rendered, the clerk of the court shall, upon application, issue separate executions." After giving directions to the receiver as to the disposition of funds in his hands, the decree concluded with the following paragraph: "The right is reserved to make such further orders, judgments and decrees as may be necessary to carry into effect the true intent and meaning of this decree."

The auditor's report was filed on the 8th of December, 1899, and the decree of the court entered up thereon on June 30, 1900. After this date the court passed different orders for the direction of the receiver in disposing of a small balance of property of Moody & Brewster, and direction as to other matters; and the receiver on March 11, 1901, filed his final report of disbursements and receipts, which was approved by the court, and the receiver discharged.

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, Candler, Thomson & Hirsch, Howard Van Epps, and T. F. Corrigan, for plaintiff in error. J. E. & L. F. McClelland, King & Spalding, Slaton & Phillips, and J. L. Hopkins & Son, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. In reaching its decision and in granting its judgment sustaining the demurrers to the defendant's answer to the scire facias, the court considered and treated as a part of the record in the case the entire proceedings, orders, and decrees, including the final report of the receiver and the orders thereon, in the case of Park Woolen Mills et al. v. Moody & Brewster, over the objection that they were not a part of the record in the scire facias proceeding. The defendant filed no demurrer to the various petitions complaining that the exhibits were not attached. Scire facias to revive a dormant judgment is not an original action, but a continuation of the suit in which the judgment was obtained. Civil Code, § 5380. The defendant may plead nul tiel record in bar of the relief sought, in which case the plaintiff must produce the record, and the court will try that issue on an inspection of the record. But in each of the scire facias petitions in this case the plaintiff alleged that the Park Woolen Mills et al. filed their petition against Moody & Brewster, in the same court to the March term, 1898, in which case each applicant intervened, and that on June 30, 1900, a final decree and verdict were rendered in favor of intervener for a stated amount and "full reference to the case above mentioned is made." In his answer to the petition for scire facias the defendant admitted the filing of the petition of the Park Woolen Mills et al. v. Moody & Brewster, service thereof on him, that applicant intervened in the cause, and "that on June 30, 1900, a final verdict and decree was rendered in said cause." But defendant denied that applicant was given a judgment for any amount. He also further averred that the judgment was void for uncertainty and vagueness. By amendment the defendant averred that the decree of June 30, 1900, referred to in the petition for scire facias, did not contain a final judgment against the defendant, but that the judgment was interlocutory merely, and left the rights of the parties to be finally determined at some future day, the cause being retained for that purpose; he also demanded a trial by jury on this issue. It is not the province of a jury to declare upon the legal effect of a judgment. Stewart v. Sholl, 99 Ga. 539, 26 S. E. 757. So that, even if the defendant's answer had been strictly a plea of nul tiel record, the fact as to whether a given judgment had been rendered is determinable by the court only on inspection of the record. Ibid. Under the pleadings in this case there was no necessity for the production of the record as evidence, because it was before the court as part of the pleadings. The petition for scire facias prayed reference to the record, and the defendant invoked a ruling in its behalf upon that record. The record was not attached as an exhibit, but was a record of the court which was trying the scire facias proceeding. The third equity rule (Civil Code, § 5694) requires that all exhibits shall be filed with the petition or answer. But where the exhibits referred to are voluminous pleadings and records of the court where the case is pending, the court may consider such records as if they were attached as exhibits. Graham v. Dahlonga Gold Mining Company, 71 Ga. 296; Millbank v. Penniman, 73 Ga. 136. It was said in Lyons v. Planters' Loan & Savings Bank, 86 Ga. 485, 12 S. E. 882, 12 L. R. A. 155, that it is doubtful whether the equity rule touching exhibits to pleadings is applicable in its full force since the act of 1887, establishing uniformity in pleading, but that in all events, where there is no probability that the defendant was unacquainted with the contents of the record, and has suffered no substantial disadvantage in the omission to set it out as an exhibit, a judgment otherwise correct will not be reversed for this lack of formality. To which we may add, that where the record was referred to as on file, and the defendant by his pleadings invoked a construction of the record, he cannot complain that the court considered such record in determining whether the judgment was void for vagueness, or because it was only interlocutory.

2. The general practice under our system of pleading is to enter only one final decree on the merits of an equity cause. The practical advantage of concluding all issues in a single comprehensive decree is the prevention of a review of litigated cases by piecemeal. However desirable it may be to conclude a litigation with one judgment, the law does not require it, nor is it always possible to dispose of complicated equitable causes in one final decree. As said by Judge Lewis in Booth v. State, 131 Ga. 756, 63 S. E. 505: "It is difficult sometimes in actions on the equity side of the court, especially in cases of receivership, to determine whether an order is administrative in its character, resting in the sound discretion of the chancellor, or final in its nature. To be final it does not necessarily mean that the judgment disposes of the entire case. A judgment may be rendered separable from a judgment disposing of the entire case, and yet be a judgment that is final as to some of the substantial rights of the parties as contended for in their pleadings. It is final when, as to the subject-matter of the judgment, any of the substantial rights of the parties litigant are finally settled by the judgment." A decree which settles all of the substantial equities in a case must be regarded as a finality upon such questions. A decree may be partly final and partly interlocutory; final as to its determination of all issues of fact and law, and interlocutory as to its mode of execution. Adams v. Sayre, 76 Ala. 509; Merle v. Andrews, 4 Tex. 200; Gray v. Cook, 24 How. Prac. 432. The original action which was eventuated in the decree of June 30, 1900, was an equitable petition by creditors against alleged fraudulent and insolvent debtors, to rescind their sales of goods on account of fraud, to reclaim all goods which they could identify, and to recover judgment for whatever goods they could not claim, and for other relief, special and general. From time to time various creditors intervened, and in their respective interventions set forth a gigantic scheme of the debtors to defraud every one they could induce to extend them credit. The debtors had sold some of the goods and hypothecated the accounts and notes representing such sales with other creditors, and just before the filing of the petition the debtors had executed several mortgages. There were conflicting equities between the creditors. The whole matter was referred to an auditor, who filed his report, which as to conflicting equities of the creditors was modified by a verdict on exceptions thereto. This was the general aspect of the case when the court entered the decree of June 30, 1900. Every substantial equity had been established and adjusted between the parties. The fraud of the defendants was adjudicated; the value of the goods which were fraudulently procured was found; the value of the goods reclaimed by each creditor was found; and finally it was adjudicated that each of the various creditors was to have judgment for the difference between the value of the goods out of which each was defrauded and the sum named in the decree as having been received by each from reclamation of goods, and for which sum—easily ascertained by the arithmetical process of subtraction—the clerk was directed to issue execution upon application of the several creditors. This is our interpretation of the decree—an interpretation which seems so clear to us that neither judicial precedent nor an elaborate analysis of all of its terms would be profitable or necessary to prove its accuracy.

But it is urged that the concluding paragraph of the decree, wherein "the right is reserved to make such further orders, judgments, and decrees as may be necessary to carry into effect the true intent and meaning of this decree," renders it a mere decretal or interlocutory order. We do not think so. Every substantial equity and all the rights of the parties had been finally adjudicated, and in the administration of such a large estate, and with so many parties with overlapping equities, it was more than likely that minor matters might arise respecting its mode of execution; and this reservation was intended to cover such. All subsequent orders, including that which finally discharged the receiver, related simply to the mode of executing the decree, and demonstrates that our construction is not only correct, but was the one acted upon by the court. The rule is well established that a final decree disposing of the substantial equities of the case is not made interlocutory by the mere reservation of the right to direct the mode of its execution. 23 Cyc. 673; Campbell v. Crutcher, 3 Tenn. Ch. 253; Mead v. Christian, 50 Ala. 561; Jones v. Wilson, 54 Ala. 50.

3. Nor is the decree of June 30, 1900, void for vagueness, indefiniteness, and uncertainty, in that judgment is awarded for no definite sum. It is fundamental that a judgment should be certain and definite, or be capable of being made so by proper construction. 23 Cyc. 671. The action was a creditor's bill; the parties who intervened as creditors were numerous; the overlapping equities of the creditors, and the multitude of issues, necessarily required considerable space in the statement of the various adjudications of the equities. It was stated in one paragraph of the decree that each creditor was entitled to a general judgment for the gross amount opposite his name, to be credited with any sums received under the decree and from the collateral securities awarded to them. Other paragraphs stated the amount which each creditor received from reclamations and from collateral securities. So that the calculation as to the amount of the judgment awarded to each creditor was but the simple process of subtraction, and a palpable illustration of the maxim "Id certum est quod certum reddi potest." Whether the decree was constructed with a view to condensation, or to tabular classification, or to conform to the peculiar literary style of the draughtsman, is mere conjecture. The mode of ascertaining the amount is given with precision; the mathematical process is simple and accurate, and the result is just as intelligible and certain as if the calculation had been made and the result incorporated in the decree. A verdict or judgment for a given sum as principal with interest thereon from a given date, has always been regarded as not wanting in certainty. The problem of ascertaining the difference between two numbers is by no means as complex as that of the calculation of interest.

We have carefully gone over the calculations of the amount awarded to each defendant in error. We find the several amounts correctly stated in the petition for scire facias of the following parties: Abegg & Rusch; Guiterman Bros.; Glens Falls Shirt Company; Mechanics' National Bank; Leibel Manufacturing Company; Laurel Mills Manufacturing Company; Muscogee Manufacturing Company; Old Kentucky Woolen Mills; Owensboro Woolen Mills; E. T. Steele & Co.; Silverstein, Hecht & Co.; Berkeley Chemical Company; Porter Bros. & Co.; Third National Bank of Atlanta. With respect to the other petitions for scire facias, the amount awarded by the decree is incorrectly stated. To the Roaring Springs Blank Book Company judgment was awarded for $496.31, less $384.61, to wit, $111.67; to Strauss, Sach & Co. judgment was awarded for $345.23, less $209.81, to wit, $135.42; to the Tennessee Woolen Mills judgment was awarded for $1,917.51, less $1,394.59, to wit, $522.92; to Schuer Bros. judgment was awarded for $700.62, less $374.38, to wit, $226.24. In the decree it was provided, inasmuch as some of the goods reclaimed by the Atlanta Woolen Mills had been manufactured into the finished product, that the cost of manufacturing, to wit, $598.69, should first be paid; after deducting this sum from the proceeds of the reclaimed goods, $3,276.14, the net credit of $2,677.45, and the $1,822.04, the amount of collaterals turned over, both credits aggregating $4,499.49, should be deducted from the gross amount, $5,875.52, leaving $1,176.03 as the amount for which judgment was rendered. The Cleveland Woolen Mills was awarded a judgment for $2,589.94, less the amount of their accounts representing $2,174.22 of their goods, which had been sold by the defendants, leaving a net recovery of $315.72. The amounts which have been thus erroneously calculated should be corrected by these figures.

4. Was the defendant Moody acquitted of the judgments of the defendants in error by his discharge in bankruptcy? The original bankruptcy act of 1898 permitted a discharge from all provable debts, with certain exceptions, one of which was from a "judgment in an action for fraud or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations." Section 17, subd. 2, of the bankruptcy act of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 550 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3428]). This provision of the bankrupt act was amended in 1903, but as the bankrupt's discharge was obtained prior to the amendment, the question for decision is not affected by the amendment, but must be determined by the provisions of the original act. The authorities seem to be uniform in holding that in order to constitute a judgment as recovered for fraud, so as to prevent its release by section 17, subd. 2, of the bankruptcy act of 1898, the fraud and deceit must have been the gist of the action. The authorities further hold that the fraud must be positive fraud or fraud in fact, involving moral turpitude or intentional wrong, and not implied fraud, which may exist without an imputation of bad faith. The bankruptcy act of 1867 did not require claims for frauds to be reduced to judgment, as does the act of 1898, as a condition to prevent their release by a discharge in bankruptcy. "The reason for this change, as suggested by Mr. Justice Brown, in delivering the opinion in Crawford v. Burke [195 U. S. 176, 25 Sup. Ct. 9, 49 L. Ed. 147], may be that Congress did not intend to offer any inducement to change unliquidated claims into actions for fraud, and therefore limited the exception from the operation of the discharge to such cases only as had been litigated and reduced to actual judgment. When such is the case, we think a correct interpretation of the law does not require a close examination into the form of the action to determine whether technically it is one ex delicto or otherwise, but the real question is, Was the relief granted in the judgment based upon actual, as distinguished from constructive, fraud of the bankrupt? If the judgment is thus founded, whatever is the form of the action, it is the intent and purpose of the law that the bankrupt shall not be discharged from it, but shall still rest under its obligation, so far as the bankrupt law is concerned." Bullis v. O'Beirne, 195 U. S. 620, 25 Sup. Ct. 123, 49 L. Ed. 340. We will now proceed to analyze the proceedings and decree in the case of Park Woolen Mills et al. v. Moody & Brewster, to ascertain if the judgment of the various defendants in error are predicated upon the actual fraud of Moody & Brewster. The original petition was in the nature of a creditor's bill, broader in scope than the statutory proceeding under the insolvent trader's act. At the time the action was commenced the insolvent trader's act (Civ. Code, § 2716 et seq.) permitted the administration of the assets of an insolvent trader by a court of equity upon the application of one or more creditors representing one-third in amount of the unsecured debts of the insolvent trader. The absence of the jurisdictional averment that the moving creditors represented one-third in amount of the unsecured indebtedness, together with charges of positive fraud by the debtors (which is not required in the statutory action) strongly tends to characterize and classify the proceeding as a creditor's bill under the old established chancery practice. Creditors' bills are very generally employed to settle up the estates of insolvent debtors, to prevent a multiplicity of suits by creditors, to set aside fraudulent conveyances, to marshal the assets of the debtor, and to administer them according to equitable principles. In the original petition it was alleged that the goods of the petitioners were fraudulently purchased by Moody & Brewster, with no intention of paying therefor, and inter alia the plaintiffs prayed that they be allowed to reclaim their goods and have judgment for whatever goods they could not claim. In the subsequent amendments, and in the interventions of all creditors who had sold merchandise to the defendants, a general scheme to defraud all creditors, and a specific scheme to defraud the particular creditor, were averred. In all of them reclamation of goods sold was claimed on the ground that the title did not pass on account of the debtors' fraud, and judgment was asked in some for the value of the goods, in others "for whatever goods they cannot claim"; that is to say, the value of the goods fraudulently converted.

The dominant note in every intervention, as well as in the original petition, was for the rescission of the sales on the ground of fraud. The creditors' right to reclaim their goods depended upon their right to a rescission of the sale. The pleadings, the auditor's report, and the decree show the point of pressure to have been the effort of each creditor to identify and retake his goods, and keep them out of the general fund. Indeed, the general fund obtained from other sources was a negligible quantity. The fight on this line was between the creditors, Moody being hardly an interested spectator. After filing an answer he became passive and inactive; not even excepting to the auditor's finding that he had perpetrated such a colossal fraud. The attitude of the parties to the various issues is referred to as illustrating that the contending parties in the heat of the conflict regarded the defendants' fraud as the gravamen of the suit. It is wholly inconsistent that the plaintiffs should be entitled to reclaim such of their goods as could be identified, and also have a judgment for the contract price, less the goods reclaimed. A sale cannot be affirmed in part and repudiated in part. The primary relief sought being the reclamation of the goods, we must construe that the excess judgment was for damages sustained from failure to recapture the balance of the goods which had been fraudulently converted. The cost of the goods may be considered in connection with other facts, in estimating the damages sustained; though evidence of cost alone may be insufficient to prove market value. Watson v. Loughran, 112 Ga. 837, 38 S. E. 82. The coincidence between the judgment rendered and the invoice price demonstrates neither that the court treated the recovery as based on the contract, nor that the decree was without evidential support other than the invoice value of the goods. The decree suggests at least three very strong indications that the recovery was based on the fraud of the defendants: First, the court took pains to especially adjudge the defendants' fraud; second, reclamations based on rescission were allowed; third, no notice was taken of any interest prior to the decree. We therefore reach the conclusion that the gravamen of the action was the fraud of the defendants. Was that fraud positive or actual fraud? It would be idle to again repeat the character of the fraud, so inadequately summarized in general terms in the statement of facts. Such fraud is actual, and not constructive. Ames v. Moir, 138 U. S. 306, 11 Sup. Ct. 311, 34 L. Ed. 951; Forsyth v. Vehmeyer, 177 U. S. 177, 20 Sup. Ct. 623, 44 L. Ed. 723.

It appears from the intervention of the Leibig Manufacturing Company that whatever fraud may have been perpetrated upon it by Moody & Brewster it was waived, and the judgment rendered upon its intervention was simply for the balance due them on its notes. It appears that on the day before the filing of the creditors' bill Moody & Brewster executed a mortgage to secure one of the notes due the Leibig Company. This mortgage covered fertilizers which it had sold to Moody & Brewster, and also embraced other fertilizers which were purchased by Moody & Brewster elsewhere. The Leibig Manufacturing Company originally intervened for the purpose of protesting against the temporary receiver's taking possession of the fertilizers covered by its mortgage. It was allowed to proceed with the foreclosure, and amended its intervention by showing the net amount it had received from the proceeds of the foreclosure sale. It also further amended its intervention, asking judgment upon another note, adopting only so much of the allegations of the original petition as was necessary for the relief for which it prayed. Thus it appears that at the very time of the failure of Moody & Brewster the Leibig Manufacturing Company took a mortgage upon goods including some sold by it; and, when the creditors filed their petition alleging the fraudulent scheme of Moody & Brewster, instead of disaffirming the sale, it ratified the sale by insisting upon proceeding with the foreclosure of the mortgage, and received the proceeds thereof. If the original transaction between it and Moody & Brewster was infected with fraud, it was waived by its subsequent conduct. We therefore think that the judgment as to it was not based on the fraud of Moody & Brewster, as that fraud, if any, had been purged, by the voluntary action of this intervenor.

It also affirmatively appears from the intervention of the Third National Bank of Atlanta that its debt was created by a loan made in the usual course of business, secured by certain collaterals, supposed at the time that the loan was made to be sufficient; but, on account of the decline of the price of cotton, it was not able to collect from the collaterals a sufficient amount to discharge its loan; and judgment was asked for the balance due on the note, including the principal and interest. No fraud was alleged to have entered into this transaction, and therefore this debt was released by the discharge in bankruptcy.

The judgments in all the cases, except the two wherein the Leibig Manufacturing Company and the Third National Bank of Atlanta are defendants in error, are affirmed; and as to these two the judgments are reversed. All the Justices concur.

NIAGARA FIRE INS. CO. v. JORDAN.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 23, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

INSURANCE (§ 143*)—INSURANCE POLICY.

Where, on oral application for a policy of insurance to indemnify the applicant against loss by fire for the period of one year, the proper agent of the insurer agrees to issue to the applicant a policy of insurance as contracted for, but by mistake of the insurer's agent another's name is inadvertently inserted therein as the insured, and the policy is delivered to the applicant by the insurer, who collects the premium, and the applicant retains the policy without discovering the mistake until after sustaining a loss by fire, nearly three months thereafter, equity will reform the policy, so as to make it accord with the oral agreement between the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-272; Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; S. P. Gilbert, Judge.

Action by B. B. Jordan against the Niagara Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

B. B. Jordan filed suit against the Niagara Fire Insurance Company to reform a policy of insurance issued by the defendant to Jordan Bros., on the ground that it purported to insure the interest of Jordan Bros. in certain property, when it should have insured the interest of plaintiff, who had been a member of the firm of Jordan Bros., but had purchased the interest of his partner at the time of the issuance of the policy of insurance, and to enforce the payment of this policy. The court overruled the defendant's demurrer, and the exception is to this judgment. Omitting formal allegations, the petition as amended stated the cause of action as follows:

"Your petitioner shows that on the 7th day of May, 1907, the said defendant did contract and enter into a contract of insurance with your petitioner to insure a stock of goods of petitioner, bearing the number 17-748, which said policy of insurance was issued by its local agent, James W. Woodruff; said policy above described being for the sum of five hundred and no/100 ($500) dollars, covering a stock of merchandise located at No. 1127 Broad street in the city of Columbus, said state and county, on a general stock of merchandise, consisting of boots, shoes, slippers, overshoes, and all other merchandise not more hazardous and usual to the trade. Petitioner shows that at the date last above mentioned, and at the time he contracted with said defendant, he was the sole and exclusive owner of the property so insured, and that his ownership in said property did not change from said date of insurance until the 8th day of February, 1908. Petitioner shows that said contract was made by and with your petitioner, B. B. Jordan, in his own right, and by and through a mistake on the part of said company's agent and this petitioner, which mistake was made by the agent drafting said insurance contract, instead of putting the name of petitioner in said contract as being insured, the name Jordan Bros. was put in said contract by the said draftsman, which mistake originated by and through the fact that a firm by the name of Jordan Bros., of which petitioner was formerly a member, did business in the same storehouse prior to December 6, 1906. Said mistake was a mutual mistake, in that it was overlooked by your petitioner until February 8, 1908, at which time a loss occurred under said policy. Your petitioner shows that on the 6th day of December, 1906, the said firm of Jordan Bros. was dissolved, and that notices of dissolution were duly published in the newspapers published in Columbus, in said state and county, and that your petitioner, by virtue of said dissolution, succeeded Jordan Bros. and became the sole and exclusive owner of the property heretofore owned by Jordan Bros., located in the storehouse heretofore described.

"Your petitioner shows, further, that on the 19th day of November, 1907, he was the sole and exclusive owner of the property covered by policy 12,748, issued by defendant, and that the said defendant, at the time of the issuance of said policy, well knew that the said firm of Jordan Bros. had been dissolved, and your petitioner had succeeded it, and that the making of the said policy payable to Jordan Bros., instead of B. B. Jordan, was caused through a clerical error or inadvertence or mistake on the part of defendant, through its agent, and through no fault of petitioner. That on the 19th day of November, 1907, in consideration of the payment by the said B. B. Jordan to the defendant of the sum of seven and 75/100 dollars as premium paid to defendant, defendant did issue its certain policy of insurance in writing, insuring said property above mentioned against loss or damage to petitioner by fire from the 19th day of November, 1907, at noon, to the 19th day of November, 1908, at noon, a copy of which policy is hereto attached and made a part hereof, marked 'Exhibit A,' and to which leave of reference is prayed. That on the 8th day of February, 1908, said stock of goods above described in said policy of insurance was destroyed by fire, without the fault of your petitioner, and the loss to your petitioner occasioned thereby was the sum of five hundred and no/100 dollars, said insurance policy covering said stock and loss to the amount of five hundred and no/100 dollars.

"Petitioner gave to the defendant immediate notice of loss, and otherwise performed all of the duties imposed upon him by the terms of said policy. Petitioner, within the time prescribed by said policy, made demand upon defendant for the amount due upon said policy, and, although said defendant had agreed and undertaken to pay such loss as might occur under said policy, the said defendant did in writing deny any and all liability to your petitioner under said policy, thereby waiving proof of loss. Nevertheless petitioner in good faith did forward and furnish to defendant proof of loss within the time prescribed in said policy, and that the said defendant still failed to pay said amount, or any part of said loss. Petitioner shows that he has now fully complied with all of the terms and conditions of the policy that it was incumbent upon him to do; but that the said defendant wholly and totally fails and refuses to comply with its part of the contract, and to pay your petitioner the loss sustained, or any part thereof."

The prayers were: "(a) That said policy, No. 12,748, issued by defendant, be reformed, and the mistake of inserting Jordan Bros. be corrected, and the name B. B. Jordan be inserted as the assured, so that the policy shall read, 'does insure B. B. Jordan,' instead of 'does insure Jordan Bros.' (b) That he have judgment against said defendant for the sum of five hundred and no/100 dollars, with interest thereon since the 8th day of April, 1908, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, with costs of suit," and for general relief. A copy of the policy was attached.

The substance of the demurrers was: That no cause of action was alleged; that, it appearing from the petition that that policy was a renewal of a former policy issued to Jordan Bros., and no notice of a change of ownership in the property insured from Jordan Bros. to B. B. Jordan having been alleged to have been given to the defendant, the petition failed to set up any reason which would authorize a reformation of the contract of insurance by a change of the parties; that no mutual mistake is alleged; that the petition shows the plaintiff guilty of laches in discovering the alleged mistake; and that the petition fails to allege any oral or written agreement to issue the policy to B. B. Jordan.

Charlton E. Battle and Howell Hollis, for plaintiff in error. Bowden & Goldstein and Carson & McCutchen, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). The substance of the petition is that the plaintiff orally applied to the proper agent of the defendant for a policy of insurance on his stock of merchandise indemnifying him against loss by fire, and the defendant's agent orally agreed to issue to him the policy applied for, but by the inadvertence of the agent in preparing the policy the name of the late firm of Jordan Bros. was substituted for that of the plaintiff. The merchandise of the plaintiff was destroyed by fire during the period of time covered by the policy, and the plaintiff seeks a reformation of the policy and a judgment for the loss sustained by fire according to the terms of the policy as reformed. It is well settled that a written contract which misstates the terms of an oral agreement on which it is founded may be reformed. The agent's inadvertent substitution of Jordan Bros. for the insured under the circumstances alleged in the petition, and the plaintiff's acceptance of the policy in reliance on the agent to issue it according to his engagement, make a case of mutual mistake relievable in equity. German Fire Insurance Co. v. Gueck, 130 Ill. 345, 23 N. E. 112, 6 L. R. A. 835; Cook v. Westchester Fire Ins. Co., 60 Neb. 127, 82 N. W. 315; Jamison v. State Ins. Co., 85 Iowa, 229, 52 N. W. 185; Taylor v. Glens Falls Fire Ins. Co., 44 Fla. 273, 32 South. 887.

The mistake in the policy was not discovered until after the fire which occurred a little less than three months after the policy was issued. It is contended that the plaintiff's failure to inspect the policy, which was in his possession for nearly three months, amounts to such laches and negligence on his part as to preclude any right of reformation of the policy. The trend of authority is that a mere failure of the insured to read his policy does not amount to such laches as will debar him from having such policy reformed for mistake therein. Fitchner v. Fidelity Mutual Fire Ins. Ass'n, 103 Iowa, 276, 72 N. W. 530; Taylor v. Glens Falls Fire Ins. Co., supra; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Gurnee, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 278, 19 Am. Dec. 431. A policy of insurance is issued by the insurer and signed by him or his agent. It is not contemplated that the insured shall sign it. In the insurer's promise to deliver an accurate policy, according to his oral agreement with the insured, the insured has a just expectation that there will be no designed variance. A man should not be permitted for his pecuniary advantage to impute it to another as gross negligence that the other trusted to his fidelity to his promise. Palmer v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 54 Conn. 488, 9 Atl. 248. The case is quite different from those instances where a man, who has negligently signed a contract, endeavors to be relieved of its obligation by setting up his own negligence. The fact that the policy as actually made out was in the plaintiff's hands for nearly three months, and until after the fire occurred, is a circumstance to be weighed by the jury as bearing on the truth of the allegation that the policy did not pursue the oral contract. But, as was said in Bidwell v. Astor Ins. Co., 16 N. Y. 266: "There is no rule of law which fixes the period within which a man may discover that a writing does not express the contract which he supposed it to contain, and which bars him of relief for delay in asserting his rights, short of the period fixed by the statute of limitations."

We are cited to the case of Thomson v. Southern Mutual Ins. Co., 90 Ga. 73, 15 S. E. 652, as authority for the proposition that the plaintiff was guilty of such gross laches in discovering the mistake in the policy that he is not entitled to the equitable relief of reformation. In that case it appeared that a policy of insurance on a dwelling house, with a vacancy clause in it of 30 days, had been renewed for several years from year to year under a general request made by the insured of the agent of the insurance company, each renewal having been made by the delivery of a receipt for the premium without the issuance of a new policy, and the agent, acting on the same general request, having in the last transaction discontinued this mode of renewal, the company in the meantime having adopted a new form of policy, with a vacancy clause limited to 10 days; and it was held that it was not a fraud against the insured, against which equity will relieve, that the agent, without giving any notice to the insured, delivered to him a policy in the new form, without informing him of the change, this policy having been thereafter retained by the insured for four months without reading it, and he never having read it until after the destruction of the premises by fire. In that case there was no pretense that there was any mutual mistake as to forms or contents of the policy, but the holder of the policy sought to reform it into one like the company had previously issued to him, basing his right to relief upon an inference of fraud from the pleaded facts. The court ruled that, inasmuch as the means of preventing a false inference was within the hands of the holder of the policy, he ought to have used them, and that the facts alleged did not make a case of fraud relievable in equity.

In all other respects the petition set forth a cause of action, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. TROVER AND CONVERSION (§ 67)—INSTRUCTIONS.

The plaintiff brought an action of trover to recover an iron safe and other personalty. Upon the trial there was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff owned the property sued for about eight years prior to the filing of the suit, at which time he left the property in the possession of one of the defendants, and that this defendant held for the plaintiff a portion of such property, without claiming any title thereto, until about six months before the suit was filed, when such defendant made a sale of a part thereof and converted it to her own use. Held, where there was evidence tending to show what was, several years prior to the conversion, the value of some of the property sold and converted about six months prior to the filing of the suit, and the evidence did not show that it was of equal or greater value between the time of the conversion and the time of the trial, it was error upon the trial of the suit, wherein the plaintiff elected to take a money verdict, for the court to charge the jury that if the plaintiff was entitled to recover any of the property sued for, he was entitled "to recover the highest proven value of this property, under the evidence in this case"; it not appearing that the court instructed the jury that the highest proven value recoverable by the plaintiff was such value between the time of the conversion and the date of the trial. Such charge was liable to mislead the jury into the belief that they were authorized to find the highest value shown by the evidence to exist prior to the conversion.

2. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The other charge complained of was not error requiring a new trial for any reason assigned.

3. PLEADING (§ 433*)—DEFECTS AND OBJECTIONS—PETITION—AIDED BY VERDICT.

Where the plaintiff, in an action of trover, in his petition asserts that the defendants are in possession of certain personalty of a named value, and refuse to deliver it to the plaintiff, or to pay him the profits thereof, and in an affidavit to obtain bail he states that "he does verily and bona fide claim said personal property," and there is no demurrer to said petition, or other objection during the trial, on the ground that the petition fails to assert title in the plaintiff, or other right to recover, and defendants, in answering, assert title to such of the property sued for as they are in possession of, such failure of the plaintiff to assert in his petition title to the property, or other right to recover, furnishes no reason for setting aside a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. HOMICIDE (§ 340)—WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

The assignments of error as to the court's instructions upon the subject of assault with intent to murder are immaterial, because they were not harmful to the defendant, as is apparent from the fact that the jury found the defendant guilty merely of shooting at another.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 715-720; Dec. Dig. § 340.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—INSTRUCTIONS—GRADE OR DEGREE OF OFFENSE.

That the judge casually referred to involuntary manslaughter as one of the species included within the general term "manslaughter" affords no ground for reversal, in view of the fact that no reference whatever was made to the subject of involuntary manslaughter in directing the attention of the jury to the applicability of the facts as they might find them to the law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-656; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

3. CORRECT CHARGE.

The defendant's defense of justification was fairly presented to the jury.

4. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

While some minor errors appear in the record, none of them could have prejudiced the rights of the defendant. Viewing the record as a whole, the defendant had a fair and legal trial, and no reason appears why the case should again be tried.

An officer charged with the execution of process may deputize another person to serve process within his presence, and the arrest will be legal if made in the presence of the officer to whom the warrant is directed, although the latter may be in possession of the warrant itself, and although the party making the arrest would not ordinarily be authorized to execute the warrant.

As a possessory warrant not only directs the arrest of the defendant, but is also the seizure of the property specified in the warrant, one who is lawfully engaged in executing a possessory warrant, directing the seizure of a pistol, is authorized to seize the property therein described; and, if such seizure results in the disclosure of the pistol, which was theretofore concealed upon the person of the defendant, the evidence of that fact is not inadmissible upon the ground that the defendant has been compelled to criminate himself, or upon the ground that the evidence of the defendant's guilt was obtained by illegal seizure and search of his person.

1. JURY (§ 90*)—COMPETENCY OF JUROR—RELATIONSHIP TO ACCUSED.

The court did not err in overruling the objection to the juror who was challenged on account of relationship. If the juror's great-grandmother and the great-grandfather of the father of the accused were brother and sister, the relationship was not within the ninth degree. See 2 Blackstone's Commentaries, 207; Smith v. State, 2 Ga. App. 576, 59 S. E. 311; Ledford v. State, 75 Ga. 857.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 449, 481*) — OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERT WITNESSES—QUALIFICATIONS—QUESTION FOR COURT OR JURY.

It is not error to allow even a nonexpert witness to give his opinion; the witness having fully stated the facts upon which the opinion was based. The probative value of the opinion is for the jury. Whether a particular witness has such learning and experience in a particular art, science, or profession as to be designated as an expert, or such as to entitle him to be deemed prima facie an expert, is a matter addressed to the sound discretion of the court; and this discretion will not be controlled, except where it is manifestly abused. Whether the learning, skill, and experience of a particular witness really entitles his testimony to be considered as that of an expert is at last to be determined by the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1034, 1070; Dec. Dig. §§ 449, 481.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 730*) — ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—ACTION OF COURT.

The court having rebuked the counsel for stating in his argument to the jury that, if the defendant was disposed to be honest and fair, he would have remunerated the prosecutor for the loss of his horse, and in connection therewith having instructed the jury that they should not consider anything outside of the testimony, said by either of the counsel, and having directed the counsel to confine themselves to the law and the evidence, it was not error to overrule the motion for a mistrial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1693; Dec. Dig. § 730.*]

4. CHARGE NOT PREJUDICIAL.

The charge of the court to which exception is taken affords the plaintiff in error no just grounds for complaint. To require the jury to be satisfied to a moral and reasonable certainty that the defendant willfully drove the horse faster or a greater distance than he was able to go was not only in accord with the language of the statute, but was also more favorable to the accused than if the word "willful" had been omitted, because, by the use of this word, the jury was impliedly told that if the driving was unintentional, or merely negligent, the accused should not be convicted.

PROCESS (§ 152*) — CLERICAL MISTAKE — EFFECT.

Suit was brought against a firm and the individual members composing the firm. In the petition the firm's name was correctly stated, as well as the correct names of the individual members. The process directed to one of the individual members incorrectly gave the initial of his middle name. The judgment followed the process in this respect, but the execution issued thereon stated the correct initial. Held, that the clerical misnomer did not invalidate the process or judgment, and was amendable.

Error from City Court of Hazelhurst; J. C. Bennett, Judge.

Action by A. L. McMillan against J. M. Denton and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and on levy of execution J. M. Denton filed an affidavit of illegality. Judgment against the affidavit, and said defendant excepted. Affirmed.

McMillan brought suit against Denton, Pittman & Co., a firm composed of J. M. Denton, W. R. Pittman, and J. D. Pittman. The suit was against the firm and against the individual members thereof. The allegations of the petition show that suit was against J. M. Denton, specifically naming him as a member of the firm. Process issued against the firm and the individual members named; but the process as to the defendant, J. M. Denton, was directed to J. H. Denton, and personal service was made upon J. M. Denton. No defense was filed, and judgment was duly rendered against the firm and the individual members served. The judgment against the defendant Denton named him J. H. Denton instead of J. M. Denton. On this judgment an execution was issued against Denton, Pittman & Co., and J. M. Denton, W. R. Pittman, and J. D. Pittman, and was levled on certain land described as the property of J. M. Denton. J. M. Denton filed an affidavit of illegality, on the ground that there was no process against him and no valid judgment against him, because of the misnomer in the initial of his middle name in the process and judgment. On the trial of the illegality J. M. Denton testified that his correct name was J. M. Denton; that he had never been known as J. H. Denton; that he was the member of the firm of Denton, Pittman & Co., who had been sued and personally served with the process. The plaintiff in execution, at the conclusion of the evidence, presented to the court a written motion to reform and amend the judgment by inserting therein the correct initial of the middle name of the defendant. Defendant demurred to the motion. The court overruled the demurrer and allowed the amendment, and the defendant excepted. The judge, without a jury, found against the affidavit of illegality, and the defendant excepted.

King & Dell and W. W. Bennett, for plaintiff in error. Price & Grant, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The court properly allowed the amendment of the judgment. It was clearly a mere clerical error, and amendable. Even without the amendment, the process and judgment were valid. The law does not regard the middle name or initial of the middle name material, unless there are two persons of the same name. Kelly v. Fudge, 2 Ga. App. 759, 59 S. E. 19; Hicks v. Riley, 83 Ga. 332, 9 S. E. 771. Here the defendant removed all doubt of any mistake as to the identity of the person who was sued as a member of the firm of Denton, Pittman & Co., by stating that he was the member of the firm and he had been served personally with process. He had no doubt that he was the person sued, and must have regarded the incorrect giving of the initial of his middle name as a simple clerical error. In addition to his knowledge, he was so informed by the copy of the petition served on him. The misnomer did not mislead him, deprived him of no right, and resulted in no possible injury to him.

Error from City Court of Washington; Wm. Wynne, Judge.

Action by Pferdmenges, Preyer & Co. against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

This was a suit to recover damages for a breach of contract of carriage, based on the following state of facts: The railroad company issued to the Washington Cotton Company, in Wilkes county, Ga., its bill of lading, reciting that the company had received 100 bales of cotton to be transported to Savannah, Ga., to be delivered to the order of the shippers, notifying the plaintiffs, Pferdmenges, Preyer & Co. This bill of lading was attached to a draft for the value of the 100 bales of cotton, drawn on the plaintiffs at Savannah. Before the cotton was received at Savannah, plaintiffs paid this draft, secured the bill of lading, demanded of the railroad company the 100 bales of cotton, and received only 96 bales. They thereupon sued the railroad company, in the city court of Washington, to recover the value of the 4 bales. It was not clear from the allegations of the petition whether the suit was in tort or for breach of the contract of carriage, and the court, at the instance of the defendant, required an election, and plaintiffs elected to proceed in tort for a conversion. The evidence did not affirmatively show any tort in Wilkes county, but did show that the conversion, if anywhere, was in Chatham county, and, in order to avoid a dismissal for want of jurisdiction, the plaintiffs voluntarily dismissed the suit. The present suit for a breach of the contract was then instituted by the plaintiffs, who had become the owners of the cotton by paying the draft. The defendant set up the proceedings in the former suit in a plea to the jurisdiction, contending that an election had been properly required and that the plaintiffs were conclusively bound by the election they had made. The court sustained a demurrer to the plea to the jurisdiction, and the defendant excepted. The defendant filed a plea seeking to contradict the recitals contained in the bill of lading as to the number of bales of cotton that had been delivered to the railroad. The plea was stricken, because it was an effort to contradict the bill of lading in the hands of a bona fide transferee for value. The defendant excepted.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming and W. A. Slaton, for plaintiff in error. Saml. H. Sibley, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. 1. The demurrer to the plea to the jurisdiction was properly sustained. The question of jurisdiction is usually determined by the allegations of the petition. The suit in this case was based on a contract made in Wilkes county, and the court had jurisdiction, regardless of what defenses the defendant may have had to the suit. Civ. Code 1895, § 2334; Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Crapps, 4 Ga. App. 550, 61 S. E. 1126. If the election made by the plaintiffs in the previous suit prevented them from suing the railroad company on the contract, this was a matter that should have been made by plea in bar, and not to the jurisdiction; for, under the allegations of the petition and the law applicable thereto, the court certainly had jurisdiction. Irrespective, however, of this reason for approving the judgment, we do not think the facts as alleged in the plea to the jurisdiction constituted any defense. When the election to proceed in tort was made in the previous case, and it appeared that the tort complained of was committed in Chatham county, it was clear that the court in Wilkes county was without jurisdiction (Brooke v. L. & N. R. Co., 3 Ga. App. 492, 60 S. E. 218); and, as the court was without jurisdiction, the proceedings could never amount to such an election as would bar the plaintiffs from bringing a suit of which the court did have jurisdiction. The remedy in tort in that court was no remedy at all, and, of course, could not be a choice of inconsistent remedies. Board of Education v. Day, 128 Ga. 167, 57 S. E. 359. And after having invoked the dismissal of the first suit, for want of jurisdiction, the defendant company is bound by the proposition that the court did not have jurisdiction of that case. Haber-Blum-Bloch Hat Co. v. Friesleben, 5 Ga. App. 123, 62 S. E. 712.

Was there any real inconsistency as to the two suits? While a cause of action for a breach of a contract of carriage is legally different from that for a conversion of the goods, and while the two causes of action cannot be commingled in the same suit (Civ. Code 1895, § 4944), still there is no inconsistency in the substance of them. Both suits in a sense, are based on the contract. If suit is brought against the railroad company for a conversion of goods which it contracted to carry and deliver, and subsequently it is discovered that there was no conversion, but that the goods were lost or destroyed, there would be no inconsistency in withdrawing the suit and subsequently suing for a breach of the contract in failing to carry and deliver. While one may be compelled to elect whether a particular suit shall proceed as one in tort or in contract, and the facts of that particular suit must abide by the election, it does not follow that the election made in that suit extinguishes all other remedies. The case of Kennedy v. Manry, 6 Ga. App. 816, 66 S. E. 29, and others of like character relied upon by the plaintiff in error, are not in point. In those cases the question was as to avoiding a sale, or affirming the sale and suing for the proceeds. The plaintiff in such case must either affirm or disaffirm; and, when once the option is exercised, it is binding and conclusive. The doctrine of election is designed to clarify the issue to be tried, and, to accomplish this purpose, it prohibits a litigant from pursuing more than one remedy in the main suit. But if he selects the wrong remedy, and fails, he is not thereby prevented from pursuing the right remedy to a successful result.

2. The plea seeking to contradict the bill of lading as to the number of bales of cotton that had been delivered to the railroad company was properly stricken. The plaintiffs were the assignees or transferees for value of this bill of lading, and had the right to sue on it. Askew v. Sou. Ry. Co., 1 Ga. App. 79, 53 S. E. 242. While a bill of lading is in some sense a receipt, and open to dispute between the parties, yet, when it is intended for negotiation, its recitals, in the hands of a bona fide transferee for value, operate as estoppels against the carrier. The bill of lading in this case was issued by the railroad company, with the intent that it should be negotiated. The purchasers of the cotton bought on the faith of the declaration of the railroad company that it had received 100 bales of cotton. If this statement was not true, the company might have some remedy against the shipper; but this does not relieve it from liability to the assignees of the bill of lading. It is a universal rule that carriers cannot contradict the recitals contained in their bills of lading as to the delivery of the goods, or their description, quantity, or condition, as against the rights of bona fide transferees for value. Bank of Sparta v. Butts, 4 Ga. App. 308, 61 S. E. 298; King v. The Lady Franklin, 8 Wall. 325, 19 L. Ed. 456, and cases in note. Judgment affirmed.

BLUMENFELD v. PALMER HARDWARE CO. (No. 2,441.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 19, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 90*) — SALE OF GOODS—"ACCEPTANCE AND RECEIPT."

Where one person orally sells to another merchandise of greater value than $50, with the understanding that it is to be a cash transaction, and the seller, in pursuance to the direction of the purchaser, weighs up the articles and puts them aside in a designated portion of his storeroom or warehouse, where they are to be turned over to the purchaser's drays, and the purchaser refuses to send for and pay for the articles, held, that there is no such acceptance and receipt of the merchandise as is contemplated by the seventh paragraph of the statute of frauds (Civ. Code 1895, § 2693), and as to make the transaction enforceable under the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 174, 175; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

2. SALES (§ 342*)—ACTION FOR PRICE.

Even if, in such a case, the expending of time and labor by the seller in causing the articles to be weighed and set aside amounted to such part performance as to give the seller any rights against the purchaser, it was not adequate to convert the transaction into an executed sale, so as to authorize suit on open account for the agreed price of the goods sold.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by the Palmer Hardware Company against Moses Blumenfeld. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

A. L. Alexander, for plaintiff in error.
Wm. B. Stephens, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The Palmer Hardware Company sued Blumenfeld on an account for the purchase price of certain stove and plow castings, amounting to $68.41. The defendant pleaded the statute of frauds. The proof showed that the hardware company sold these iron castings to Blumenfeld at the price of 75 cents per hundred, and that they were to be weighed up and set aside for him in a designated portion of the plaintiff's warehouse. The plaintiff did cause the castings to be weighed and set aside, at an expense of several dollars. It was a cash sale. The merchandise was to be paid for at the time of delivery. Either as a matter of accommodation or because it had agreed to do so (and as to this the parties were in conflict), the plaintiff had the castings loaded on drays and tendered them to the defendant, together with the bill. He rejected the articles and declined to abide the contract.

"The acceptance and receipt of merchandise of a greater value than $50, under an oral contract of sale, which is contemplated by Civ. Code 1895, § 2693, par. 7, as relieving the contract from the operation of the statute of frauds, must be such a transfer of the physical possession of the property as places the goods beyond the control of the vendor, and within the control of the vendee.' Tender and refusal to accept are not sufficient to take the case out of the statute. Brunswick Grocery Co. v. Lamar, 116 Ga. 1, 42 S. E. 366." Miller v. Smith, 6 Ga. App. 447, 448, 65 S. E. 292. Even if ordinarily the setting aside of the merchandise in a designated place in the plaintiff's warehouse, after it had been inspected by the defendant, would have amounted to delivery and acceptance, still no such constructive acceptance and delivery could be implied in the present case, because the intention of the parties was that it should be a cash sale; i. e., that the goods were not to pass beyond the control of the vendor into the control of the vendee until the purchase money was paid. No waiver of this portion of the contract can be implied in the present case; for, even in its final act of tendering the castings on the drays, the seller sent a bill for collection of the purchase price along with the goods.

2. We deem it unnecessary to decide whether the plaintiff's having gone to the expense of weighing up the iron and setting it aside would amount to such part performance of the contract as to give the plaintiff any rights under the transaction; for we think it clear that the contract never thereby became executed. The plaintiff's suit was on an open account for the purchase price of the merchandise, and not for damages on account of the defendant's breach of any executory contract or for the expenses incurred by the plaintiff in causing the articles to be weighed up and set aside at the defendant's request. On this feature, the case falls within the principle announced in Dilman v. Patterson Co., 2 Ga. App. 213, 58 S. E. 365.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 236*)—ILLEGAL SALE—EVIDENCE.

Mere possession of three gallons of corn whisky in half-pint flasks kept in the owner's dwelling, without any evidence of a sale or an attempted sale on the part of the owner, is not such a circumstance as will authorize the conclusion, based upon moral and legal certainty, that such liquor was kept for the purpose of sale. Nor does the fact that the conduct of two persons engaged by the accused to carry this liquor from his dwelling to another dwelling for safe-keeping during the owner's absence was suspicious (which conduct was not in the presence of the accused) affect the issue as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, where there is nothing in the evidence to support the inference of a sale.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)JURY (§ 25)—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY OF DEMAND.

Under the act creating the city court of Waynesboro, "either party in any civil cause shall be entitled to a trial by a jury upon his entering his demand therefor, by himself or his attorney in writing, on, or before the call of the docket at the term to which the cause is returnable." Acts 1903, p. 181, § 22. When the attorney for the defendant enters on the plea, when filed, a timely demand for a trial by a jury the defendant is not deprived of this right because the demand does not appear on the docket or on the minutes. A written demand, entered on the plea, is a substantial compliance with the statute.

Error from City Court of Waynesboro; Wm. H. Davis, Judge.

Action by J. R. Swint against W. H. Smith. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

I. S. Peebles, Jr., and C. B. Garlick, for plaintiff in error. H. J. Fullbright, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a suit on promissory notes. Defense, partial failure of consideration. Verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for a new trial on the general grounds, which was overruled. In this court he expressly abandons his motion for a new trial, and insists only on an exception pendente lite which was properly made and filed. This exception is that the court erred in sustaining a motion to strike the demand for a jury trial, alleged to have been made by the defendant.

The facts relating to this demand appear from the record as follows: Upon the plea filed at the appearance term had been written the following entry: "Georgia, Burke County. And now at the appearance term of said cause comes the defendant, through his attorney at law, and enters this his demand for a trial by jury in said case. This Sept. 1, 1909. [Signed] C. B. Garlick, Deft's Attorney." This demand was not entered by the judge on the docket, or by the clerk on the minutes; and it did not appear, other than by the entry itself, when in fact the demand was made. There was no evidence that it was not written on the plea by the attorney for the defendant at the date it purports to have been so entered. Under the act creating the city court of Waynesboro, all causes returnable to a monthly term of the court are triable at that term of the court, "provided always that either party in any case shall be entitled to a trial by a jury in said court upon his entering his demand therefor by himself or his attorney, in writing on or before the call of the docket at the term to which the cause is returnable," etc. Acts 1903, pp. 180, 181, §§ 10, 22. When the case was soundered for trial at the next quarterly term subsequent to the monthly term to which it had been filed, the court sustained the motion to strike the demand for jury trial, because it did not appear from the docket or the minutes of the court that any demand had been made on or before the call of the docket at the term to which the cause was returnable.

It will be noticed that the act does not require the demand to be entered either on the docket or on the minutes of the court. Unquestionably the better practice would be to have it entered on both, or at least on the minutes. But the statute only requires in general terms that the demand shall be entered in person or by attorney "on or before the call of the docket at the term to which the cause is returnable." Here it is not denied that the demand for a jury trial was entered on the plea, when filed, on or before the return term. The statute declares that the party entering the timely demand "shall be entitled to trial by a jury in said court." We cannot think that this right is lost by a failure to enter the demand on the docket or the minutes. Where the demand is entered on the pleadings filed in the case, it could, if necessary, be ordered entered on the minutes nunc pro tunc, or the judge could enter the demand on the docket at any time. The place where the demand is entered is a mere formality; the fact of the demand is the essential. The law, which deals with substance, and not form, will not deprive a litigant of his right to a jury trial on demand, without substantial reason. Suppose the clerk failed to enter the demand on the minutes, or the court neglected to put it on the docket; would this deprive the party of his right when it was undisputed that a timely demand had been entered in writing on the pleadings in the case? Here the case was in order for trial at the September monthly term to which it was returnable; but the clerk placed the case on the docket at the next regular quarterly term for trial by a jury. The clerk must, therefore, have had notice at the monthly term of the demand for a jury trial.

It is said by learned counsel for defendant in error that the plaintiff in error was not hurt by the failure to give him a trial by jury; that by abandoning the general grounds of his motion for a new trial he concedes that the verdict was right under the evidence. Ordinarily a complainant must show injury, as well as error, to warrant a reversal. But he may be entitled on timely demand to a trial of the facts by a jury. These arbiters of facts may have taken a different view of the evidence than that entertained by the trial judge. In our opinion, when a party has claimed his right to a jury trial in conformity with the statute regulating such right, he is entitled to have it, although it appears that the case was fairly tried by the judge, and full and ample justice done between the parties. 24 Cyc. 176. We conclude that the judge erred in sustaining the motion to strike the demand for a jury trial.

CARRIERS (§ 181½*)—LOSS OF GOODS—ACTIONS
—COMMON-LAW LIABILITY.

There was no error in refusing a nonsuit or in declining to grant a new trial. The action was based upon the carrier's common-law liability, and the case is controlled by the ruling of this court in Ohlen v. Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, 2 Ga. App. 323, 58 S. E. 511. The suit could not have been brought upon the defendant's statutory liability as the last connecting carrier, because, according to the petition, there were only two carriers concerned with the shipment, and the first of these was a steamship company. When the statement of the petition that the goods were delivered to a named steamship company is considered in connection with the distinct allegation that the defendant company received the shipment from the steamship company in apparent good order, it is apparent that the reference to the steamship company is made merely as part of the history of the case. It was evidently so treated by the defendant in the court below, because no demurrer to the petition was filed.

The fact that the owner of the property had not consented to its conversion was sufficiently shown by the circumstances under which the property was moved, as well as by the unequivocal testimony of the agent of the owner that he had entire charge of her business, and that he had not consented. The jury were authorized to believe the statement of the defendant to the effect that the owner had consented to his converting the property to his own use; but they were not required to believe the statement in preference to the sworn testimony, corroborated as it was by the circumstances of the taking. One cannot collect a debt due him by taking the property of another in payment thereof without the owner's consent; nor can an agent appointed to sell, in the absence of express authorization to that effect, be himself the buyer. Action by Gus Stearnes against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. M. Rudolph and Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, for plaintiff in error. M. C. Tarver, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a suit brought against the railroad company to recover damages for injuries to a horse. The justice rendered a judgment for $70, and the defendant appealed to a jury in the superior court. The jury found a verdict for $60, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled.

The evidence as to the negligence of the defendant and contributory negligence of the plaintiff was in conflict, and the verdict settles the question of liability. The evidence showed that the horse was temporarily totally disabled from doing any work, and there was evidence of permanent disability and consequent diminution in value. There was also proof of the amount of the hire of the horse and the cost of keeping and treating him for the injuries. The court instructed the jury in effect that the measure of damages was the difference in the value of the horse before and after the injuries, lost hire while not able to work from the injuries, and the expense of looking after and treating the horse during its disability.

This instruction is objected to, because it allows the plaintiff to recover triple damages; it being contended that the true measure was the diminution in value, and nothing more. The measure of damages as stated by the instructions is in accordance with the rule declared by the Supreme Court in Telfair County v. Webb, 119 Ga. 916, 47 S. E. 218, Atlanta & West Point R. Co. v. Hudson, 62 Ga. 680, and Atlanta Cotton Seed Oil Mills v. Coffey, 80 Ga. 150, 4 S. E. 759, 12 Am. St. Rep. 244. It is true that the court should also have charged that the aggregate of items of damages should not exceed the value of the horse with interest thereon; but the failure to do so in this case, under the evidence, resulted in no injury to the defendant, as the aggregate amount of the damages proved and found by the jury did not equal the proved value of the horse.

The other two assignments of error are without merit.

Another trial is asked for because of alleged newly discovered evidence. This newly discovered evidence tends to show that the horse was not as seriously injured as claimed by the plaintiff and as proved on the trial. A counter showing was made, and we do not think the trial judge abused his discretion in refusing a new trial on this ground. It is not probable that the evidence alleged as newly discovered, in view of the counter showing, would change the result.

Judgment affirmed.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 236*)—KEEPING FOR SALE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The circumstances were not inconsistent with the theory of innocence, and, as there is no proof in the record of any sale or attempted sale of intoxicating liquors by the accused, his conviction was unauthorized, and the certiorari should have been sustained. The fact that, upon removing with a hammer and chisel the window casing, ceiling, and wainscoting of the defendant's place of business, which had previously been occupied at various times by other persons, several bottles said to contain whisky were found between the two walls of the building, the defendant disclaiming all interest in said property and denying any knowledge that it was in the wall, is not a circumstance conclusive of his guilt of the offense of keeping intoxicating liquors for sale. Especially is the discovery of liquor under such circumstances not inconsistent with the theory of his innocence, when there is a lack of any direct evidence that the liquors were owned by him, or by him concealed, and when no circumstances appear which tend to show that he was engaged in the unlawful sale of intoxicants. The quantity of liquor alone is an inconclusive circumstance. Walker v. City of Dawson, 7 Ga. App. 417, 66 S. E. 984.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1754; Dec. Dig. § 761.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Calhoun County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

John Ayers was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Walker, for appellant. Solicitor Huldebrand, for the State.

WOODS, J. The defendant, having been convicted of manslaughter on an indictment charging him with the murder of Malley Whitmore, appeals on the ground that there was error for which a new trial should be granted in the following instruction to the jury: "If the clot on the brain caused the death of the deceased and you can trace that back to the blow, the defendant would be held responsible under this theory of the law, under the theory that the law holds a man responsible for an unlawful act intentionally done. Just as you would say of a soldier on a battlefield who was shot in the leg and gangrene would set in, or pneumonia would set in from the wound, and he would die, you would say that he was killed from a gunshot wound in battle, even though he died from pneumonia; the gunshot wound would be the cause of his death. If one strikes another a blow and so disarranges the anatomy that death results from complications that set in, within a year and a day after the blow was inflicted, you charge the death to the blow as the proximate cause."

The first error alleged is that the court assumed as a fact that the defendant intentionally struck the deceased. It is impossible that such an assumption could have affected the result, because the defendant himself admitted that he intentionally struck the deceased two blows with a stick, giving as his excuse that deceased was advancing on him and menacing him with a drawn pistol.

The other error assigned is that the court assumed that there was a clot of blood found on the brain of deceased. Indicating in the charge, as a fact, the existence of a clot on the brain of the deceased was no doubt a technical error. But to order a new trial for such an inadvertence would in this case be trifling with the administration of justice. It is true that the defendant did not admit that the blows struck by him produced death, or a clot on the brain, or any other evil consequence; but he admitted that the deceased was struck by him two blows on the head with a stick, and that he died shortly thereafter on the same day. Dr. Dreher, who made the post mortem examination, testified that death was due to a blood clot found on the brain. There was not a particle of evidence to the contrary, nor did anything appear in the whole case indicating the least doubt of the truth of the physician's statement. No jury under these circumstances could have considered that there was any issue as to the existence of the clot of blood. Thus, it is perfectly clear that the allusion of the circuit judge to the existence of the clot on the brain of the deceased could not have affected the verdict.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

1. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGE ON THE FACTS.

Under the rule that a charge stating the issues raised by the pleadings is not a charge on the facts, in violation of Const. art. 5, § 26, an instruction in an action on an account for goods sold and delivered, that the only issue in the case was who made the contract, to whom did plaintiff intend to sell, and who intended to buy, was not a charge on the facts.

Hydrick and Woods, JJ., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by the C. B. Crosland Company against Rachel M. Pearson. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Newton & Owens, for appellant. Townsend & Rogers, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action upon an account, for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $395.40, which was afterwards reduced to $387.85, and the defendant appealed.

The first exception assigns error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in charging the jury that "there is only one pivotal issue in this case before you, and that is, Who made this contract, to whom did Crosland intend to sell the goods, and who intended to buy them," on the ground that the charge was in violation of article 5, § 26 of the Constitution, which provides that "judges shall not charge juries, in respect to matters of fact, but shall declare the law."

It is not a charge on the facts to state the issues raised by the pleadings. Miles v. Tel. Co., 55 S. C. 403, 33 S. E. 493. If the presiding judge states the issues erroneously, it is the duty of counsel to call his attention to such error; otherwise he waives the right to make it the basis of an exception on an appeal to the Supreme Court. State v. Still, 68 S. C. 37, 46 S. E. 524, 102 Am. St. Rep. 657.

The second exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred in charging the jury, 'It is a matter of no consequence as to how they were charged on these daybooks,' error being that this was a charge upon facts, and further error that this took from the jury the right to consider the original entry; the evidence being the charge that was made in the books referred to." The words of his honor, the presiding judge, set out in this exception, are only part of a sentence. His charge in this respect, was as follows: "If Mrs. Pearson went to the store and got the goods, and if her daughters went there and got the goods, and the intention and agreement was that she should be liable for the goods, it is a matter of no consequence as to how they were charged on these daybooks. You may look at these books, to throw light upon the transaction, but if the agreement between the parties, to wit, Mrs. Pearson and Crosland, was that she was to get the goods, and she was to be liable for the goods, and Crosland sold them upon that agreement, why these entries in the daybooks are not conclusive." His honor simply meant to charge the jury, that it was immaterial to whom the goods were charged on the daybooks, if there was an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant that she was to be liable for them. An account may be proved not only by the book of original entry, but also by the personal knowledge of a witness, or the admissions of the debtor. Walker v. Laney, 27 S. C. 150, 3 S. E. 63. The ruling of the presiding judge is sustained by the case of Lorick v. Caldwell, 85 S. C. 94, 67 S. E. 143.

The third exception is as follows: "Because the verdict is not in accordance with the proven facts in this case, particularly there was no sufficient proof, nor any proof, for the items of balance of account for 1906, in the sum of $14.66, which item was necessarily included, and made a part of the verdict of $395.40." It is only necessary to refer to the following testimony of Frank Crosland to show that this exception cannot be sustained: "Q. When the settlement was due in 1906, was any objection made by her or any one in her behalf? A. No, sir; never since we have done business with her. Q. How much balance was left from the 1906 account? A. Fourteen dollars and something. Q. Does your book show it? A. Yes, sir. The Court: Was the balance struck, and after it was struck did she admit that it was due? A. Yes, sir. Q. How much was that balance? A. Fourteen dollars and sixty-six cents."

The fourth exception is as follows: "Because the jury erred in finding that the defendant was liable for the items, in the sum of $217.54, which were purchased by Moses Pearson and children of Moses Pearson, and was so entered on the books of original entry. We have already shown, that charging an account upon the books of original entry is not conclusive. There was testimony tending to show not only that the defendant had agreed with the plaintiff to be liable for the account, but afterwards acknowledged its correctness, thus showing that there was testimony sustaining the verdict, in which case, as this is an action at law, the facts are not reviewable by this court.

The fifth exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred in not granting the motion to strike from the record and the testimony the evidence of R. B. Crosland and Frank Crosland; it being respectfully submitted that there was no evidence to show that R. B. Crosland and Frank Crosland were connected in any way with the C. B. Crosland Company." The exception falls to point out wherein it was incumbent on the plaintiff to show that the Croslands were connected in any way with the C. B. Crosland Company. The appellant's attorneys have, however, argued as if the exception had assigned error on the part of the presiding judge, in the following particular: "In allowing the witnesses R. B. Crosland and Frank Crosland to testify from books which purported to be books of original entry of the plaintiff, when the same had not been duly authenticated, and the two witnesses had not been shown to be connected in any way with the plaintiff." Even if the exception had raised this question, it could not be sustained, as the books were introduced in evidence without objection, and the testimony tended to prove, at least inferentially, that the Croslands were connected with said company.

The sixth exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred in overruling motion to strike from the record all the account for 1906, it being submitted that it was error to submit the same, over objection of counsel for defendant, who insisted upon proof of the balance, and the items out of which that balance grew, and the plaintiff had served bill of particulars concerning same." What was said, in considering the third exception, disposes of the question presented by this exception.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

WOODS, J., concurs in the result and in the separate opinion of HYDRICK, J.

HYDRICK, J. I concur, except in the reasons given for overruling the first exception.

While it is generally true that stating the issues is not charging upon the facts, for, in doing so, the judge does not state the allegations of the pleadings as facts, but merely as what the parties respectively allege the facts to be; still, I can see how a judge might charge upon the facts, even in stating the issues. And if he should do so, it might be reversible error.

If there had been really more than one issue of fact in this case, I think it would have been error to charge as complained of. But a careful examination of the record convinces me that there was really only one issue of fact for the jury, and the one stated by the judge. To be sure, under the pleadings, every item of the account was in issue, but they had all been regularly proved, and the only items contested by the defendant in evidence had been voluntarily deducted from the account. Therefore, unless the jury disregarded the uncontradicted testimony of plaintiff's witnesses, given in proof of the items, they were bound to find for plaintiff the amount so proved, if they found the defendant liable for the account.

METZ v. CRITCHER et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910.)

MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 78*)—"CONSENT" OF OWNER—NECESSITY OF PROTEST.

Civ. Code 1902, § 3008, provides that any person to whom a debt is due for materials furnished and used in the erection of any building, by virtue of an agreement with "or by consent of the owner of such building," shall have a lien. Section 3011 provides that the owner of any such building, in process of erection, other than the party by whom or in whose behalf a contract for materials has been made, may prevent the attachment of any lien for materials not then furnished by giving notice, in writing, to the person furnishing such material that he will not be responsible therefor. A contractor purchased lumber of plaintiff to be used in defendant's house, but the only evidence that the owner knew from whom the lumber was obtained was his direction to one of plaintiff's teamsters to tell plaintiff to send him good lumber. Held, that the word "consent," as used in the statute, implies "choice," and implies an agreement which, but for the consent, could not exist, and which the party consenting has a right to forbid, and that section 3011 does not necessitate a notice that the owner of a building will not be responsible for the material used therein, unless he had given his consent, as provided by section 3008, and that a lien did not exist on defendant's property for the lumber furnished by plaintiff, as he gave no consent to have plaintiff furnish the lumber.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; W. B. Gruber, Special Judge.

Action by A. B. Metz against W. E. Critcher and W. B. Oswald. A verdict was directed for defendant Oswald, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 83 S. C. 406, 65 S. E. 394.

James M. Patterson, for appellant. Bates & Simms, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The appeal in this proceeding to foreclose a mechanic's lien depends on whether the circuit court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant Oswald on the ground that there was no evidence tending to establish his liability. The plaintiff testified that he sold lumber to the defendant W. E. Critcher, and that there was a balance of $324.65 unpaid; that he had been paid for all lumber sold to Critcher except that used by Critcher in building a house on land of the defendant Oswald. The plaintiff admitted that he sent the lumber on Critcher's order and charged it to Critcher on his books; that he made no contract with Oswald, and gave him no previous notice that he was about to furnish lumber to be used in building a house for him. The only evidence tending to show that Oswald even knew of the source from which Critcher was obtaining the lumber was the statement of one of plaintiff's wagoners that Oswald said to him, as he drove by his store, "to tell Mr. Metz to send him good lumber; that he did not want any with knots in it."

For the plaintiff to establish a lien on the building of Oswald, the owner, it was necessary for him to show that he had met the requirements of section 3008 of the Civil Code of 1902, by evidence that Oswald had agreed or consented that he should furnish the lumber, and that it was furnished under such agreement or consent. That section provides: "Any person to whom a debt is due for labor performed or furnished, or for materials furnished and actually used in the erection, alteration, or repair of any building or structure upon any real estate, by virtue of an agreement with, or by consent of, the owner of such building or structure, or any person having authority from, or rightfully acting for, such owner, in procuring or furnishing such labor or materials, shall have a lien upon such building or structure, and upon the interest of the owner thereof in the lot of land upon which the same is situated, to secure the payment of the debt so due to him, and the costs which may arise in enforcing such lien under this chapter, except as is provided in the following sections."

The meaning of the word "consent" as here used, has been stated in two cases. Chief Justice McIver, in delivering the opinion of the court in Geddes v. Bowden, 19 S. C. 1, says: "The word 'consent' ordinarily implies choice, and one can scarcely be regarded as giving his consent to that which he has no right to object to. In the experience of life a man is oftentimes compelled to accept results, in the sense that he makes no opposition or objection thereto, for the reason that he has no right or power so to do, but he cannot, in any proper sense of the term, be regarded as consenting to them, unless he has the right and power to exercise a choice to consent or object thereto. As is well said by Mr. Chief Justice Simpson, in Gray v. Walker, 16 S. C. 147, in construing this statute: 'Consent here, we think, implies something more than a mere acquiescence in a state of things already in existence. It implies an agreement to that which, but for the consent, could not exist, and which the party consenting has a right to forbid.'"

This section as thus construed is not in the least inconsistent with section 3011, which is as follows: "The owner of any such building or structure in process of erection, or being altered or repaired, other than the party by whom or in whose behalf a contract for labor or materials has been made, may prevent the attaching of any lien for labor thereon not at the time performed, or materials not then furnished, by giving notice, in writing, to the person performing or furnishing such labor, or furnishing such materials, that he will not be responsible therefor."

It is not necessary for the owner of the property to give notice under section 3011 that he will be responsible for the labor or material, unless the labor or material was to be furnished by virtue of his agreement or consent, as provided by section 3008. The meaning of the two sections construed together is that under section 3008 a lien may be put upon property for material or labor expended thereon, when the owner agrees or consents that it shall be so expended; but under section 3011, if the owner is not himself the party by whom or in whose behalf the contract for labor or material has been made, but has made himself responsible by the agreement or consent mentioned in section 3008, he may give notice that he will not be responsible for labor or material furnished after the date of such notice, and thus prevent his liability extending to labor or material furnished after that time. Section 3011 applies only when the owner, having become liable under section 3008, wishes to terminate his liability.

Oswald never became liable under section 3008, for there is no evidence that he had any opportunity or any right either to object or to consent to the contract between Metz and Critcher. The message sent by the wagoner asking Metz to furnish good lumber does not indicate that Oswald did anything more than recognize a contract already made between other persons, which he could not prevent. It was a mere request which he had no power to enforce; and the utmost inference that could be drawn from it was that Oswald acquiesced in a state of things already in existence. A verdict in his favor was therefore inevitable under the law, as laid down in the cases above cited.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

HYDRICK, J. I concur in the result. See opinion on former appeal in this case, 83 S. C. 405, 65 S. E. 394.

HARRIS et al. v. HARRIS et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 21, 1910.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 327*)—
SALE OF REAL ESTATE—POWER OF COURT.

The court has power to order a sale of real estate held by executors in a will directing them to collect the rents thereof, and divide the same among testator's wife and children, until the youngest child should reach maturity, and then to sell the land and divide the proceeds among the wife and children, and to order a reinvestment of the proceeds, after careful investigation, so that the rights of the remaindermen may be fully protected.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

Action by Annie C. Harris, Executrix, and another against William W. Harris and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank B. Gary, for appellants. Wm. P. Greene, for respondents.

WOODS, J. By his will John A. Harris, late of the county of Abbeville, devised certain of his real estate to his wife for life, directing his executors at her death to sell it and divide the proceeds among his children. He provided that all his other lands should be kept together, his executors to collect the rents and profits and divide among his wife and children, until the youngest child should reach majority, and that then the executors should sell the land and divide the proceeds among his wife and children.

This action was brought by the widow, as executrix, and in her own right, and J. C. Harris, as executor, against the children of the testator to have a lot of the land sold by order of the court and the proceeds of sale reinvested. The circuit court ordered the sale and reinvestment and the defendants appeal on the ground (1) that the court had no power to make an order which would in any wise disarrange the testator's scheme with respect to the property as expressed in his will; and (2) that even if the court possessed such power it was in this case improperly exercised.

There can be no doubt of the power of the court of common pleas to order a sale of specific property, held either under a trust or under a direct limitation vested or contingent, and a reinvestment of the proceeds of sale. Bofil v. Fisher, 8 Rich. Eq. 1, 55 Am. Dec. 627; De Leon v. Barrett, 22 S. C. 412; Powers v. Bullwinkle, 33 S. C. 293, 11 S. E. 971. Such power, it is true, should be exercised with great caution and after careful investigation by the court, for in such matters the interests of remaindermen, especially infants, may be readily sacrificed, and the court imposed upon by intentional wrong or negligence of guardians ad litem or other persons. In this case, examination of the record shows the utmost good faith, careful investigation by the court, and conclusive proof that the change of investment would be of great advantage to all the parties concerned, including the minor children.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

STATE ex rel. McINVAILLE v. ROUSE, Magistrate.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 18, 1910.)

1. MANDAMUS (§§ 7, 27*)—WHEN REMEDY LIES—JUDICIAL FUNCTIONS.

Mandamus lies to compel a judicial officer to perform a plain ministerial duty, but is somewhat discretionary with the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 5, 63; Dec. Dig. §§ 7, 27.*]

2. MANDAMUS (§ 61*)—MINISTERIAL FUNCTIONS—ISSUANCE OF WARRANT.

Issuance of a warrant on information on oath that an offense has been committed is ordinarily a ministerial duty, as affecting the propriety of mandamus to compel performance of it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 122; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

3. MANDAMUS (§ 61*)—ISSUANCE OF WARRANTS—JUDICIAL DISCRETION.

If the judge applied to for mandamus to compel a magistrate to issue a second warrant of arrest for fraudulent violation of a contract for personal service considered that the warrant charged the same offense of which accused was convicted under the first warrant, and that justice would not be promoted by another arrest, he had discretion to refuse the writ.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 122; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 67*)—FRAUDULENT VIOLATION OF CONTRACT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Cr. Code 1902, § 357a, enacted Feb. 25, 1904 (24 St. at Large, 428), relating to convictions for violating farm labor contracts referred to in sections 355 and 357, is unavailable to an employer seeking mandamus to compel issuance of a warrant for fraudulent violation of such a contract, since the statute has been declared to be unconstitutional.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Darlington County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Application by the State on the relation of I. T. McInville for mandamus against C. R. Rouse, Magistrate. From an order refusing the writ, relator appeals. Affirmed.

Miller & Lawson, for appellant. Macfarlan & Thornwell, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. This appeal is from an order of the circuit court refusing to grant writ of mandamus against a magistrate requiring him to issue a warrant of arrest for fraudulent and malicious violation of a contract for personal service.

In December, 1909, Manning Albert entered into a contract by which he agreed to work on a farm for the relator during the year 1910. He refused to enter upon service thereunder and subsequently entered into a contract to serve E. D. Summer for that year. A warrant was issued by Magistrate Rouse on January 4, 1910, charging that Albert fraudulently and with intent to injure McInville failed and refused to render personal service in violation of his contract on the 1st, 3d, and 4th days of January, 1910. Albert was arrested and on trial pleaded guilty and was sentenced to pay a fine of $25 or to serve 30 days on the chain gang. This trial was held on January 7, 1910. Albert paid the fine and was discharged that day. On January 6, 1910, while Albert was in custodia legis under the above warrant, the relator presented an affidavit and requested the magistrate to issue a warrant against Albert for refusal to render service under the contract on the 5th and 6th days of January, 1910. The magistrate refused to issue the warrant, on the ground that Albert had already been convicted for the same offense under the former warrant. Upon hearing the return showing the facts as stated above, Judge Memminger refused the writ in a short order without stating his reasons therefor.

Appellant presents the following exceptions:

1. Because his honor erred in holding that mandamus would not lie to compel the issuance of a warrant, and in refusing the writ on said ground.

2. Because his honor erred in holding that the issuance of the warrant was discretionary with the magistrate, whereas he should have held that the issuance thereof was ministerial and compellable by mandamus.

3. Because his honor erred in holding that the magistrate could prejudice the plea of former jeopardy in refusing to issue the warrant, and in denying the writ on said ground, whereas he should have held that the defense of former jeopardy could be interposed by the defendant only after the issuance of the warrant.

4. Because his honor erred in holding that the act of the General Assembly (24 St. at Large, 428), providing punishment for violation of labor contracts, etc., was without force and effect, and utterly null, and that the magistrate was not required by said act to issue said warrant, whereas, it is respectfully submitted, his honor should have held that the said act made it mandatory on the magistrate to issue said warrant, in that (a) said act was not impaired by Ex parte Hollman, 79 S. C. 11, 60 S. E. 19, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242, (b) that said act has not been repealed by any subsequent act, either expressly or by implication, (c) that said act did not violate section 24, art. 1 of the Constitution of the United States and the act passed in pursuance thereof, known as the "Peonage Statute," nor the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, nor section 5, art. 1, of the Constitution of this state.

5. Because his honor held that two different, distinct, and independent violations of the labor contract constituted but one offense, whereas he should have held that said violations constituted several offenses, conviction for one of which would not bar prosecution for another, and he erred in not so holding and granting the writ accordingly.

There is nothing in the record that would authorize this court to assume that Judge Memminger made the rulings mentioned in the exceptions alone. The only question fairly arising is whether there was error in refusing the writ upon the facts stated in the record. We think there was no error. It may be conceded that mandamus will lie to compel a judicial officer to perform a plain, ministerial duty, and that the issuance of a warrant, upon information on oath that a criminal offense has been committed, is ordinarily a ministerial duty. The writ, however, is not demandable as of right, but rests to some extent in the discretion of the court. State v. Turner, 32 S. C. 350, 11 S. E. 99; Abbeville v. McMillan, 52 S. C. 73, 29 S. E. 540; 19 Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 753. If Judge Memminger considered that the second warrant which was sought really charged the same offense of which Albert was convicted under the first warrant, and that justice would not be promoted by another arrest and trial, it was within his discretion to refuse the writ. Such was very probably his ground for refusal, and we are satisfied with his action.

The Act of 1908 (25 St. at Large, p. 1060) provides: "Section 1. That any person who shall hereafter contract with another to render to him personal service of any kind, and thereafter fraudulently, or with malicious intent to injure his employer, fail or refuse to render such service as agreed upon, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." The undisputed facts show that while Albert entered into the labor contract he did not in fact undertake to perform any service thereunder, but repudiated the contract by entering into service for another. His breach of the first contract was complete, continuous, and uninterrupted from the beginning. This was not a case in which there was a breach, then a restoration of service under the contract, and then another breach; but is the case of a single and continuous breach throughout the period covered by both warrants, and could not be split up into as many offenses as there are days or hours in the year.

Appellant can receive no aid from the amendment known as section 357a of the Criminal Code, enacted February 25, 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 428), because the amendment by its terms relates to convictions for violation of farm labor contracts referred to in sections 355 and 357, Criminal Code, which statute was declared unconstitutional in Ex parte Hollman, 79 S. C. 9, 60 S. E. 19, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242. The act of 1908 covering this subject does not contain the provisions of section 357a.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

RAFIELD v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910.)

1. VENUE (§ 46*)—STATUTES—TRANSFER OF ACTION FOR TRIAL.

Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 147, providing that the court may change the place of trial when the county designated is not the proper county, confers jurisdiction to the extent of changing the place of trial, where the county designated is not the proper county, and the court in an action against a nonresident of the county may not dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction, but may remove the case to the proper county for trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 68; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

2. VENUE (§ 72*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—ISSUES—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where the complaint in an action against a railroad company alleged that defendant was a foreign corporation operating a line through the county in which the action was brought, wherein it had agents for the transaction of its business, and defendant, in support of its motion to transfer the case to another county for trial, showed by affidavit that it did not control the line in the county within which the action was brought, any further than that it operated trains over the line owned by another railroad company, and that it had no place of business along the line, the court must determine the issue of fact whether the company operated a line of railroad in the county in which the action was brought, so that on the court finding that the complaint was true, it could properly refuse to transfer the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 127; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1024*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—FINDINGS ON MOTION TO TRANSFER CASE TO ANOTHER COUNTY.

The findings of the court on a motion to transfer a case on the ground that defendant is a nonresident of the county are not reviewable by the Supreme Court on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3836; Dec. Dig. § 1024.*]

4. APPEARANCE (§ 23*)—GENERAL APPEARANCE.

An appearance by defendant for the purpose of questioning the jurisdiction of the court, and an answer pleading only to such jurisdiction by alleging that the court has no jurisdiction because defendant is a nonresident of the county, etc., are not a waiver of the right to object that the action was brought in the wrong county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. §§ 111, 112; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lexington County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by Lucretia Rafeld, an infant, by her guardian ad litem, Mattie Rafeld, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and another. From an order refusing to transfer the case from Lexington county to Richland county for trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Graham & Sturkie, Barnard B. Evans, and Eford & Dreher, for appellants. Barron, Moore & Barron, R. B. Herbert, and Lyles & Lyles, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an appeal from an order refusing to transfer the above-stated case, from Lexington county to Richland county, for trial.

The following statement appears in the record: "The plaintiff brought this action by her guardian ad litem for injuries received while riding on the car of the defendant the Columbia Electric Street Railway, Light & Power Company on the 26th day of June, 1909, by reason of collision with the train of defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Said accident occurred in the city of Columbia, in Richland county. This action was commenced by service of summons and complaint on both the defendants, on July 19, 1909."

The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions involved, are as follows: "That the defendant the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company is a foreign corporation, chartered and existing under the laws of some state unknown to this plaintiff, but at the times hereinafter mentioned, was, and is now, operating and controlling as lessee thereof, a railroad extending from the city of Columbia, S. C., to the city of Greenville, in the state aforesaid, passing through the county of Lexington, where it has agents and stations for the transaction of its business, and at the times hereinafter mentioned the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company was, and is now, the owner of locomotives, cars, and other appurtenances of said railroad; and owns and operates other railroads in said state; and that the said Columbia Electric Street Railway, Light & Power Company is a corporation duly chartered and existing, under and by the laws of this state, and at the times hereinafter mentioned, was, and is now, the owner, operator, and controller of a street railroad in the city of Columbia, S. C., and owns and operates the cars and other appurtenances of said railroad, and owns property in the county of Lexington aforesaid. That the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company is a carrier of passengers and freight, on and over its railroads, for hire. * * *"

The Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co. served the following answer: "The defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company appearing only for the purpose of questioning the jurisdiction of this honorable court, and pleading only to such jurisdiction, answering the complaint herein, alleges: That no cause of action exists against it, as alleged in the complaint, of which this court has jurisdiction, for the reason that neither of the defendants named is a resident of the county of Lexington. This defendant is a corporation created and existing under the laws of the state of Virginia, is a citizen of said state, and has no railroad track, as owner or lessee, office or agent, upon whom process can be served in the county of Lexington, and does no business in said county; nor did it have such track, office, or agent at the time of the commencement of this action."

The answer of the Columbia Street Railway Light & Power Company was similar, except in the allegation, that it "is a resident of the county of Richland, and does no business in the county of Lexington, but is a domestic corporation, and has its principal and only place of business in Richland county."

The attorneys for each of the defendants, served the following notice upon the plaintiff's attorney: "Please take notice that on Monday, the 1st day of November, 1909, at 10 o'clock a. m., or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, at Lexington courthouse, upon the pleadings herein, and the annexed affidavits, the undersigned will move before his honor, Judge J. S. Wilson, for an order dismissing the above-stated case for want of jurisdiction, and failing in that, for an order removing said case to Richland county, and for leave to answer the complaint when so removed."

The affidavit of Wm. G. Childs, which was annexed to the notice of motion, contains the following statements: "That he is president of the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company, which runs from the city of Columbia to Laurens, S. C., passing for a considerable distance through the county of Lexington. That the passenger traffic and service, done by one train each way daily on said railroad through Lexington county, is carried on by the said Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company, with engines, cars, and crews, which are the property of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, but that while said trains and crews are on the road of the said Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company in Lexington county, they are operated solely under and by the rules, orders and control of the officers of the said last-named railroad company, the same paying to the said Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company a stipulated sum per train mile per month for the use by the said Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company of the said trains; and the said monthly rental is paid, irrespective of the amount of revenue made by the said Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company on account of the use by it of the said trains; that the said Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company does not own or control, by lease or otherwise, the railroad of the said Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company through the county of Lexington, over which the aforesaid cars of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company are operated as aforesaid. That the said Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company has no agent or place of business along the said railroad in Lexington county as aforesaid. That with the exception of the two trains rented from the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, as aforesaid, the entire traffic over the said railroad in Lexington county is handled and conducted by the engines, crews, and employes of the said Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company."

The plaintiff submitted the affidavit of H. A. Lorick in which he says: "That he is a merchant residing at Irmo, in the county of Lexington, said state of South Carolina; that he has been in the merchandise business at that place for eight years; that he sees passenger trains and locomotives passing over the railroad at said place with the following words printed or painted on said locomotives and passenger cars, 'Atlantic Coast Line,' and that said railroad extends from Columbia, S. C., to Laurens, S. C.; that the ticket agent at Irmo sells tickets to passengers on said trains of the Atlantic Coast Line, and that deponent has frequently bought tickets from the station agent at said place to points on said railroad, and was conveyed in the cars of the Atlantic Coast Line."

We do not deem it necessary to refer to the other affidavits which accompanied the notice of motion.

His honor, the presiding judge, made the following order: "A motion having been made to transfer the above-stated case to Richland county for trial, and after hearing the arguments, for and against said motion, it is ordered: That said motion be, and the same is hereby, refused."

The defendants appealed upon exceptions, the first of which is as follows: "It is respectfully submitted that his honor, Judge Wilson, erred in refusing the motion of both the defendants for an order dismissing the case for want of jurisdiction, since it appeared that neither defendant has now, or had at the time of the bringing of the action, any agent in Lexington county on whom process could be served, and maintained no office and owned and operated no railroad in said county, and that both defendants were therefore nonresidents of said county."

Section 147 of the Code provides "that the court may change the place of trial, in the following cases: (1) When the county designated for that purpose in the complaint, is not the proper county." In construing this section of the Code the court uses the following language in the case of Steele v. Exum, 22 S. C. 276: "There may be a full jurisdiction, or a limited jurisdiction in courts, determined by the law which confers it. In cases of the kind before the court, we think that section 147 has conferred upon the courts of this state jurisdiction, to the extent of changing the place of trial, in cases falling under the sections referred to."

It was ruled in the case of Geisler v. Sanders, 26 S. C. 70, 1 S. E. 159, that, as the defendant was not a resident of the county in which he was sued, the court of common pleas for that county, while without jurisdiction to try the case on its merits, had the right to order its removal to the proper county. The language therein used by the court, was as follows: "As we understand the order of his honor, the motion to transfer was refused, because, in his judgment, the court in Chester 'had no jurisdiction in the case' and consequently that he could not hear the motion, and it was on that ground that the complaint was dismissed. Under Steele v. Exum, supra, this was error." Thus showing that the court was without jurisdiction to dismiss the complaint. This exception is overruled.

The second exception is as follows: "It is respectfully submitted that his honor, Judge Wilson, erred in refusing motion of defendants for an order removing said case to Richland county, and for leave to answer the complaint when so removed, when it appeared that neither defendant maintained any office in Lexington county, was in any way represented by an agent residing in said county, or owned, operated, or leased any railroad in said county, or was a resident of said county."

The allegations of the complaint hereinbefore set out, and the denial thereof by the defendants in their answers, raised an issue as to the questions assumed in this exception. The affidavit of Lorick tends to sustain the allegations of the complaint. Bush v. Ry., 63 S. C. 96, 40 S. E. 1029.

In the case of Ransom v. Anderson, 9 S. C. 438, the court quotes with approval the following language from Wayland v. Tysen, 45 N. Y. 281: "The court has no power to strike out as sham an answer consisting of a general denial of the material allegations of the complaint," basing its ruling upon the principle that a denial of the material allegations of the complaint raises an issue of fact, which must be referred to the jury for trial. There is no difference in principle between that case and the one under consideration. Furthermore, the findings of fact which were necessarily involved, in the conclusion announced by the circuit judge are not reviewable by this court, as the action is legal in its nature.

There is another reason why this exception cannot be sustained. The question of jurisdiction relates to the person, and not the subject-matter. Jenkins v. Ry., 84 S. C. 343, 66 S. E. 409. The answers denying the allegations of the complaint put in issue material questions of fact. The defendants therefore waived the right to raise the objection that the court did not have jurisdiction to try the case upon the merits. Graveley v. Graveley, 20 S. C. 104; Oliver v. Fowler, 22 S. C. 534. This exception is also overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the order of the circuit court be affirmed.

JONES, C. J. I concur upon the grounds mentioned, except as to waiver. The appearance and answer being expressly limited to the question of jurisdiction, there was no waiver.

WOODS and HYDRICK, JJ., concur in the result and in the remarks of the Chief Justice.

STATE v. DALBY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1134*)—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 42*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—QUESTIONS FOR REVIEW—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF LAW.

Where accused is indicted under the common law, and is sentenced under Cr. Code 1902, § 78, providing that where no punishment is provided by statute, the court shall award such sentence as is conformable to the common usage in this state, he cannot question the constitutionality of an act relating to the offense for which he was indicted and sentenced, and his exceptions to the refusal of the court to quash the indictment, on the ground that the act is unconstitutional, present only speculative questions, which the court on appeal will not consider.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1134;* Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 39, 40; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

2. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 53*)—AGGRAVATED ASSAULT—USE OF DEADLY WEAPON.

Assault and battery of an aggravated nature may be committed without the use or presence of a deadly weapon.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1208*)—SENTENCE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

A sentence imposed under Cr. Code 1902, § 78, providing that where no punishment is provided by statute the court shall award such sentence as is conformable to the common usage in the state, according to the nature of the offense, is wholly within the discretion of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3281-3295; Dec. Dig. § 1208.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Charleston County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

James Dalby was convicted of an assault and battery, and appeals. Affirmed.

Alonzo E. Twine, for appellant. Solicitor John E. Peurifoy, for the State.

HYDRICK, J. Appellant was indicted for an assault and battery with intent to rape, and convicted of an assault and battery of a high and aggravated nature. From sentence to five years at labor upon the public works of the county, or in the state penitentiary, he appeals.

The defendant moved to quash the indictment, which was in the usual form, on the ground that the statute under which it is laid is unconstitutional. The act referred to is entitled, "An act to prescribe the punishment for rape and assault with intent to ravish, and provide for taking deposition of female witness in such cases." 26 Stat. 206. The act merely prescribes the punishment for rape and assault with intent to ravish, and for the taking of the deposition of the female alleged to have been assaulted. It provides also for the presence of the accused at the taking of the deposition, and his right to cross-examination, just as if the testimony were taken in open court.

The indictment was not laid under the statute, but under the common law. The record does not show that the testimony of the prosecutrix was taken by deposition, under the provision of the act. As the defendant was not convicted of rape or of assault with intent to ravish, but only of assault and battery of a high and aggravated nature, the sentence was not imposed under or by virtue of the provisions of the act in question, but under section 78 of the Criminal Code, which is as follows: "In cases of legal conviction, where no punishment is provided by statute, the court shall award such sentence as is conformable to the common usage and practice in this state, according to the nature of the offense, and not repugnant to the Constitution."

It appears therefore that appellant is not in a position to question the constitutionality of the act upon any ground, because it does not appear that any right of his has been affected by its provisions, and the exceptions to the refusal of the court to quash the indictment on that ground present only speculative questions, which this court will not consider. Cantwell v. Williams, 35 S. C. 602, 14 S. E. 549; Lowrimore v. Mfg. Co., 60 S. C. 153, 38 S. E. 430.

The next assignment of error is in instructing the jury that "any violent seizure of the person of another was aggravated assault and battery, whereas he should have charged that a seizure, no matter how violent, unaccompanied with a deadly weapon, would not amount to aggravated assault and battery." An examination of the charge shows that this exception was taken under a misapprehension. Nowhere does the judge charge as alleged in the exception. On the contrary, he did charge that a violent seizure of the person of another might not be even a common assault and battery, and illustrated by saying if one violently seized the person of another to prevent him from falling into the water, or from being run over by a street car, it would not be an assault and battery, showing that an unlawful intent is necessary to constitute the offense.

As to the last part of the exception, it is only necessary to say that it is not the law that an assault and battery must be made with or accompanied by the use of a deadly weapon to make it an assault and battery of a high and aggravated nature. This offense may be committed in many ways, unaccompanied by the use of a deadly weapon. The use of a deadly weapon, however, is usually held to make an assault one of an aggravated nature.

The sentence, being imposed under the provisions of the Code above quoted, was, within the terms of that section, wholly within the discretion of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

ROUNTREE v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE RY. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 13, 1910. On Petition for Rehearing, Aug. 8, 1910.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—ACTION FOR PERSONAL INJURIES—SAFE PLACE—EVIDENCE—PEREMPTORY INSTRUCTION—REFUSAL OF.

Where, in an action for personal injuries, there was evidence that plaintiff's employer had not provided a safe place for him to work in, a peremptory instruction for defendant was properly refused.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—ACTION FOR PERSONAL INJURIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where, in an action for personal injuries, there was evidence that the car from which plaintiff fell and was injured had many times been used by him and his fellow workmen when it was empty, to ride over the same track at the rate of between 20 and 30 miles an hour without accident, it was a question for the jury whether plaintiff's riding in it was such a danger as a reasonably prudent man would not have subjected himself to, regardless of the orders of his superior.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERROR FAVORING PARTY COMPLAINING—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for personal injuries, an instruction assumed that there was evidence of a rule prohibiting employees to ride on the car from which plaintiff fell and was injured, yet, as the assumption was in defendant's favor, it could not complain.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by W. P. Rountree, by guardian ad litem, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company and J. F. Owens. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

P. A. Willcox, J. T. Barron, Wyman & Wyman, and Lucian W. McLeMore, for appellants. R. C. Holman, R. A. Ellis, and E. J. Best, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff, while in the employment of the defendant railroad company, fell from a dump or dummy car loaded with cross-ties, and in this action recovered a verdict of $3,333 for the resulting injuries, under the allegation that the fall was due to defendant's negligence. The circuit court ordered a new trial, unless the plaintiff should remit $1,111 from the verdict. The plaintiff complied with the order and entered judgment for $2,222, the reduced amount.

The main position relied on by defendants in support of the appeal is that the circuit court erred in refusing the motion for direction of a verdict in favor of defendants, made on the following grounds: "(1) In that the accident and injury to the plaintiff were due to the entire negligence of the plaintiff. (2) In that the accident and injury to the plaintiff were due to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. (3) In that the accident and injury to the plaintiff were due to a mere accident, without any negligence on the part of this defendant." The defendants assigned error also in the refusal of a motion for a nonsuit, made on the same grounds.

The question here is, Did the evidence make any one of the inferences stated as the grounds of defendants' motions inevitable? If not, then the issues of sole negligence of the plaintiff, of contributory negligence, and of accident without negligence, could not be decided by the court and were properly submitted to the jury.

A short statement of the evidence adduced on behalf of the plaintiff will show that there were substantial issues of this kind. The plaintiff was one of a gang of laborers working on the track of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company under the defendant J. F. Owens, as section master. On the 3d day of February, 1908, these laborers were engaged in the work of transporting cross-ties in a dump or dummy car, a small car propelled by hand. This was loaded under the direction of Owens, who went forward to watch for and signal any approaching train. The run of the car was downgrade and Owens ordered the plaintiff and the other laborers to ride upon it, though the safest way of taking it, as plaintiff knew, was to walk by the track and control the speed by hand. All the laborers got on the car and while it was moving at a high rate of speed, entirely beyond control, the jar caused some of the cross-ties to fall, carrying the plaintiff with them. Some cars of this kind are provided with a crowbar which is put through a hole cut in the car floor and used as a brake. This one had no hole cut for that purpose, and was not provided with a crowbar; but even if these provisions had been made to control its motion, they would have been of no use on this occasion, because the manner of loading the car would have made the hole inaccessible.

If this evidence is credible, manifestly it tended to show that the plaintiff was not provided with a reasonably safe place in which to work, and that he was required to load and ride on the car by a superior agent having the right to direct his services. Defendant's counsel in the effort to meet this difficulty contend that, taking the evidence of the plaintiff as true, no other inference is possible than that the plaintiff, with no emergency before him, recklessly obeyed an order requiring him to do an obviously dangerous act beyond the peril reasonably incident to his employment. There was certainly evidence from which the jury might have drawn such an inference, but it cannot be said that the evidence admitted of no other. Whether the risk of riding on a loaded and uncontrolled dump or dummy car downgrade should be regarded so great that a reasonably prudent man would not have obeyed an order requiring it, would depend on circumstances. The grade might be so steep and long that there could be no doubt of the obvious folly of the undertaking; but here the evidence was that the car reached its destination safely after a run of about 2½ miles, in which it attained an estimated speed of 20 to 30 miles an hour; and that the plaintiff and other witnesses, employees of the railroad company, with the acquiescence of their superiors, had many times before used cars like this in the same way without accident. The court could not, in view of this evidence, take the case from the jury on the ground that no other inference could be drawn than that the danger was so imminent and obvious that a man of ordinary prudence would have refused to obey the order of his superior requiring him to incur it. Therefore, under the principle laid down in Stephens v. Southern Ry. Co., 82 S. C. 542, 64 S. E. 601, there was no error in refusing to instruct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, and in refusing a motion for a new trial.

There is one other point requiring notice. The defendant complains of the following instructions: "Now, I charge you further, as a matter of law, that even if there was a rule forbidding any of the hands riding on the dummy car, if the jury conclude that that rule was habitually violated with the knowledge and acquiescence of the master or foreman in charge, and he allowed plaintiff to do that, and had knowledge of it and acquiesced in it and permitted it, then it is for the jury to say whether or not, under these circumstances, that rule was qualified or abrogated, or waived or done away with. I say, if there was a rule forbidding the hands to ride on that car—yet, it is for the jury to say whether or not that rule, in their opinion, was habitually violated with the knowledge of the foreman or master, and he acquiesced in it and allowed it, and made no objection to it—then it is for you to say whether, under those circumstances, the rule was not suspended, or whether it was rescinded or abrogated." The contention is that, while this may be a sound legal proposition, it had no application in this case. It is true there was no evidence of any rule promulgated by the company against riding downgrade in a loaded car such as this. But the defendants cannot complain that the court assumed that there was evidence of such a rule, for the assumption was favorable to the defendants.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing

PER CURIAM. Careful examination of the petition for rehearing does not convince us that there was any material issue arising on the record overlooked or disregarded in the judgment of the court.

The petition for rehearing is therefore dismissed, and the order heretofore granted, staying the remittitur, revoked.

CITY OF GREENVILLE v. PRIDMORE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 28, 1910.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 62*)—DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENTAL POWERS—CONSTRUCTION OF CONSTITUTION.

The constitutional requirement with respect to the separation of the three departments of government refers to the state government and state officers, and not to the government of municipal corporations and their officers, and hence, that a mayor had participated in the enactment of an ordinance relating to the traffic in intoxicating liquors would not preclude him from presiding in the mayor's court, on the trial of one for violating the ordinance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 114*)—VALIDITY—AMENDMENT OF PRIOR ORDINANCE.

An ordinance begun, "Be it ordained by the mayor and city council of the city of G., in council assembled and by authority of the same, that section No. 3, of an ordinance ratified on the 2d day of May, 1905, be amended * * * so that when amended, the ordinance shall read as follows," and was followed by a complete ordinance requiring no reference to any other ordinance for its interpretation or enforcement. Held, that this was not an amendment of the former ordinance, but was a complete enactment, not dependent for its validity on the validity of the former ordinance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 111*)—ORDINANCES—EFFECT OF PARTIAL INVALIDITY.

Civ. Code 1902, § 2004, requires sentence in the mayor's court to be in the alternative. An ordinance provided for punishment for its violation as follows "any persons violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall be fined not less than $20 nor more than $50 or imprisoned 30 days, or both fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the mayor." Held, that though so much of the ordinance as purported to confer power to impose both a fine and imprisonment was void, the ordinance was not rendered entirely invalid, since, without the provision, the ordinance remained complete, providing for punishment in the alternative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 248-251; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

A. F. Pridmore was convicted of violating an ordinance of the City of Greenville, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Adam O. Welborn, for appellant. Hodges & Daniel, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The defendant was convicted in the mayor's court of the city of Greenville on the charge of violating a city ordinance of October 5, 1909, relating to the traffic in intoxicating liquors. The sentence was that he pay a fine of $25 or be imprisoned for 30 days. An appeal to the circuit court resulted in affirmance, and the defendant now appeals to this court.

By his first exception the defendant relies on the same position taken in Spartanburg v. Parris, 85 S. C. 227, 67 S. E. 246, namely, that the mayor, having participated as a legislator in the making of the ordinances, was prohibited by the Constitution from acting in a judicial capacity in the trial of persons accused of violating them. In that case it was held that the constitutional requirement with respect to the separateness of the three departments of government refers clearly to the government of the state and to state officers, and not to the government of municipal corporations and to the officers of such corporations.

The other position taken in support of the appeal is that the ordinance itself is void, because it is a mere amendment of an ordinance which, under the statute law of the state, the city council had no power to make. The ordinance begins in these words: "Be it ordained by the mayor and city council of the city of Greenville, in council assembled and by authority of the same, that section No. 3, of an ordinance ratified on the 2d day of May, 1905, be amended by striking out the words, 'or both fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the mayor,' so that when amended said ordinance shall read as follows: * * * " Then follows an ordinance complete in every particular, requiring no reference to any other ordinance either for its interpretation or enforcement. Even if it be assumed that the ordinance of May, 1905, was void, the vice of it would not extend to the ordinance of October, 1909, for while it is true the latter ordinance purports to be an amendment of the former, it was not a mere amendment, but a complete law in itself.

But the ordinance of May 5, 1905, was not so contrary to the statute law of the state as to be void. It provided for punishment in these words: "Any persons violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall be fined not less than $20, nor more than $50, or imprisoned 30 days, or both fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the mayor." Section 2004 of the Civil Code, construed in Town of Union v. Hampton, 83 S. C. 46, 64 S. E. 1017, requires the sentence in the mayor's court to be in the alternative. Therefore so much of the ordinance as purported to confer on the mayor power to impose a sentence of both fine and imprisonment was void. This, however, did not make void the entire ordinance, for after striking out that provision, the ordinance remains complete in every respect, expressing the main purpose of the city council in respect to both the evil to be prevented and the penalties to be inflicted. Utsey v. Hlott, 30 S. C. 360, 9 S. E. 338, 14 Am. St. Rep. 910; State v. Johnson, 76 S. C. 39, 56 S. E. 544; Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80, 24 L. Ed. 377; Shevlin-Carpenter Co. v. Minnesota (U. S. Sup. Ct., May 31, 1910) 218 U. S. 57, 30 Sup. Ct. 663, 54 L. Ed. —.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

BEAUFORT LAND & INVESTMENT CO. v. NEW RIVER LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910.)

1. TRESPASS (§§ 20, 43*)—TRESPASS TO REAL ESTATE—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF.

One in possession of land not acquired by the disseisin of another may hold the land and recover of the latter damages for the invasion of the possession and for cutting timber thereon, unless the latter proves title in himself or a license from one shown to be the true owner, and though the former alleges both title and possession, he may recover on proof of possession and the invasion thereof without proving a title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass, Cent. Dig. §§ 38, 108, 109; Dec. Dig. §§ 20, 43.*]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 115*)—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where, in trespass for cutting timber, defendant's chain of title through written instruments only extended back to 1867, and was not connected with a grant from the state, the jury must determine whether there had been such possession by defendant as to presume a grant from the state, or such adverse possession as would complete his title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 691-701; Dec. Dig. § 115.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 106*)—TITLE.

Where plaintiff in trespass to real estate relied not only on written instruments, but on the claim of presumption of a grant from 20 years' possession, and on adverse possession, the jury could find that he had a perfect title from the presumption of 20 years' possession, or from adverse possession, so as to authorize a recovery on the theory that he could not recover without proof of title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 604-623; Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 274*)—DECLARATIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Declarations made by an owner of land as to the lines thereof are admissible only if made while he owned the land.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Beaufort County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by the Beaufort Land & Investment Company against the New River Lumber Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. J. Thomas and W. L. Clay, for appellant. W. Huger Fitz Simons, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The verdict and judgment were in favor of the defendant. The numerous exceptions submitted on behalf of the plaintiff, relating mainly to alleged errors in the charge of the circuit judge, will be more clearly understood after a brief statement of the pleadings.

The complaint alleges "that the plaintiff is the owner in fee and in possession of that tract of land known as the 'Crapse Purchase' or 'Wiggin Land,' containing 1,800 acres, more or less, according to a plat made by O. P. Law, surveyor, April 17, 1885, and has the following distances and bearings; * * * that the defendant, its agents, and servants at numerous times have entered on the land with force and arms and cut much valuable timber and committed irreparable waste thereon, and, disregarding plaintiff's warnings, threatened to continue the acts of trespass; that the said acts of defendants are without any right or authority whatever and contrary to law and are an irreparable loss to plaintiff; that the defendant could not respond in damages, and that plaintiff has already been damaged to the amount of $2,000." The prayer is for judgment for $2,000 and for an injunction against further trespass.

The defendant by its answer, in addition to a general denial, alleges 20 years' possession in itself and its grantors, and specifically denies that the plaintiff and those under whom it claims have been in possession of the land within 20 years, or within 10 years, prior to the commencement of the action; it alleges further that any right which the plaintiff may have had accrued more than 10 years before the commencement of the action; and that the land is the property of W. R. Pritchard and others, who conveyed to the defendant the timber thereon, and that defendant's entry was made under that conveyance.

Under these pleadings the court charged: "I charge you that before you can render a verdict in behalf of the plaintiff for damages in this case you must be satisfied from the evidence that the plaintiff has a complete and perfect title to the land described in the complaint." The plaintiff contends that while this is a correct statement of the law in an action to recover possession of land, it was erroneous in this action, which was not to recover possession, but for damages for a trespass, and that therefore the charge should have been to the effect "that if the plaintiff has satisfied you that it was in actual possession of the tract of land described in the complaint, and that defendant has committed trespass within the lines of said tract, then the plaintiff will be entitled to recover, unless the defendant has satisfied the jury that it has good title in itself to the land upon which the alleged trespass was committed, or that it did the acts complained of as trespass by the permission or under a license from the real owner of the land."

The important question is thus raised whether a plaintiff alleging both title and possession is entitled to recover damages upon proof of his possession and the invasion of it by the defendant, without proving also that he has a perfect title. The question must be answered in the affirmative. One person who finds another in possession of land cannot, by seizing the possession or invading it, put him whose possession he seized or invaded to proof of his title. In such a case possession is prima facie evidence of title and he who invades it must establish his title. If this were not so, a holder of land could be put to proof of title against the world by any one who might choose to trespass or squat upon his lands. This conclusion is well supported by authority. When the plaintiff alleges an invasion of his possession this gives character to the action, as one in the nature of the old action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Couch v. Burke, 2 Hill, Law, 534; Connor v. Johnson, 59 S. C. 115, 37 S. E. 240.

The court in Young v. Watson, 1 McMul. 449, intimated by the words we have italicized that the possession of a plaintiff of which he had been deprived by the entry of a defendant would support even an action of trespass to try title, for the court said, as to the mere prior possession of the plaintiff: "It cannot be allowed to prevail against the actual possession of the defendant, who did not enter upon the plaintiff, and which, for aught that appears, might be as rightful as that which the plaintiff formerly held;" and Judge O'Neill, in a concurring opinion, said: "When the plaintiff's possession, actual or constructive, is entered upon, I think such possession is evidence of title to put the defendant to prove his title." In Connor v. Johnson, supra, the court held that the action was in the nature of trespass quare clausum fregit; that is, an action for the invasion of the possession of plaintiff, where the complaint alleged the plaintiff to be in possession under a paper title, and that the defendant had trespassed, and the answer denied all the allegations, including, of course, the allegations of plaintiff's possession and his paper title, and set up title in defendant. In such an action it was held that it was only necessary for the plaintiff to show possession, and that for defendant to prevent a recovery it was not sufficient to show that the plaintiff had no title, but that he must show title in himself. That case seems conclusive of the point under discussion. To the same effect is Hillhouse v. Jennings, 60 S. C. 401, 38 S. E. 599, where the court says: "We may say, however, that when the allegations of the complaint are such as would have sustained an action of trespass quare clausum fregit under the former practice, peaceable possession alone is sufficient to support the action, and throws upon the defendant the burden of proving the better title." Watts v. Blalock, 17 S. C. 163; Turner v. Poston, 63 S. C. 244, 41 S. E. 296. In the case last cited the reason for the rule is thus well stated: "If the defendant in this case had brought his action against the plaintiff, he could not have recovered on such a title as he has shown in this case, and he cannot be allowed to put himself in a better position by committing a trespass on the plaintiff. The right of possession is a very sacred one, and the court will not allow the repose which it gives to be endangered by giving improper advantages to a trespasser. If defendant had a good title he should have resorted to the courts, where he could have obtained any redress to which by law he was entitled." The same principle has been laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Burt v. Panjaud, 99 U. S. 180, 25 L. Ed. 453; Bradshaw v. Ashley, 180 U. S. 59, 21 Sup. Ct. 297, 45 L. Ed. 423, and other cases. The cases relied on by defendant's counsel are very clearly distinguished, and are in no sense opposed to the rule stated.

In Geiger v. Kaigler, 15 S. C. 262, the action was exclusively for the recovery of the possession of land; the allegation of the complaint being that the defendant had acquired possession in 1863, many years before the action was brought, from the executor of the will under which plaintiffs claimed. There was no allegation that the plaintiffs had ever been in possession. The defendant denied that Henry J. Geiger, who made the will under which plaintiffs claimed, had ever been seised of the land; and, for a second defense, alleged that he had purchased the land from the executor of the will of Henry J. Geiger, who was empowered to sell; that he had paid the purchase money and had been in the possession since 1863. As there was no proof of the second defense, it was held that it could not be considered. In this state of the case the court held: "This action was brought, as stated, expressly to recover the land in dispute, upon the ground that the plaintiffs had title to the same; and even if the old rule as to the necessity of proving title should now be held to be modified so as to allow a person deprived of the possession of land, under proper allegations, to recover that possession without proof of title, it can have no application to this case. Here prior possession cannot stand for title, although it is an action in the form prescribed by the Code, and not technically trespass to try title under the statute. The plaintiffs staked themselves upon their title, and they must recover, if at all, upon the strength of that title." This is very far from holding that a person in possession cannot recover from one who disseises him or undertakes to assert ownership by cutting timber or otherwise invading the possession.

Heyward v. Farmers' Co., 42 S. O. 138, 19 S. E. 963, 20 S. E. 64, 28 L. R. A. 42, 46 Am. St. Rep. 702, was an action for injunction to restrain trespass. The circuit judge in granting the injunction required the plaintiff to "institute on the law side of the court such action as he may be advised by his counsel for the purpose of determining the question as to title to the land described in the complaint." From this order there was no appeal. The action was brought under this order, and therefore the plaintiff, as the actor, was bound by the order to do what it required, namely, to assert and prove his title to the land. In addition to this, the state was a party defendant, entitled to stand upon its prima facie ownership of the soil. It was on these considerations that the court held that the plaintiff, though alleging his own possession and a trespass thereon, was obliged to prove title. The case is obviously taken out of the general rule by its peculiar facts.

In Bank v. Peterkin, 52 S. O. 236, 29 S. E. 546, 68 Am. St. Rep. 900, the plaintiff brought an action to foreclose a mortgage, and the record does not indicate that there was any allegation of possession either in the mortgage or the mortgagor. The defendant set up paramount title and possession of a part of the land originating before the mortgage was given. The holding that on the legal issue of title the plaintiff had the burden of proof, therefore, does not affect the question now under consideration.

The case of Love v. Turner, 71 S. O. 322, 51 S. E. 101, was held to be not an action in the nature of trespass quare clausum fregit, but an action to recover possession of real estate. There the complaint alleged: "That the said defendant continues to assert her claim of title against this plaintiff to said premises, to deny plaintiff's right therein, and asserts her determination to prevent the use and enjoyment of said premises by the plaintiff, or persons holding under plaintiff, and to continue to use and occupy it for her own benefit; rendering it necessary for plaintiff to apply to this court for relief and for the protection of his title." There was no allegation that the plaintiff was in possession, and that his possession had been invaded by acts of trespass. On the contrary, the plaintiff insisted that the action was to recover possession.

It is true that in Shettlesworth v. Hughey, 9 Rich. Law, 387, Parker v. Leggett, 12 Rich. Law, 200, and Sims v. Davis, 70 S. O. 362, 49 S. E. 872, it was held that the verdict was decisive of the title in an action of damages for trespass brought by one in possession when the title was put in issue. But in none of these cases is it held that on the trial of the issue the plaintiff in possession must assume the burden of proving his title against the world. As we have seen, possession not obtained by a tortious act is prima facie evidence of title, and upon this the plaintiff may rest until the defendant justifies his invasion of the possession by proving either title in himself or a license to enter from the true owner.

We conclude therefore that if the plaintiff held possession of the land not acquired by the disseisin of the defendant, it was entitled to hold the land and to recover of the defendant damages for invasion of its possession and for the cutting of timber, unless the defendant proved a title in himself, or a license from one proved to be the true owner, and that the court was in error in charging otherwise.

The court was also in error in charging that if the land in dispute was covered by defendant's chain of title, then the defendant had shown perfect title to the land, unless its title had been defeated by adverse possession. The defendant's chain through written instruments only extended back to 1867 and was not connected with a grant from the state. Hence it was not for the court to say that the chain of title was perfect; since the jury must necessarily determine whether there had been such possession as to presume a grant from the state, or such adverse possession as would complete its title.

The exception alleging error in the following instruction must also be sustained: "I charge you that if the written instrument introduced by plaintiff does not cover the land described in this complaint he cannot recover. If the written chain of title introduced here by plaintiff does not cover and embrace and convey the land described in the complaint he cannot recover, and if it is not covered by his written chain, written instruments here, that would be a failure on the part of the plaintiff to establish a written title or written chain of title to the land." The plaintiff relied not only on written instruments, but on the claim of presumption of a grant from 20 years' possession, and on adverse possession. Even under the theory of the case adopted by the circuit judge that the plaintiff could in no event recover without proof of perfect title, the jury might have found a perfect title in the plaintiff from the presumption of 20 years' possession, or from adverse possession for 10 years.

The court excluded evidence of the declarations of Mr. Pritchard, one of the persons under whom the defendant claims, as to the land lines and as to trespassing on the lands of the plaintiff. These declarations, if made while Mr. Pritchard was owner of the property, were competent. Ellen v. Ellen, 16 S. C. 182; Levi v. Gardner, 53 S. C. 24, 30 S. E. 617.

We have covered in the discussion a number of the exceptions not particularly mentioned. The remaining exceptions are hypercritical and unsubstantial.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed and the cause be remanded to that court for a new trial.

CAROLINA BOND & INVESTMENT CO. et al. v. CALDWELL.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910.)

WILLS (§ 498*)—CONSTRUCTION—"ISSUE."

Testator devised all her property to L. and her four children named in trust for the sole benefit "of the lawful issue" of L.'s children named, "without power to sell"; the said L. and her children "having a life interest, share and share alike, in the annual products of said farm." The will provided that "when the youngest devisee of the real estate shall attain the age of 21 or marry there shall be a division of said real estate." At the time of testator's death two of L.'s children were dead; one dying unmarried and without issue, and the other leaving four children. The other two children of L. were living; neither of them being married. Held that the word "issue" is either a word of purchase or of limitation, and its use in one sense excludes the other; that it was used in the will as a word of purchase; that the children named took life interests and their children took in fee on testator's death; and that grandchildren of the children named took nothing under the will.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by the Carolina Bond & Investment Company against Howard Caldwell. A demurrer to the answer was sustained, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clark & Clark and Logan & Edmunds, for appellant. W. T. Aycock, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for specific performance of contract, and the appeal is from an order sustaining a demurrer to the answer, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense.

The exceptions assign error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in construing the will of Dr. A. W. Kennedy. The fifth, seventh, and eighth clauses of the will, are as follows:

"Fifth. All my real estate and all improvements thereon at the time of my death, and all stock on my farms near Columbia at my death, including horses, mules, cattle, hogs and all other domestic animals, all farming implements, all farming products thereon at my death I give, devise and bequeath unto the survivors, at my death, of the following persons, viz.: Unto Lettie Chick and her children, Walker Kennedy, Butler Kennedy,

John Kennedy and Mary Kennedy, to have and to hold the same in common, in trust, nevertheless, for the sole use, benefit and behoof of the lawful issue of the said Walker, Butler, John and Mary, without power to sell; the said Lettie, Walker, Butler, John and Mary having a life interest, share and share alike, in the annual products of said farm: Provided, that they, the said Lettie, Walker, Butler, John and Mary will permit my foreman, George Kennedy, to occupy during his life, the house in which he now resides on my farm, near the city of Columbia, on condition that he, the said George, even though he become infirm and an invalid, to have, during his life, one-tenth of the annual products of the said farms, one-tenth of the fruit from the orchard, with the privilege of raising poultry and hogs and of keeping one cow, he feeding, at his own expense all such domestic animals, and of using necessary firewood, and of getting water from the spring near his house.

"Seventh. It is my will that the said Walker, Butler, and John shall work on said farm, but should they prefer to furnish a good hand each, they may go away and shall still receive their annual share. * * *

"Eighth. When the youngest devisee of the real estate shall attain the age of twenty-one, or marry, there shall be a division of said real estate, and the said George, should he still survive, shall receive the one-tenth for life of said real estate, and the one-tenth of the yearly produce of the orchard; at his death his share to go to the other devisees of the real estate above described, share and share alike, and the remaining nine-tenths of the said last mentioned division, shall be held by the said Lettie, Walker, Butler, John and Mary, in trust for the sole use, benefit and behoof of the lawful issue of the said Walker, Butler, John and Mary; the said Lettie, Walker, Butler, John and Mary having a life interest, share and share alike, in the products of the same."

The facts are thus stated by the circuit judge: "At the time of the testator's death, Walker and Butler, aforesaid, were dead; the former unmarried and without issue; the latter, Butler, leaving four children alive at said time. John and Mary were living, neither of them being married or having issue. Some years later, to wit, June 8, 1897, these four children of Butler Kennedy commenced an action for partition of the real estate mentioned in the said will; the defendants being John Kennedy, then unmarried and without issue, and the said Mary, then the wife of Summerfield Perrin, with her children, the same being all her issue. At the time this action was brought, four grandchildren of Butler Kennedy were in esse, none of whom were parties to the action, nor in esse when the testator died. The action proceeded to a final decree, wherein it was held that the four children of Butler Kennedy (the plaintiffs), all of whom were living at the testator's death, had a fee-simple estate in one-third of the said real estate under the said will. The decree also fixed the rights of the other parties, but I am not concerned with them, under the view of this will adopted. A sale of the said real estate was ordered, the said lands were sold, and by successive conveyances, they have come into the possession and ownership of the plaintiffs in the action before me. The defendant has agreed to purchase these lands, and the plaintiffs have agreed to sell the same to him, as appears in the complaint and answer, but the defendant alleges in his answer that the four grandchildren of Butler Kennedy had interests in the land when the action for partition was brought, and that by reason of the failure to make them parties to the cause, they still have interests in the said land. The plaintiffs demur to the answer of defendant, and submit the view that these four grandchildren of Butler had no interest in the said land, and were not necessary parties to the action. Lettie Chick was also dead at the time the testator departed this life in 1882. In sustaining the demurrer to the answer the circuit judge assigned the following reasons: "The trust attempted to be created in this will is a dry trust, there being nothing for the trustee to do, and the word 'issue' as used therein is synonymous with 'children.' The children of Lettie Chick took life estates, and Butler Kennedy's children took their interests, at the testator's death in fee, subject to the use of the land by the life tenants or the survivor of them. The grandchildren of Butler Kennedy, mentioned in the answer, took nothing under the will, and were not necessary parties to the action for partition referred to."

The appellant's exceptions are as follows:

"1. Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in holding that the word 'issue,' as used in the will, was synonymous with 'children,' the error being that there was nothing in the will to indicate that the testator intended to so limit the meaning and use of the word; but, on the contrary, the same was used in a most general sense.

"2. Because his honor erred in finding and holding that the children of Lettie Chick took life estates; the error being that the estates devised were enlarged to fees conditional, which vested in the two children of Lettie Chick at the death of the testator.

"3. Because his honor erred in finding and holding that 'Butler Kennedy's children took their interest at the testator's death in fee, subject to the use of the land by the life tenants, or the survivor of them'; the error being that the estates devised by the will, having been enlarged to fees conditional, and Butler Kennedy having predeceased the testator, the estate lapsed as to him, and his children took nothing thereunder, and the estate intended for the issue of Butler Kennedy reverted to the testator, and would pass to his heirs at law.

"4. Because his honor erred in finding and holding that the children of Butler Kennedy took their interests, at the testator's death, subject to the use of said lands by the life tenants, or the survivor of them, and that the grandchildren of Butler Kennedy took nothing under the will; the error being that if life estates were vested in the children of Lettie Chick, the remainders did not vest at the death of the testator, but could only vest upon the death of the last life tenant, and all children and grandchildren of Butler Kennedy, in esse at the time of the death of the last life tenant, would take under the will.

"5. Because his honor erred in finding and holding that the grandchildren of Butler Kennedy were not necessary parties to the action for partition, referred to in the answer; the error being that the words 'lawful issue' include an indefinite line of descent, and unless there is something in the will (which there is not) to indicate that the testator intended to limit the meaning of the word 'issue,' the grandchildren of Butler Kennedy, in esse at the time of the commencement of this action, had an interest in the property devised, which interest could not be divested, unless the parties were properly before the court."

We proceed to consider the exceptions in regular order.

First exception. In Mendenhall v. Mower, 16 S. C. 303, it is said: "The word 'issue' is susceptible of three meanings: (1) It may describe a class of persons, who are to take as joint tenants with the parties named; (2) it may be descriptive of a class, who are to take at a definite and fixed time as purchasers; and (3) it may denote an indefinite succession of lineal descendants, who are to take by inheritance. Whenever this word is used, either in a deed or will, it must be used in one of these senses. The difficulty in most cases is to determine in which of these senses it has been employed." "Issue" is either a word of purchase or of limitation, and if in the present case it be shown that it is not a word of limitation, then it necessarily follows that it must be construed as a word of purchase.

In discussing the rule in Shelley's Case, the court, in Austin v. Payne, 8 Rich. Eq. 9, uses this language: "Although it is well settled to apply to equitable as well as legal interests, yet it is equally well established that, in order thus to coalesce, the estate of the ancestor and the limitation to the heirs must be of the same quality; that is, both legal and both equitable. Thus, it frequently happens that a testator devises land in trust for a person for life, and, after his death, in trust for the heirs of his body; but gives the trustees some office, in regard to the tenant for life, that causes them to retain the legal estate during his life, but which, ceasing at his death, does not prevent the limitation to the heirs of the body from being executed in them. In such cases, by the rule thus stated, they, that is, the heirs, are purchasers.' 2 Jarm. on Wills, 243. Let us apply these principles to the deed of McDaniel. It is recited in the deed that Rosa Manning Payne was the wife of the defendant, Wesley Payne, and it is provided that she shall enjoy the rents, etc., during her natural life, to her sole use. If the purposes of the deed, in any possible event, require that the legal estate should remain in the trustees, the use is not executed by the statute, but the legal estate remains in the trustees, and the interest of the cestui que trust is merely equitable. Upon this principle it has been often decided that a trust to permit a feme covert to receive the rents for her separate use vests the estate in the trustees." See, also, Jackson v. Jackson, 56 S. C. 346, 33 S. E. 749, and Young v. McNeill, 78 S. C. 143, 59 S. E. 986.

There are several reasons why the use was not executed in the present case: (1) The provision that the trustees were "without power to sell" indicates that the children of Lettie Chick were not expected to enter upon the full enjoyment of their beneficial interests immediately after the testator's death, but at a future period; (2) the provision in the seventh clause of the will likewise tends to show the necessity for the legal title to remain in the trustees, at least until the period therein fixed for the division of the property; (3) the provision that Walker, Butler, John, and Mary Kennedy were only to have life interests in the annual products of the farm, indicated that they were not vested with the full powers of life tenants, but merely had a right to a support and maintenance out of the property; (4) the provision in the eighth clause of the will that there should be a division of the real estate when the youngest devisee should attain the age of 21 years, or marry, is inconsistent with the theory that the life estates of Lettie Chick's children were enlarged to fees conditional; thereby showing that "issue" must be construed as a word of purchase. We would also rely upon the provision made for George Kennedy, to show that the use was not executed but for the fact, it seems, that he died before the testator.

Second exception. It was the intention of the testator that Butler Kennedy and the other devisees mentioned in the foregoing clauses of his will should sustain a dual relation to the property therein mentioned, (1) that of trustee, and (2) that they should take a beneficial interest during their lives. The devise to the "issue" of Butler Kennedy did not lapse, for the reason that they did not claim through him, but directly from the testator. The death of Butler Kennedy during the lifetime of the testator defeated the beneficial interest which he would have taken under the will, but in no respect affected the power of the surviving trustees to hold the entire property in trust for the lawful issue of all the children of Lettie Chick, for in section 5 of his will the testator says: "I give, devise, and bequeath unto the survivors at my death, of the following persons, viz.: Unto Lettie Chick and her children, Walker Kennedy, Butler Kennedy, John Kennedy, and Mary Kennedy, to have and to hold the same in common, in trust nevertheless for the sole use, benefit, and behoof of the lawful issue of the said Walker, Butler, John, and Mary," thus showing that the surviving trustees were not to hold simply for the benefit of the issue of the children, who survived the testator, but for the issue of the four children.

Third exception. As it has been shown that the lapse of Butler Kennedy's beneficial interest did not affect the rights of his issue, this exception cannot be sustained.

Fourth exception. The rule in regard to the right of a grandchild to take under a will, when the testator used the word "children," is thus stated in Izard v. Izard, 2 Desaus. 309: "The word 'children' used in a will shall not be construed to mean 'grandchildren,' unless a strong case of intention or necessary implication requires it." The case of Ruff v. Rutherford (Bailey, Eq. 7) is to the same effect, where it is stated that grandchildren do not take under a bequest to children, except where there are no children, or there are strong and conclusive circumstances to show that such was the intention of the testator. No such facts exist in the present case.

Fifth exception. Having reached the conclusion that the grandchildren of Butler Kennedy did not take any interest under the will, it was of course unnecessary that they should be made parties to the action for partition.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

WOODS, J. (concurring). The question which determines this appeal is whether, under the will of A. W. Kennedy, the grandchildren of testator's son, Butler Kennedy, took as devisees, and were therefore proper parties to an action for partition brought by the children of Butler Kennedy for partition of the lands devised by the will. I concur in the result reached by Mr. Justice GARY, but do not agree with him as to the construction of the will.

As it seems to me the will should be thus construed: First, the trustees named and the survivor of them had no duty to perform with respect to "the issue" of the testator's children, who were to have the land after his children had enjoyed the annual product for their lives; and as to such issue the use was executed. Second, "the issue" of the children did not mean the indefinite lineal descendants of the children of the testator, for the intention of the testator to point out particular issue is clearly shown by the provision for a division of the land "when the youngest devisee of the real estate shall attain the age of twenty-one or marry." This distinguished the case from Whitworth v. Stuckey, 1 Rich. Eq. 404, Betha v. Betha, 48 S. C. 440, 28 S. E. 716, and other cases of that kind. Hence the issue of the children took as purchasers and not by descent; and there was no fee conditional in the children of the testator. Third, this narrows the inquiry to what particular issue of his children the testator meant to make his devisees. There can be no doubt that all the lineal descendants of the children of the testator were entitled to share in the devise to the issue of testator's children. Gourdin v. Deas, 27 S. C. 492, 4 S. E. 64; Vale Royal Mfg. Co. v. Santee River Cypress Lumber Co., 84 S. C. 81, 65 S. E. 955. The word "issue" therefore cannot be construed to mean "children," but must be held to denote all who answered to the description of issue of testator's children at some particular time. What was that time? Manifestly the time of partition was not intended as it was in Rutledge v. Rutledge, Dud. Eq. 201, and Gourdin v. Deas, 27 S. C. 479, 4 S. E. 64, for the provision of the will that the partition shall take place when the youngest devisee shall attain the age of 21 years, or marry, clearly indicates that before that time all the devisees should have been ascertained. The testator having thus excluded the idea that the devisees entitled to take as issue of his children should be ascertained at the period of distribution, and having expressed no other time for the ascertainment of those entitled to take as issue of his children, the law fixes the date of the testator's death as the time of ascertainment. Myers v. Myers, 2 McCord, Eq. 256, 16 Am. Dec. 648; Waddell v. Waddell, 68 S. C. 335, 47 S. E. 375.

The question here is between the children and grandchildren of Butler Kennedy, who died before his father, the testator. The children, being the only issue in existence at the time of the death of the testator, were entitled as devisees to the exclusion of the grandchildren born afterwards. It follows that the grandchildren had no interest in the land and were not proper parties to the action for partition instituted by the children of Butler Kennedy.

For these reasons I think the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

DIXON v. CHIQUOLA MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 27, 1910.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 265*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—BURDEN OF PROOF—KNOWLEDGE OF DEFECTS

The law imputes to the master knowledge of latent dangers in instrumentalities, and requires him to show in an action for a servant's injuries, caused by defects therein, that he could not have discovered the danger by due diligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 905; Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 89*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—SCOPE OF EMPLOYMENT.

The scope of a servant's duties is determined by what he was employed to do, and what he actually did with his employer's knowledge and consent, and an employé who was in the habit of performing certain duties when injured is not a volunteer in performing such duties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 153; Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—QUESTION FOR JURY—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an employé's action for injuries, evidence held to make it a question for the jury whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1089; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by C. W. Dixon against the Chiquola Manufacturing Company. From an order of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part, and remanded for new trial.

Tilman & Watson and Paget & Watkins, for appellant. Wm. G. Sirrine and Bonham, Watkins & Allen, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the negligence of the defendant.

The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions involved, are as follows: "That at the times hereinafter mentioned plaintiff was working in the weaverroom of the defendant, which is situated on the first floor of its cotton mill. Defendant had installed in this room a system of pipes, which connect with the boiler, and which distribute steam over the said room, when the humidifiers need assistance, to preserve the proper humidity and temperature. There is a main pipe running from the boiler room, which enters the weaverroom through the wall of the mill. This main pipe runs along the side of the wall, parallel with the floor of the weaverroom, and at different places pipes have been joined to the main pipe which are perpendicular thereto, and which run up the walls of the mill some five or six feet, and are equipped at the end with a mouth, through which the steam comes into the weaverroom. Also connecting with this main pipe is a drainpipe which runs through the wall of the mill into the open air, and which drains the water from the condensed steam out of the main pipe. There is a valve at the point where the main pipe enters the weaverroom, and each of the perpendicular pipes have valves, to regulate the influx of steam from the boiler into the room. On February 3, 1908, plaintiff went to his work in the mill as usual. The weather was very cold and had been for the several days previous. About 9 o'clock that morning plaintiff, feeling that the room needed steam to bring about the proper humidity and temperature so that the work of weaving could be properly done, went to one of these perpendicular pipes. Plaintiff and the other weavers had been accustomed to turn the valves to these pipes, when it was necessary, all of which was well known to defendant, its agents, and servants. Plaintiff turned this valve to let in more steam, and, instead of steam coming out of the pipe, hot water poured out on plaintiff and injured him. Plaintiff is informed and believes that the direct and proximate cause of his injury was as follows: The cold weather had caused the drainpipe to freeze up, and there was no way for the water from the condensed steam to find an outlet, and, as a consequence, hot water had collected in the main pipe, and when the valve was opened which controlled the perpendicular pipe, this water was forced out and scalded plaintiff. Plaintiff further alleges, on information and belief, that the defendant, its agents, and servants, had failed to inspect the drainpipe as was its duty. * * *

The defendant denied the allegations of negligence, and set up as a defense that plaintiff's injury was caused by his own negligence; and in that connection alleged that "on the day that plaintiff is alleged to have been injured, the overseer in charge of the room had caused steam to be turned in said pipes before the mill began work for the day, but finding one of the drainpipes clogged by ice, had turned off said steam, and while working at the drainpipe from the outside of the mill, defendant is informed and believes, that plaintiff, without authority, went to the main valve, which controlled the movement of steam into the said system of pipe, and opened the same allowing steam to flow into the same from the boiler room, thereby not only acting in violation of orders, but endangering said overseer." The defendant also interposed the defense of contributory negligence.

At the conclusion of the testimony for the plaintiff, a motion for a nonsuit was made by the defendant's counsel, upon the following grounds: "(1) There is no testimony showing that the defendant was guilty of any wanton, reckless, or willful negligence. (2) The testimony permits of but one inference, to wit, that plaintiff was injured by his own negligence. (3) The plaintiff testifies that he was in the habit of turning on the steam and knew that water would come out with the steam, if the outlet pipe was frozen. He made no effort at inquiry, he says, to ascertain whether the outlet was frozen or not, though he knew it was freezing weather and it could be reasonably anticipated that the pipe would freeze. He therefore assumed the risks incident to his employment. (4) There is no testimony tending to show that the appliances were defective, or not properly constructed, or that the injury was due to the freezing of the pipe. (5) There is no evidence showing that defendant was guilty of any negligence which was a proximate cause of the injury. (6) The testimony tends to show that it was no part of plaintiff's duty to turn on the steam, and for his voluntary act, done without defendant's knowledge, defendant is not responsible."

His honor, the presiding judge, granted the following order: "Upon hearing the motion for a nonsuit in the above-entitled case, and after argument, it is ordered: That the motion be granted on the first ground, to wit, that there is no testimony tending to show wanton or willful negligence on the part of the defendant. As to the other grounds. There is no testimony showing that it was the duty of plaintiff to open the valve in the steam pipe, nor that he was directed to do so by any agent or officer of the defendant company, having authority to give him orders. He opened the valve voluntarily and without the knowledge or permission of defendant, and there was no obligation on its part to warn him of a danger of which he was fully cognizant, and which he assumed. It is further ordered, that the motion for nonsuit, as stated in defendant's second ground for said motion, be and the same is hereby granted."

The plaintiff did not appeal from the order of nonsuit, as to the cause of action for punitive damages.

The practical question presented by the exceptions is, whether there was error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in granting the order of nonsuit, as to the cause of action for compensatory damages, on the second ground, which was as follows: "The testimony permits of but one inference, to wit, that plaintiff was injured by his own negligence." The reasons assigned by the presiding judge for this conclusion are stated in his order, one of which, viz.: That the plaintiff assumed the risk, was neither set up as a defense, nor made a ground of the motion for nonsuit.

The plaintiff testified as follows: "Q. I believe you stated that you had been accustomed as a weaver to turn that steam into the room? A. Yes, sir. Q. How about cutting it off? A. Yes, sir; I would cut it off too, and the other weavers had to work it all of the time. Q. They had been at it all of the time? A. Yes, sir. Q. What bosses were above you in that room, and what were they called? A. The overseer and Mr. Beacham; and Mr. Snipes, the section hand. Q. They were both over you? A. Yes, sir; Mr. Snipes was the section hand on the lower department. Q. Had they ever seen you turn that steam into the room and cut it off? A. Yes, sir. Q. How many times? A. I couldn't say. I had been accustomed to turning it on ever since I had been there. Q. How long had you been weaving at that mill altogether? A. I had been working there three years, or a little over. Q. Had you been warned or forbidden to turn them on and off? A. No, sir. Q. Not a single time? A. No, sir; I never had. Q. Had you ever been told to do it? A. I had been told by Jim Holder. He was a section hand, and he had charge of 100 looms that he kept repaired, when they would get out of fix, and I had complained about the weaver between me and the wall having it cut off; and he told me time and again to turn it on whenever I needed it, and he said he guessed I could turn it on as fast as he could cut it off. Q. Who was he? A. He was a section hand. He kept the looms fixed. Q. He had some authority as section hand? He was not the overseer, but had some authority over the help? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was there any man particularly whose duty it was to turn the steam off and on in the pipes? A. No, sir. If there was, I never heard of it. Q. Did you say you had a conversation with Mr. Beacham about your accident there? A. Yes, sir; I did the morning he come to my house. Q. How long after the accident? A. I don't know, sir; but I think it was about the 1st of April. Q. What was it you did tell him? A. He asked me about how it occurred, and he went on to say that I would not have got scalded if the steam pipe had not been frozen, that he had not inspected them that morning, and that he had not had time; and said he was accustomed to inspecting the pipes on cold mornings that way, but that morning he had not had time."

On cross-examination he thus testified: "Q. It was your duty to turn on that steam that morning? A. Yes, sir; we had been doing it. Q. It was as much your duty to look after that pipe as any one's? A. Yes, sir. Q. Had you had orders to turn it on? A. I had, by Jim Holder, the section hand. Q. And you did it without any inspection, didn't you? A. I couldn't inspect the pipe. I would had to have gone outside of the mill to inspect it. Q. Why didn't you get out and see if it was frozen? A. That was not my duty, and they didn't allow hands to go out of the mill. Q. When you were uncertain about your duty you would ask the superior—the overseer? A. Yes, sir. Q. Why didn't you do it in that instance? A. Well, I had been accustomed to turning it on the pipe, and there was no danger before, and I didn't think of any danger. Q. And the reason you didn't inspect it, and didn't ask any one anything about it, you thought there was no danger? A. No, sir. I didn't think there was any danger."

The law imputes to the master knowledge of latent danger in instrumentalities, and casts upon him the burden of proving that he could not have discovered the danger, by the exercise of due diligence. Wood v. Mfg. Co., 66 S. C. 482, 45 S. E. 81; Roach v. Mining Co., 71 S. C. 79, 50 S. E. 543; Gunter v.

Mfg. Co., 15 S. C. 443; Lasure v. Mfg. Co., 18 S. C. 275; Jennings v. Mfg. Co., 72 S. C. 411, 52 S. E. 113; Green v. Railway, 72 S. C. 398, 52 S. E. 45. "The scope of a servant's duties is to be defined by what he was employed to perform, and by what, with the knowledge and approval of his master, he actually did perform, rather than by the mere verbal designation of his position, and where it is shown that the servants were in the habit of performing the work at which plaintiff was injured, he is not to be considered a mere volunteer." 26 Cyc. 1090. Applying these principles to the foregoing testimony, it clearly appears that the exceptions raising this question must be sustained.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed (except as to the cause of action for punitive damages), and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

WOODS, J. In concurring in the opinion of Mr. Justice GARY it seems to me important to notice one position relied on by the respondent which is not referred to in the opinion. That position is that the evidence of the plaintiff gives no ground to infer that the unexpected escape of the hot water from the pipe by which the plaintiff was injured, was due to the negligence of the defendant. If this were so, then the case would be one where, nothing being proved beyond an injury resulting from failure of an instrumentality in ordinary use, negligence of the master could not be inferred. Green v. Southern Ry., 72 S. C. 398, 52 S. E. 45; Gentry v. Southern Ry., 66 S. C. 256, 44 S. E. 728; Edgens v. Gaffney Mfg. Co., 69 S. C. 529, 48 S. E. 538. But the principle of these cases does not apply, for there was evidence that the condensation of the steam into hot water would have been discovered by proper inspection and that there was no inspection.

BING v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910. On Petition for Rehearing Aug. 6, 1910.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 76*)—REVIEW—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

A carrier being liable for punitive damages for willful refusal to stop its train at a station where it is evident that there is a passenger to get on, it cannot be said a verdict of $600 for a passenger who, because of the failure of the train to stop, was obliged to hire a conveyance, was so excessive as to warrant the conclusion that refusal of a new trial was an abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 153-156; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 276*)—FAILURE TO STOP TRAIN FOR PASSENGER—ACTION—EVIDENCE.

Plaintiff, suing for failure of defendant's train to stop at a station where he was waiting to board it, may testify that he told the station agent that he had a ticket and that the train did not stop for him, and asked what he should do about it, and that the agent replied the ticket was good on that road for the next 24 hours, and gave him no further satisfaction; it being the duty of the ticket agent to give passengers information about trains and answer reasonable inquiries on the subject, and the right of the passenger to ask information as to any relief the carrier could give him, and likewise his duty to seek such information, so as to enable him to minimize his damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 276.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

The instruction in an action for failure of a train to stop at a station at which plaintiff was waiting to board it, in which the evidence was conflicting as to whether it did stop: "Did that train * * * entirely stop * * * and did it do so for a sufficient length of time for B. to get on? * * * If it did not, then the railroad company has violated the law," was not erroneous as charging that plaintiff was a man of ordinary reason and prudence, using due diligence to board the train, when it was a question for the jury whether a man by ordinary reason and prudence, acting with due diligence, could have boarded the train; there being no evidence that plaintiff was not an ordinarily active person, and the context plainly showing it was meant that plaintiff could not recover, if the train was stopped long enough to give him, as an ordinary passenger, a reasonable opportunity to board the train.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-431, 435; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by Frank Bing against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. Barron, Wyman & Wyman, and Douglas McKay, for appellant. R. C. Holman and W. H. Townsend, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff obtained a verdict and entered judgment for $650 on a complaint which alleged that the defendant sold him a ticket from Dumbarton to Barnwell and then willfully refused to stop the train for which the ticket had been bought, thus making it necessary for him to make the journey by a hired conveyance.

We notice, first, the error assigned in the refusal to grant the motion for a new trial made on the ground that the amount of the verdict showed that the jury acted from caprice or passion, or prejudice. The testimony shows that the witnesses on one side or the other were either perjurers or victims of a singular failure of memory, or of the senses of sight and hearing. The plaintiff and two witnesses on his behalf testified that they were standing at or very near the station, and that the train did not stop at all; the conductor of the train, the railroad agent, and a passenger testified with equal positiveness that the train did stop long enough to let off and take on passengers. The verdict is a large one, but this court cannot interfere with it, unless it is without support in the evidence. The jury accepted the evidence that the defendant's agent, in violation of the statute, failed to stop the train when it was evident to him that there were passengers to get off and on. For such a conscious breach of duty the defendant would be liable for punitive damages. The granting or refusal of a new trial absolute or a new trial nisi for excess in the verdict was a matter within the discretion of the circuit court; and this court is not convinced that the verdict was so excessive as to warrant the conclusion that the circuit judge abused his discretion in refusing a new trial.

The plaintiff was allowed to testify over the objection of defendant's counsel as follows, about a conversation with Thompson, the defendant's subagent at Dumbarton: "Q. Was he or not acting as agent? A. Yes, sir; and I went back to him and said: 'I have got a ticket to go to Barnwell and the train did not stop, and what will I do about it?' and he says: 'That ticket is good on this damn road for the next 24 hours to come,' and that was all of the satisfaction that he gave me." The evidence was clearly admissible. It was the obvious duty of defendant's ticket agent at Dumbarton to give passengers information about trains and to answer all reasonable inquiries on that subject. It was the right of the plaintiff to ask information as to any relief the defendant could give him, and it was his duty to the defendant to seek this information, so as to enable him to minimize his damages. Taber v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 81 S. C. 317, 62 S. E. 311; Berley v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 83 S. C. 411, 65 S. E. 456; Cobb v. Telegraph Co., 85 S. C. 430, 67 S. E. 549.

The court gave this instruction: "Did that train of cars on that day entirely stop at Dumbarton, and did it do so for a sufficient length of time for Frank Bing to get on? If it did that ends the case. If it did not, then the railroad company has violated the law." In the exceptions it is submitted that this was erroneous, because it was a "charge instructing the jury that Frank Bing was a man of ordinary reason and prudence, using due diligence to board the train; whereas, it should have been for the jury to determine if a man by ordinary reason and prudence, acting with due diligence, could have boarded said train."

The distinction made by the exception is too refined. There was nothing in the evidence to show that Bing was not an ordinarily active person, and the context plainly shows that the court meant that he could not recover, if the defendant stopped its train long enough to give him, as an ordinary passenger, a reasonable opportunity to board the train.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Careful examination of the petition for rehearing does not convince us that there was any material issue arising on the record overlooked or disregarded in the judgment of the court.

The petition for rehearing is therefore dismissed, and the order heretofore granted staying the remittitur revoked.

BURCKHALTER v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910. On Petition for Rehearing, Aug. 6, 1910.)

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by D. C. Burckhalter against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. Barron, Wyman & Wyman, and Douglas McKay, for appellant. R. C. Holman and W. H. Townsend, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This appeal involves substantially the same questions as the appeal in the case of Bing v. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, 68 S. E. 645, and the judgment of affirmance in that case is conclusive of this.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Careful examination of the petition for rehearing does not convince us that there was any material issue arising on the record overlooked or disregarded in the judgment of the court.

The petition for rehearing is therefore dismissed, and the order heretofore granted staying the remittitur revoked.

BANK OF MARION v. SOUTHERN EXPRESS CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910. On Petition for Rehearing Aug. 6, 1910.)

CARRIERS (§ 136*)—LOSS OF PROPERTY—ACTION—DIRECTION OF VERDICT—WHEN.

In a suit to recover an alleged shortage in the amount contained in a package of money when delivered by the express company to the consignee, there being some evidence to establish plaintiff's case, the court properly refused to direct a verdict for defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 596-598; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marion County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Marion against the Southern Express Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Willcox & Willcox and Jas. W. Johnson, for appellant. Mullins & Hughes and M. C. Woods, for respondent.

JONES, O. J. The complaint alleged that on December 6, 1908, at Marion, S. C., plaintiff bank delivered to defendant carrier a package containing $3,000 for transportation and delivery to the Murchison National Bank at Wilmington, N. C., and that when said package was delivered to the Murchison National Bank the package was short and contained only $2,280, and demanded judgment for the amount of the shortage with interest.

The answer, after general denial, alleged "that on December 6, 1908, the plaintiff delivered to defendant at its office in Marion, S. C., a sealed package, said to contain $3,000; that said package was consigned to the Murchison National Bank, Wilmington, N. C.; that defendant did not count the money placed in said package by plaintiff, and does not know what it contained, but this defendant alleges that it transported said package to Wilmington, in the state of North Carolina, and there delivered same to the consignee in precisely the condition it was in when it was delivered to defendant, the seal of said package unbroken and its contents intact."

The verdict and judgment was for the plaintiff for the amount claimed.

The exceptions allege error in the court's refusal to direct a verdict for the defendant and to grant a new trial, on the ground that the evidence showed conclusively that the package under seal was delivered in the same condition as when received. Without going into details, it is sufficient to say that there was some testimony tending to establish the case of the plaintiff. There was sharp conflict between the testimony for the plaintiff and the defendant, but the issue as to when and where the shortage occurred was peculiarly one for the jury.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

WOODS, J., did not sit in this case.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. After careful consideration of the within petition we do not discover that any material issue has been overlooked or disregarded.

It is therefore ordered that this petition be dismissed, and the stay of remittitur heretofore granted be revoked.

HARDIN v. CASE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)CONTRACTS (§ 10) — CORPORATIONS (§§ 118, 121*)—ACTION FOR BREACH—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION—UNILATERAL CONTRACTS.

The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover $500 principal and 8 per cent. interest thereon from the _____ day of _____, 1907, and in his petition made substantially the following allegations: Defendant agreed to pay plaintiff, for his five shares of stock in the corporation herein-after named, $500, and to pay interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum on each sum from the date of the issue of the stock. The plaintiff was to have one year from July 1, 1907, to decide whether or not he would accept "said agreed and proposed sum for his said stock." As evidence of the agreement a writing was signed by both parties, of which the following is a copy: "This certifies that I, Geo. F. Case, do agree to pay to J. T. Hardin 8 per cent. interest on his 500 shares of Central Marble & Milling Company stock from date of issue of stock to date of purchase of stock, provided said stock does not pay this amount of interest or better; further I do agree to purchase said stock at any time said J. T. Hardin wishes to dispose of same at par value within one year from date of this agreement. [Signed] Geo. F. Case. J. T. Hardin." The plaintiff alleged that "at divers times between July 1, 1907, and July 1, 1908, he approached the said Geo. F. Case, and offered to and undertook to comply and accept said agreement, and deliver to said Case said stock as contemplated in said agreement, and did demand at divers times of said Case the price and money he obligated himself to pay petitioner for said stock, which the said Case refused to do, and still refuses to do. Petitioner now and here offers and proposes to surrender to the said Case his said stock in the said Central Marble & Milling Company, and to comply in every way with his agreement." In said contract it was agreed "that petitioner was to suffer and permit the said Geo. F. Case to control and vote said stock from and after date of said agreement in all the meetings of the stockholders of the said company, which petitioner agreed to and permitted. Other features of the said contract were to the effect that petitioner was to have, which was to be paid by the said Geo. F. Case, a full return of all money invested by him in said stock, with interest thereon, which stock the said Case was instrumental in selling to petitioner originally, and of his own motion proposes to take petitioner's stock from off his hands." Held:

(1) The petition was not subject to general demurrer.

(2) The petition was not subject to demurrer on the ground that "the contract sued on and set out in plaintiff's petition is unilateral, and with [neither] party to the same is under any legal obligation to perform the same," or on the ground that "the said contract is wanting in mutual covenants and without any consideration on the part of plaintiff to do any act beneficial to the defendant or hurtful to himself."

(a) It being agreed by the plaintiff, in the contract, "that petitioner was to suffer and permit the said Geo. F. Case to control and vote said stock for and after date of said agreement in all the meetings of the stockholders of the said company, which petitioner agreed to and permitted," the agreement by the defendant to buy the shares of stock was not originally without consideration.

(b) The contract was not unilateral, and there was no want of mutuality, when the plaintiff, within one year from the time of its execution, offered the defendant the shares of stock and demanded the price the defendant agreed to pay therefor. Brown v. Bowman, 119 Ga. 153, 46 S. E. 410; Sivell v. Hogan, 119 Ga. 167, 46 S. E. 67; McCaw Mfg. Co. v. Felder, 115 Ga. 408, 414, 415, 41 S. E. 664; Perry v. Paschal, 103 Ga. 134, 29 S. E. 703; *Morrow v. (Supreme Court of Georgia. July 15, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 39) — TIME FOR TENDERING.

A direct assignment of error upon a ruling made during the trial of a civil case is presented too late for consideration by the Supreme Court, when it first appears in a bill of exceptions tendered more than 30 days after the adjournment of the term at which such ruling was made; and unless it affirmatively appears that a bill of exceptions embracing such an assignment of error was, with respect thereto, tendered in due time, this court is without jurisdiction to pass upon that assignment.

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 18*)—GROUNDS—RULINGS ON AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS.

Rulings of the trial court upon the question of the allowance or disallowance of amendments to pleadings cannot constitute a ground of a motion for a new trial.

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 199*)—ACTIONS BY PARTNERS ON DEBT DUE FIRM.

A verdict in favor of the plaintiffs in a suit brought by two of the individual members of a firm, which was composed of three members, to recover for services performed and money expended, is without evidence to support it; the evidence showing that, if any recovery upon the contract which was the basis of the suit could be had, it should be for the firm, and not for the two members thereof who brought the suit.

WADSWORTH v. WADSWORTH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EXCLUDING THEORIES.

Under order of the court of ordinary, an administrator advertised for sale certain land of which he was in possession as the property of his intestate, to which the widow of the intestate filed a claim. Upon the trial the plaintiff was allowed to file an equitable plea, alleging, among other things, that his intestate was in possession of the property under a contract of purchase from a named vendor, with all of the purchase money paid except $40 at the time the claimant obtained a deed to the land from such vendor, and that the claimant "had actual notice of these facts" when the deed was made to her, and praying that the court direct the sale of the land, and that out of the proceeds thereof the $40, with legal interest, be paid to the claimant, and the remainder be distributed among the heirs at law of the intestate. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the claimant, and the plaintiff excepted to an order of the court refusing his motion for a new trial. Held, there being evidence from which the jury would be authorized to conclude that the allegations above set forth, embraced in the equitable pleading of the plaintiff, were true, and that the claimant paid to the vendor the balance of the purchase money of the land due him by the intestate in pursuance of an agreement between her and the intestate, that she would take a deed from the vendor to the land and hold title thereto to secure such amount, the court committed error in failing to charge the jury that, if they believed this theory of the case to be true, they should find a verdict, in accordance with the prayer above set forth, that the land be sold, "and that out of the proceeds thereof the $40 with legal interest, be paid to the claimant."

(a) The charge, "Take the case, and if you find that the deed was delivered, and that it embraces this land, she would have a title, and the issue should be found in favor of the claimant," excluded from consideration by the jury the theory of the case above referred to, upon which the jury was authorized to make a finding; and for this, if for no other reason, it was error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 231, 728*)—OBJECTIONS BELOW—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY.

An assignment of error, complaining that the court committed error in allowing a witness to deliver certain evidence upon the trial of the case on the ground "that the witness was incompetent to testify to such facts," cannot be considered, as it does not appear that such objection to the competency of the witness was made on any specified ground.

(a) An assignment of error that the court committed error in allowing the opposite party to read to the jury answers to certain questions contained in interrogatories, on the ground that they were leading, cannot be considered, when neither the questions referred to, nor the substance thereof, are made to appear in the assignment of error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. §§ 231, 728;* Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 194-210.]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 344*)—PROCEEDINGS TO SELL LAND—CLAIM BY THIRD PERSON—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

One assignment of error is that the court erred in excluding the following testimony of a witness: "In a conversation with the claimant [R. M. Wadsworth], she told me that she wished he, meaning the administrator, Leo Wadsworth, had let it stay like the will was. I [witness] asked her what the will said. She said the will said that at the death of Wadsworth the land was to go to her for life, then to Jack Patterson's wife, but the mule was to go to the children." As the alleged statements of the claimant testified to were susceptible of a meaning that tended to show that she preferred a life estate in the land to the interest she obtained by virtue of the deed, the testimony was admissible to illustrate the question as to whether or not she held title to the land only to secure a debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 344.*]

HILLIARD v. KING.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 324*)—BREACH—NATURE OF ACTION.

Where a contractor had built a house for another, and, claiming that the building contract had been fully complied with demanded payment of the part of the contract price which remained unpaid, and the owner, insisting that the contract was not completed, in that the plastering in the house was defective as to material and workmanship and was not in accordance with the specifications, refused to pay the balance of the contract price, and the contractor thereupon, in order to obtain payment of the balance, executed a writing wherein it was stipulated that he did thereby "warrant the plastering throughout the said house for a term of 12 months, and, should any defect in workmanship or material develop, I guarantee to put same in perfect condition, and should I neglect to attend to and do said work promptly Dr. C. C. King [the owner] has and is hereby empowered to have said work done at my expense,"

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

the owner could maintain an action for damages for a breach of this written undertaking, where defects in workmanship or material developed within the period of time specified, in case the contractor failed and neglected to put the plastering in the condition contemplated in the undertaking, and he was not limited to the remedy of having the imperfect and defective work completed and then suing the contractor for the expense incurred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 324.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 506*)—SUBJECT OF EXPERT TESTIMONY—CHARACTER OF WORK DONE UNDER CONTRACT.

Where one of the questions for determination by the jury was whether certain plastering done by the contractor fulfilled the requirements of given specifications in the building contract, it was competent for an expert to testify as to whether or not it "came up to the specifications."

1. FRAUD IN CONTRACT.

The plea in the case contained sufficient allegations of fraud in the procurement of the contract sued on to withstand a general demurrer, and under the evidence introduced in support of the plea the jury were authorized to find in favor of the defendant upon this issue. 3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1072*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

That issue having been determined in favor of the defendant, and no reason for disturbing that finding appearing, the judgment refusing plaintiff a new trial should not be disturbed by this court, irrespective of the other question raised in the motion for a new trial.

HARKER v. STATE (No. 2,633.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 19, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DEMURRER TO INDICTMENT.

There was no error in overruling the demurrer. That portion of the accusation which charged that the accused sold cocaine "by himself, servants, and agents" was properly treated as surplusage; and the disjunctive "or" was properly used for the purpose of exhaustively excluding the accused from coming within any possible exception by reason of which the sale would be legal.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 758*)—INSTRUCTIONS—STATEMENT BY ACCUSED—CREDIBILITY.

While it is the better practice, in charging the jury upon the subject of the defendant's statement, to use the exact language of the Code, an instruction: "Under the law the defendant is permitted to make a statement. This statement is not under oath. It is within the province of the jury trying the case to believe the unsworn statement of the defendant in preference to the sworn testimony in the case, if, after weighing it and considering it, they believe it entitled to more weight and credit"—is not erroneous. It does not restrict the discretion of the jury in believing the statement, if for any reason they see proper to do so. The omission of an instruction to the effect that the statement shall have only such force as the jury may think right to give it cannot be injurious to the defendant, because this language only draws the attention of the jury to the fact that the statement is not evidence, and that they are not bound to treat it as such.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1786; Dec. Dig. § 758.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1038*)—APPEAL—RENEWAL OF INSTRUCTIONS.

In the absence of a request calling the attention of the court to specific points upon which the defendant relied, the exceptions to the charge are without merit. The evidence amply authorized the conviction of the defendant, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

ASHLEY v. REYNOLDS. (No. 2,431.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 19, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)JUDGMENT (§ 151)—DEFAULT—VACATION—PROCEDURE.

An affidavit of illegality was filed to the levy of an execution, and the case was duly returned to the court from which the execution issued. When the case was called in its order for trial, the plaintiff in execution and his attorney were voluntarily absent without leave. The affiant made no motion to dismiss the levy, but asked to submit the evidence in support of the illegality to the jury; he having made a timely demand for a trial by a jury. The court allowed him to do so, and at the conclusion of the evidence directed a verdict sustaining the illegality. Subsequently, during the same term of the court, the attorney for the plaintiff in execution made a written motion to have the verdict and judgment so rendered vacated and set aside, and the trial judge, without notice or service of this motion, passed an order setting aside the verdict and judgment. Held, that this was error. If for any reason the judgment rendered on the verdict sustaining the illegality was erroneous, it could have been set aside and vacated only on a regular motion for a new trial, filed and served, and heard by the trial judge. Irrespective of the merits of the illegality, the verdict sustaining it was final and conclusive, until set aside by legal motion for a new trial. The judge was not authorized summarily to set the verdict aside and vacate the judgment duly entered thereon.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 19, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)BILLS AND NOTES (§ 378)—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

This was a suit in a justice's court on a promissory note, against the maker, by the holder, who was not the payee. The defendant pleaded failure of consideration, and by an amendment to the plea set up that the note had been "materially changed and altered, in that the words 'or bearer' had been inserted in said note since the making thereof, and without the consent or authority of defendant." On motion of the plaintiff this plea as amended was stricken, and judgment entered for the plaintiff. On certiorari this action of the justice's court was sustained by the judge of the superior court, and the defendant excepted. Held, the plea as amended set up a good defense. The note when made was not negotiable. The alteration alleged made it apparently negotiable or transferable by delivery. If this note as executed was not negotiable, the rule as to bona fide purchasers before maturity and without notice did not apply to the defense. If the note, when made, was payable to the named payee or bearer, title passed by delivery, and the maker could not set up the defense of failure of consideration as against the bona fide holder. The alteration, therefore, was material, and, if made as alleged in the amended plea, the negotiability of the note was a forgery, and in effect the plea amounted to a plea of non est factum. The plea as amended was sworn to, and, as it set out a good defense, the judge of the superior court erred in not sustaining the certiorari and remanding the case for another trial.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 19, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. COURTS (§ 188)—CITY COURTS—JURISDICTION—WARRANTS TO EJECT INTRUDERS.

The city court of Quitman has jurisdiction to try warrants to eject intruders. Acts 1904, p. 188; McDonald v. Vaughn, 130 Ga. 398, 60 S. E. 1060. A warrant to eject an intruder is similar in nature to a warrant brought to dispossess a tenant holding over, and does not involve title to the land, for the reason that possession is the only subject of controversy, and the award of possession the only result of the litigation. Harper v. Tomblin, 127 Ga. 390, 56 S. E. 433.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 188.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 208*)—ADMISSIONS—PLEADINGS—ADMISSIBILITY IN SUBSEQUENT PROCEEDINGS.

There was no error in admitting in evidence the admissions of the party under whom the defendant claimed possession, as contained in her petition filed in another court, even though the petition was not verified. Lamar v. Pearre, 90 Ga. 377 (1), 17 S. E. 92.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 714, 716; Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 100*)—EXTENT.

Possession under a duly recorded deed will be construed to extend to all the contiguous property embraced therein. Civ. Code 1895, § 3587. Consequently there was no error in allowing a witness who was shown to have been for a period exceeding seven years in possession of the entire lot, including the property of which the defendant was in possession, to testify to the fact of his possession and the nature of that possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 547, 575-580; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 25*)—LEASE—ATTESTING WITNESSES—ATTORNEY AT LAW.

There was no error in admitting in evidence a lease attested by an attorney of one of the parties. An attorney at law, who has no financial interest in the subject-matter, is not disqualified or incompetent to attest as a subscribing witness a paper beneficial to his client. Austin v. Southern Home B. & L. Association, 122 Ga. 439 (6), 50 S. E. 382.

Recovery from a mere intruder can be had upon prior possession alone. McKay v. Kendrick, 44 Ga. 608 (3). In view of the evidence of the prior possession of the plaintiff, the judgment was authorized, if not demanded, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 741*)—CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES—"NOTICE."

Only such substantial compliance with the provisions of the act of 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 74), requiring notice to be given to municipal corporations of claims for damages against them, is necessary as will enable the municipality to fully investigate the claim, and to determine whether it prefers to adjust the claim without suit, or to contest its validity in the courts.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 741*)—CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES—"NOTICE."

The requirement that the notice shall state the negligence which caused the damage was sufficiently complied with in this case, and it was error to nonsuit the plaintiff upon the ground that the statement of the cause of the injury was not sufficiently specific. One who claims damages against a municipality is not required to do more than to state definitely and specifically all the facts upon which he bases his claim. The form of the notice is not amenable to the strict rules of pleading. It is intended only to state such facts as will enable the municipality to promptly investigate for itself the merits of the claim.

SHEPHERD v. STATE. (No. 2,563.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 67*)—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—FRAUDULENT INTENT.

Intent to defraud is the paramount, controlling, and ever-essential element which determines the guilt of one accused of a violation of the labor contract law of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90). It is the duty of the court, even in the absence of a written request, to instruct the jury that, in order to authorize the conviction of one accused of a violation of this act, the intention to cheat and swindle the prosecutor must have existed on the part of the defendant at the time the money was advanced. Failure to so charge the jury is reversible error. Mulkey v. State, 1 Ga. App. 521 (1), 57 S. E. 1022.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 67*)—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—FRAUDULENT INTENT.

The present intent to defraud cannot be asserted as to a payment made without the consent of the employee, nor as to an advancement made without reference to the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

Error from City Court of Ashburn; R. L. Tipton, Judge.

Tom Shepherd was convicted of violating the labor contract law, and he brings error. Reversed.

John B. Hutcheson, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Comer, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant was convicted in the lower court of a violation of the labor contract law of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90), and he excepts to the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial.

In addition to the general grounds of the motion for a new trial, the defendant assigns error upon the failure of the court to specifically instruct the jury that they must be satisfied from the evidence that the intention to cheat and swindle the prosecutor existed on the part of the defendant at the time the money or other things of value were advanced, before they would be authorized to convict. The presence of the intent to defraud at the time the advances are procured, as was pointed out in Patterson v. State, 1 Ga. App. 782, 58 S. E. 284, is the only thing which prevents the punishment for violation of the act of 1903 from being mere imprisonment for debt, and therefore violative of the Constitution; and in Mulkey v. State, 1 Ga. App. 521, 57 S. E. 1022, we expressly held that it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury, even in the absence of a written request, that, in order to authorize a conviction, the intention to cheat and swindle the prosecutor must have existed on the part of the defendant at the time the money was advanced. Upon a review of the charge, we find that this principle, while perhaps hinted at, was not clearly presented in the charge of the court, and we are therefore of the opinion that the defendant should have another trial.

2. It seems that the accused was advanced 30 cents worth of meal, 50 cents worth of meat, 5 cents worth of salt, 5 cents worth of tobacco, and 10 cents worth of rice. It was also claimed that the prosecutor advanced him $27.25 in money. As to $20 of this sum, it is very apparent that it was not made with any reference to the contract. The prosecutor testified that he "found that another fellow had credited him for $20, and he paid him out—that this $20 was paid after the trade was made." Explanatory of this testimony, Mr. Wells testified that on Monday, following the Friday night when the trade was made between the prosecutor and the defendant, a Mr. Gardner, from Worth county, came and said he was going to have the defendant arrested. Wells testified that, rather than have Shepherd arrested, he said to Shepherd that he would pay the money for him, and he asked the defendant, if Fletcher (the prosecutor) did not pay it, if he would work it out with him (Wells). The defendant agreed, if Wells would advance the money to pay Gardner, that he would work it out with Wells, and a contract to that effect was drawn up. When Fletcher came up, he asked the defendant if he would work it out, and, upon his replying that he would, Fletcher paid Wells the $20 which the latter had advanced at the defendant's request.

It is apparent, from this testimony in regard to the $20, that it was originally advanced by Wells, and not by Fletcher; that the defendant had already bound himself to Wells to work it out in some manner and for some period of time not disclosed (because the contract between Wells and the defendant is not in evidence); and it appears, from the inquiry of the prosecutor as to the defendant's working it out, that this advance merely affords the basis of another and different contract from the one originally made. However this may be, as the attention of the jury was not called specifically to the fact that there must be an intention to defraud the party, who is shown to have sustained loss and damage at the time of the advancement, a new trial, regardless of other matters, must result.

Judgment reversed.

SPURGEON v. STATE (No. 2,724.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The evidence authorized the defendant's conviction of voluntary manslaughter. Indeed, the evidence seems to preponderate in favor of this theory of the case.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 340*)—WRIT OF ERROR—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

There was no material error, if error at all, in the judge's telling the jury that there are two kinds of manslaughter, voluntary and involuntary, though there was no theory of the evidence indicating involuntary manslaughter. The judge did not submit any issue as to involuntary manslaughter to the jury, and they did not render any verdict as to that offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 340.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARACTER OF PARTIES.

The court did not err in charging the jury as follows: "The character of the deceased for violence, and the character of the defendant for peaceableness, if the evidence discloses such, you will consider along with the other evidence in the case in arriving at your verdict." The language was not erroneous of itself, and was sufficiently complete, in the absence of a request for further instructions on the subject.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 295*)—CRIMINAL LAW (§ 823*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

The court did not err in charging the jury: "After the difficulty in the supply room, if they had a difficulty and fight in there, had ceased, if it should appear, from the evidence, Haney [the deceased] declined any further struggle, and started off about his business, then the evidence as far as relates to that difficulty in the supply room would be immaterial, unless you should believe that the difficulty in there generated in the mind of the defendant in this case that sudden, violent, impulse of passion supposed to be irresistible, and that he acted under the influence of that passion, and pursued Haney with his knife, assaulted him, and killed him; and if you should believe the defendant did that, Haney having declined any further struggle with him, you should be authorized to find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter;" the instruction being pertinent to one theory of the evidence, and the court having fully instructed the jury as to the law to govern their deliberations in considering other theories which might also be deduced from the evidence.

GUTHRIE v. HENDLEY. (No. 2,371.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 132*)—MOTION—APPROVAL OF BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

A motion for a new trial is not complete before the brief of evidence has been approved. Where the court in its order specifically limits the time within which the brief of evidence must be presented, and no brief is presented within that time, it is not error to dismiss this incomplete and defective motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 273-275; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 132*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—DUTY TO FURNISH BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

A movant for a new trial is not confined to the record prepared by the stenographer, or dependent upon it for the preparation of the brief of evidence necessary to complete his motion, and the fact that the stenographer may have failed to make a copy of the testimony submitted at the trial, when offered as an excuse for counsel's nonperformance of his duty to prepare a brief of evidence, is entitled to no more value than the court sees proper to give it under the circumstances. The duty of preparing the brief of evidence is upon the movant, and is not dependent upon whether a stenographer was or was not engaged to take the testimony in the case. Where, by an order passed in term time, the hearing of the motion for a new trial was fixed for a day certain, and the time granted for the preparation and presentation of the brief of evidence necessary to complete the motion was expressly limited to that day, and no brief of evidence was prepared according to the terms of the order or within the time allowed therein, it was especially not error at a later day to dismiss this motion for a new trial, instead of granting a continuance, when it was admitted that the brief of evidence had not even then been prepared. This is true, although the stenographer had not copied the notes of the testimony, and the judge who presided in the trial of the case had died. The fact that there was no judge qualified to hear the motion or to extend the time for hearing upon the day on or before which a brief of evidence was required to be presented afforded no excuse for the movant's negligence and non-compliance with the terms of the original order of the court.

Error from City Court of Nashville; R. Eve, Judge.

Action between S. F. Guthrie and J. H. Hendley. From the judgment, Guthrie brings error. Affirmed.

J. P. Knight, for plaintiff in error. Hendricks & Christian, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. We think that the court properly dismissed the motion for a new trial in this case. Counsel for plaintiff in error relies upon the decision of this court in the case of James v. Flannery Co., 6 Ga. App. 811, 66 S. E. 153, as sustaining his contention that the court erred in dismissing the motion. It is easily to be seen, from a comparison of the orders granted by the court in the two cases, that nothing ruled in the Flannery

Case is in conflict with what we now hold. In fact our decision in both cases is based upon the same principle, to wit, that the order of the judge which extends the time for perfecting a motion for a new trial must control and fix the right of the parties to the motion in that respect. In the Flannery Case we held that, as the judge provided that the movant should have until the hearing, "when-ever it may be," to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence, and as the motion was regularly continued, with the rights of the movant preserved, the movant had until the hearing to present his brief of evidence, because the order granted in term time expressly said so. In the present case the trial judge did not use any such language in allowing the movant an extension of time in which to complete the motion by presenting for approval a brief of the evidence. After setting the motion to be heard on the 9th day of August, 1909, he ordered "that the movant have until the hearing as set out to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence in said case, and the presiding judge may enter his approval thereon at any time, either in term or vacation." It is apparent, from the two orders, that the facts in this case and in the Flannery Case are dissimilar.

1. It is well settled that, strictly speaking, a motion for a new trial is not pending before the court until a brief of the evidence has been prepared and presented to the judge, and approved by him. Tallaferro v. Columbus Railway Company, 130 Ga. 570, 61 S. E. 228, and cit.; Baker v. Johnson & Harris, 99 Ga. 374, 27 S. E. 706; Pinnebad v. Pinnebad, 129 Ga. 267, 58 S. E. 879. Where the court in its order specifically limits the time within which the brief of evidence must be presented, and no brief is presented within that time, it is not error to dismiss this incomplete and defective motion for a new trial. In the present case, as we construe the order of Judge Peebles, the movant had until the 9th day of August to complete his motion by making out a brief of testimony and presenting it to the judge. He might present this brief either in term time or vacation, and have it approved by the judge and file it. According to the terms of the order, when he did this, if the motion now completed was not heard, there was a provision in the order, as well as of law, by which it might stand continued from term to term. It is clear, however, that unless the judge in term time had granted an order extending indefinitely the time within which the brief of the evidence should be presented as a necessary part of the motion, the order of the judge as written would have to be complied with by the movant at his peril.

2. It appears from the recitals in the bill of exceptions that this motion for a new trial came on for a hearing on December 3,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

1909, before his honor, Judge Eve, judge of the city court of Tifton, presiding in the city court of Nashville. Counsel for the movant moved a continuance of the case upon the following grounds: "(1) That Judge H. B. Peeples, before whom the case was tried on June 19, 1909, was dead, having died on July 7, 1909. (2) That W. D. Bule, who was sole counsel for the movant at the trial, was qualified and sworn in as judge of the city court of Nashville to fill the unexpired term of Judge Peeples on August 4, 1909. (3) That at the time this motion for a new trial was originally set to be heard on the 9th day of August, 1909, in term time at Nashville, Ga., at 10 o'clock a. m., there was no qualified judge in the county of Berrien to hear said motion, nor from whom an order could be procured extending the time for hearing. (4) That the stenographer who reported the case had not furnished counsel for movant with a record of the evidence, and it was therefore impossible for him to prepare a brief of the evidence." The facts contained in these grounds of the motion for a continuance were stated by counsel to be true and were not contested. The stenographer stated that he was not requested to write out the evidence until four or five months after the trial, and that owing to the fact of Judge Peeples' death and the election of Judge Bule, the original counsel representing Guthrie, and his own illness, with consequent absence from home, and to the fact that he had mislaid a part of the record, and on account of the extreme length of the record, it was impossible for him to furnish counsel for the movant with the record at that time, but that he would have it prepared and ready within a day or two. As further reason for a continuance counsel for the movant stated that he was not employed to represent the movant in the motion for a new trial until the October term, 1909.

By the consent of the movant's counsel the decision of the court upon the motion for a continuance was suspended, and counsel for the respondent (defendant in error here) moved to dismiss the motion, stating that, if the motion to dismiss was not well taken, counsel was willing to agree to a continuance. The written motion to dismiss, filed by counsel for defendant in error, was based upon the following grounds: "(a) Because no brief of the evidence was filed during the term of the court at which the case was tried, or within 30 days after the trial or the filing of the motion for a new trial. (b) The motion for new trial was presented for approval, and was approved and filed, on June 9, 1909, and the hearing set for August 9, 1909; the movant having until that day only to present for approval the brief of the evidence. No brief was presented on the date the motion was set to come on for hearing, nor was an order taken allowing further time in which to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence. (c) No brief of the evidence was presented to the court for approval on December 3, 1909, and no order was taken on August 9, 1909, or thereafter, continuing the hearing and allowing the movant further time in which to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence. Defendant has waived no right, and moves to dismiss the motion for new trial for the want of a properly approved brief of the evidence, and insists upon dismissing the motion for the want of the same. (d) The motion for new trial was filed before the judgment in the case was rendered and signed, and is therefore prematurely filed."

Without considering the first and last grounds, it is sufficient to say that either the second or the third ground was sufficient to authorize the dismissal of the motion for a new trial. The movant was required, by the terms of the order granting an extension of time, to present his brief of evidence for approval on or before August 9, 1909, and he had not done so; but even if, by any construction, it could be held that the terms of the order tended to grant an extension (such as was expressly given in the Flannery Case) until the hearing, the movant did not then have any brief of evidence and was asking for time in which to prepare one. None of the facts stated upon the motion for a continuance afforded any just excuse for the movant's failure to prepare a brief of evidence. Three weeks passed before the judge who tried the case died. There was nearly a month thereafter before the movant's original counsel became judge of the city court, and five days even after Judge Bule's election still remained in which the movant might have had a brief of evidence prepared by another attorney, and yet he did not employ counsel to take the place of Judge Bule until two months after that time. There is nothing in the insistence that by reason of Judge Bule's disqualification a qualified judge could not be obtained. Under the provisions of Civ. Code, §§ 4327-4329, even if a judge of another city court could not be obtained, nor any judge of the superior court induced to come, a judge pro hac vice could have been selected with the consent of the respondent, who could have continued the hearing, because it had been set for a day in term time, or who could have approved the brief of evidence (if that had been insisted upon), as well as any other except the deceased judge who had tried the case. If the movant had his brief of evidence prepared, and counsel for the opposite party would not agree with him upon some attorney to act as judge pro hac vice, then it would have been the duty of the clerk to select one. If however, as we stated above, there had been any good reason why the brief of evidence was not presented at the time fixed for that purpose in the original order of the trial judge, the plaintiff in error still has no reason to complain at the dismissal of the motion under the circumstances and upon the showing made before Judge Eve; for nearly six months had then elapsed, and, no matter how the original order might be construed, the case was up for a hearing, and the movant still had no brief of evidence prepared, nor had he made any effort to prepare one for presentation. Consequently the motion for a new trial was so fatally defective that its dismissal was demanded.

It is apparent to us, as it must have been to the judge in the court below, that the attorneys for the movant depended entirely upon the stenographer to prepare the brief of evidence. We therefore think it not inappropriate to make a few remarks upon the subject of counsel's duty with relation to the brief of evidence. In the progress of our modern civilization the stenographer has become an almost indispensable adjunct in the administration of justice; but, as related to counsel, the fact that the stenographer fails to do his duty, or is unavoidably prevented from doing it, is only of such value, when offered as the excuse or reason why counsel has not done his, as the court to whom the excuse is addressed sees proper to attach to it. The nonperformance of a duty by the stenographer would not generally afford any reason why counsel, upon whom is imposed the duty of preparing a brief of evidence in the motion for a new trial, has not discharged this duty. It is, of course, much easier to prune down the record prepared by an official stenographer than to prepare for one's self a brief of the testimony. But in any trial, if the stenographer is the employé of the movant or his counsel, the stenographer's failure to perform his duty would be no excuse for the principal; and if he is not an employé of the movant—for instance, if it is the official stenographer—he owes no duty to the parties litigant other than as directed by the trial judge. Custom in different jurisdictions may vary, limiting or extending the duty of the official stenographer to furnish copies of the record to the counsel engaged in a case; but in every case the practice is subject to be changed by the presiding judge, and the showing must in every case be addressed to a discretion upon his part, which cannot be controlled by reviewing courts. It was not shown in this case that Judge Peebles had given any direction, general or special, by which the stenographer was required to furnish copies of the record to the counsel for the movant, nor does this appear from his order fixing the date of the hearing. Primarily, counsel for the movant is supposed to prepare his own brief of evidence, and in our opinion the salient points in a case would be more distinctly stated, and more matter wholly immaterial matter would be omitted, if counsel prepared the brief of evidence without regard to the stenographer's notes. We are certain that generally the brief would be briefer, and the briefer the better.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 12, 1910.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 130*)—RELEVANCY—RES INTER ALIOS ACTA.

In a suit to enjoin the obstruction of an alleged alley, a deed between others, in which the recitations stated that there was no such alley, was inadmissible as res inter alios acta, amounting to nothing more than the declarations or admissions of the parties to the deed, and incompetent to show notice to plaintiff that no such alley existed.

house had been rebuilt where it stood when burned, was properly excluded.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; C. O. Featherstone, Judge.

Action by John G. Wyatt against Alice M. Cely. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. A. Morgan, for appellant. Othrair Dean & Cothran, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This action was brought to enjoin the obstruction of an alley in which plaintiff claimed an easement on the grounds:

(1) That it was appurtenant to his lot, because it was substituted for another way which had been dedicated to the use of his lot; (2) by prescription in himself and his grantors; (3) by prescription in the public.

The following issue was submitted to a jury: Is the plaintiff entitled to an easement in the land in dispute as claimed in the complaint? To which the jury answered "Yes." Thereupon, a perpetual injunction was issued.

To clearly understand some of the questions presented by the appeal, it will be necessary to have in mind the location and description of the lots affected by this litigation, and the origin and history of the alley. About the year 1876, a lot in the city of Greenville, owned by the heirs of John McKay, was subdivided and sold for partition. It was a parallelogram in shape, fronting 109 feet on Pendleton street, which was on the south, and extending back to Rhett street, on the north. For the purposes of the sale, it was divided into four lots and an alley, and platted accordingly. The alley was eight feet wide and was laid off on the eastern edge of the lot and extended from Pendleton to Rhett street. Three lots were laid off on Pendleton street, each fronting thereon $33\frac{1}{3}$ feet and extending back 100 feet. These were numbered on the plat from west to east 8, 9, and 10; number 10 being next to the alley. The balance of the original lot was numbered 11. There was testimony tending to show that the lots were sold with reference to this plat.

At the time of the sale, there was a house on lot No. 10, which covered nearly the whole width of that lot and extended four feet into the alley. This alley therefore was never opened. The house was subsequently destroyed by fire, being owned at the time by J. A. Speegle. The plaintiff contended that an alley eight feet wide on the west side of lot No. 10 was substituted for the one shown on the plat on the east side of that lot. This substituted alley extends back only 100 feet to the back line of the lots fronting on Pendleton street and there connects with an alley which runs east to River street. The defendant now owns lot No. 10, and was proceeding to build thereon and obstruct the alley, when this action was brought.

The defendant offered in evidence a deed, dated May 10, 1883, from Frank Hammond (who owned the property east of the McKay property) to J. A. Speegle, in which he recites that he had that day sold a lot to Speegle, and grants him a way from said lot to Rhett street, provided J. M. McGhee, who was then the owner of lot No. 10, would not consent that an alley be opened through said lot to Pendleton street. The deed was excluded on the ground that it was res inter alios acta, and amounted to nothing more than the declarations or admissions of Hammond and Speegle that there was no alley over lot No. 10 at that time. The court further held that the record of that deed was not competent as evidence to show notice to plaintiff that no alley existed at that time. The deed was properly excluded for the reasons stated. We do not see how the record of this deed could be notice to plaintiff of the declarations therein contained. The title to this lot was not derived through that deed and could in no wise be affected by the recitals therein. But Mr. Hammond, the maker of the deed, did testify, without objection, to everything that could have been inferred from the recitals of the deed. He said he went to McGhee, and asked him to put an alley through there; that he at first consented, but afterwards declined; that he then offered to pay him to do so, and he declined. The same, in substance was testified to by W. H. Charles, a witness for plaintiff, on cross-examination by defendant. So that, even if the deed had been competent, its exclusion would not, under the circumstances, have been reversible error.

Defendant asked R. A. Means this question: "Would there have been an alleyway leading from Pendleton street to the back of this lot (lot 10), if Mr. Speegle had rebuilt his house where it stood when it was burned?" The answer was excluded. We see no error in this ruling, because it was admitted on all sides that this house covered nearly the entire width of lot No. 10, and extended four feet into the alley originally laid off. Therefore, it followed as an indisputable fact that, if it had been rebuilt as it originally stood, there could have been no alley on lot No. 10. The contention of the plaintiff was not that the alley shown on the plat was ever opened, but that, inferentially, because it could not be opened on account of the house, from the conduct of the parties in interest afterwards, an alley on the western side of that lot was substituted for the one originally laid off.

Defendant offered to prove by W. H. Cely certain declarations made to him by S. M. Wyatt, plaintiff's partner in the livery business, conducted on plaintiff's lot, with regard to the alley and an offer to buy it. Clearly these declarations were incompetent. The partner had no interest in the lot, and his declarations or implied admissions were not competent to bind the owner of the lot.

Error is imputed to the court in allowing plaintiff to testify to consequential damages to the livery business of the partnership, conducted on this lot, by the obstruction of the alley. As the jury found no damages, and as they were explicitly instructed that to succeed in this action on the ground that the alley was a public way, plaintiff must prove some damage to himself different not only in degree but in kind from that suffered by the public by reason of the obstruction thereof. The exceptions raising this point appear to be without force. The instruction as to the kind of damages which plaintiff was bound to prove to succeed on the ground that the alley was a public way was clearly in accord with the law as declared by this court. Gray v. Ry., 81 S. C. 370, 62 S. E. 442, and cases cited.

The next assignment of error is in charging the jury that a right of way by prescription over an uninclosed city lot arises in favor of the public from the continuous use thereof by the public for 20 years, and that it need not be shown also that such use was adverse. That this was a correct statement of the law, see State v. Rodman, 86 S. C. 154, 68 S. E. 343, and cases cited.

Appellant complains of the form of the issue submitted to the jury, contending that it is impossible to tell from the finding on what ground the easement was established. It does not appear that appellant made any objection to the form in which the issue was submitted, or requested its submission in any other form. Therefore she cannot now complain. Williams v. Haile Gold Mining Co., 85 S. C. 1, 66 S. E. 117, 1057.

The last exception charges error in refusing a motion for a new trial, made upon the ground that there was no evidence to sustain either of the causes of action. It does not appear that any motion for nonsuit or for the direction of the verdict was made upon that ground. Therefore, under rule 77 of the circuit court, which requires this ground of objection to be raised first by motion for nonsuit, or for the direction of a verdict, the point is not properly before this court. But waiving the objection, we find that there was evidence tending to establish each of the causes of action.

Judgment affirmed.

REMBERT v. EVANS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 28, 1910.)

1. DEEDS (§ 105*)—CONSTRUCTION—GRANTEES—"HEIRS OF THE BODY."

A trust deed in consideration of the grantor's affection for his daughters M. F. and E. M. conveyed property to their husbands, in trust for the daughters' sole use and benefit and of children now born of the body of the said E. M., and the children thereafter born of the bodies of the said M. F. and E. M., without being subject to their husbands' debts. In case of the death of M. F. without children, the deed gave her husband a life estate in one-half of the profits, which, after his death should revert to E. M. and "the heirs born of her body," and also gave a life estate to the husband of E. M. upon his wife's death, which should go on his death to his children on the body of E. M. Held, that the deed, construed as a whole, showed an intention by the grantor to provide for his daughters and their children, and the words quoted "heirs born of her body" meant the children of E. M., who took a fee upon the death of M. F.; it being permissible to construe the words "heirs of the body" to mean "children" when the context clearly shows such meaning was intended.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3267-3271.]

2. DEEDS (§ 133*)—CONTINGENT ESTATES.

Upon the death of M. F. the interest of the children of E. M. was contingent, since, if she died leaving children, the children of E. M. would take no interest in the land held in trust for M. F.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by George R. Rembert against W. Boyd Evans. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Best, for appellant. Washington Clark and Shand & Shand, for respondent.

WOODS, J. In this action for specific performance, the defendant admits his contract to purchase the land described in the complaint, but denies that the plaintiff can make a good title. The issue thus made depends upon the construction of a deed of trust made by Jesse De Bruhl to Samuel Fair and J. Foster Marshall, on January 7, 1853. The consideration of the deed was love and affection of the grantor for his daughters, Mary D. Fair, wife of Samuel Fair, and Elizabeth A. Marshall, wife of J. Foster Marshall. The trust was thus declared in the granting clause immediately preceding the description of the land and negroes conveyed: "In trust and for the use, behoof and sole benefit of the said Mary D. Fair and Elizabeth A. Marshall and the children now born of the body of the said Elizabeth A. Marshall and the children hereafter to be born of the bodies of the said Mary D. Fair and the said Elizabeth A. Marshall and not in any wise to be subject to the debts, liabilities or contracts of their present husbands or any other future husbands." After the usual clause of warranty, the trust is thus further set out: "And it is further agreed by these presents that the above-mentioned real and personal estate is held by the trustees aforesaid as joint tenants in common for the sole benefit, use and behoof of the said Mary D. Fair and the children to be born of her body, and for the sole benefit, use and behoof of the said Elizabeth A. Marshall and her children now born or to be hereafter born of her body. And it is expressly understood by these presents, that one-half of the net profits after paying all the debts and contracts made in behalf of the said plantation arising from the said plantation and negroes shall be divided equally between the said trustees for the use, benefit and behoof of their respective wives, and that in case the said Mary D. Fair shall die without child or children, then the profits of said land and negroes above given in trust for her shall be held and enjoyed by her husband, Samuel Fair, for and during the term of his natural life, not in any wise subject to his present debts, liabilities or contracts, or any other future debts, liabilities or contracts, and after his death to revert to the said Elizabeth A. Marshall and the heirs born of her body. And it is further agreed by these presents that in case of the death of the said Elizabeth A. Marshall the portion of said land and negroes given in trust for her and children shall be held and enjoyed by her husband, J. Foster, for and during the term of his natural life, not in any wise to be subject to his present debts, liabilities or contracts, or any other future debts, liabilities or contracts and after his death to go to his children begotten on the body of his present wife, Elizabeth A. Marshall. And it further agreed by these presents that the trustees aforesaid are hereby empowered to grant, bargain and sell the above-described tract of land or any part of the above-named negroes and their future increase, whenever they may deem it advisable for the use, benefit and behoof of the said Mary D. Fair and the said Elizabeth A. Marshall. And it is further agreed by these presents that the above-named trustees shall have power and they are hereby authorized whenever they may deem it advisable to bargain, sell and convey to the other, one-half of the above-mentioned real and personal estate, and that the proceeds of such sale shall be invested in any other real or personal property for the sole use and benefit of the cestui que trust for whose benefit such sale and transfer was made. And it is further agreed by these presents that the above-mentioned plantation and negroes and their future increase shall be under the exclusive management and control of the said J. Foster Marshall to make all necessary contracts appertaining to the same and to be allowed a reasonable compensation for the trouble and time he may expend in aid about the same, and that he be required to make annually a return to the said Samuel Fair for his receipts and expenditures and to divide with the said Samuel Fair one-half of the net profits arising from said plantation. And the said Samuel Fair and J. Foster Marshall, trustees as aforesaid, doth on their several parts accept the trust aforesaid and covenant and agree to and with the said Jesse De Bruhl and they hereby bind their heirs, executors and administrators to execute and carry out the above-mentioned trusts, according to the true intent and meaning of these presents."

By a declaration of trust dated 16th of June, 1863, Samuel Fair, one of the trustees, undertook to substitute for trust funds used by him certain lots in the city of Columbia. These are the lots which the plaintiff has contracted to convey to the defendant. In Brazel v. Fair, 28 S. C. 370, 2 S. E. 293, it is held that the substitution was attempted without authority, but that the lots became a part of the trust property by election of the cestui que trust to affirm the substitution.

An agreed statement of facts appears in the record, setting forth in detail all the facts with respect to the family history and the conveyance of the land which, in any view, could possibly bear on the case. As we see the case, only a very short summary of the facts is necessary. Colonel J. Foster Marshall was killed at Second Manassas in 1862; and Elizabeth A. Marshall died in 1868, survived by six children, Samuel F., William J., J. Foster, J. Q.; Eliza D., and Mary F. Marshall. Samuel Fair and Mary D. Fair died childless, the former in 1870, and the latter in 1891. At the death of Mrs. Fair, all the children of Mrs. Marshall were living except Eliza, who died unmarried, and Mary F., who married George Wilson and died childless. J. Q. Marshall by purchase and devise acquired all the interests of his brothers and sisters and of George W. Wilson, the husband of his deceased sister, Eliza D. Wilson, in the land. J. Q. Marshall contracted to sell the land to the Phoenix Investment Company; but he died before making the conveyance, leaving a will by which he devised all of his property to his wife, Jane Brooks Marshall. Afterwards Mrs. Marshall, as sole devisee, made the conveyance under which plaintiff claims. The main question, then, is whether J. Q. Marshall had acquired a good fee-simple title to the land.

From the foregoing statement it will be seen that the land here involved fell under the clause of the trust deed which provided that upon the death of Mary D. Fair, childless, the share of the land and negroes assigned to her was to be enjoyed by her husband, Samuel Fair, for his life, "and after his death to revert to the said Elizabeth A. Marshall and the heirs born of her body." If this clause created a fee conditional in Mrs. Marshall, as the defendant contends, the issue as to title would be quite serious for the reason that at the period of distribution, the death of Mrs. Fair in 1891, some of the children of Mrs. Marshall had children who would answer to the description of heirs of her body; and these grandchildren of Mrs. Marshall did not convey to J. Q. Marshall. The circuit court held, however, that the words "heirs born of her body" meant the children of Mrs. Marshall; that they took in fee simple; and that in acquiring the interests of all who could claim under them J. Q. Marshall acquired a complete fee-simple title. We think this is the correct construction. The deed taken as a whole shows by the words we have italicized that the grantor meant to provide for his daughters and their children. The first general and comprehensive expression of the scope of the trust is that it is to be for the benefit of his daughters and their children. Then when in the deed the terms and conditions of the trust are to be more specifically stated, the same purpose and scheme is expressed. The deed is inartificial and indicates on its face that the grantor was not attempting to use words in their technical sense. Having several times expressed that his purpose was to provide for children born of the bodies of his daughters, it is not natural to suppose that there was an intention to express in this clause by the phrase "heirs born of her body" a different intention. The words "heirs of the body" may be construed to mean children when the context clearly shows that was the meaning intended. Duckett v. Butler, 67 S. C. 130, 45 S. E. 137, and authorities cited.

Here there was no intervening life estate, but a direct grant to Mrs. Marshall "and the heirs born of her body" and the words "heirs of her body" have often been construed to mean children, and not heirs of the body in indefinite succession. Reeves v. Cook, 71 S. C. 275, 51 S. E. 93; Holeman v. Fort, 3 Stroh. Eq. 66, 51 Am. Dec. 665; Bailey v. Patterson, 3 Rich. Eq. 156; Lott v. Thompson, 36 S. C. 38, 15 S. E. 278; Shaw v. Robinson, 42 S. C. 342, 20 S. E. 161. When the expression is viewed in the light of the general and specific scheme of the trust as clearly indicated in the entire deed, there is no room to doubt that the words "heirs born of her body" should be construed to mean children.

Had the conveyance been direct to Mrs. Marshall and her children, they would have taken nothing more than a life estate because there was no limitation to Mrs. Marshall and her children and their heirs. But the conveyance was to a trustee, and the statute did not execute the use because the trustees were vested with the power to sell the land at their discretion, and this made it necessary for them to hold the fee. Blount v. Walker, 31 S. C. 13, 9 S. E. 804. Upon the death of Mrs. Fair the trustee could have nothing further to do, and by devolution the legal title of the children of Mrs. Marshall in fee would become complete. Bratton v. Massey, 15 S. C. 277; Foster v. Glover, 46 S. C. 522, 24 S. E. 370.

It is true that until the death of Mrs. Fair the interest of the children of Mrs. Marshall was contingent, for if Mrs. Fair had died leaving children the children of Mrs. Marshall would have taken no interest in this land. Nevertheless these contingent remainders were transmissible by devise or assignment. Allston v. Bank, 2 Hill, Eq. 235; Roundtree v. Roundtree, 26 S. C. 450, 2 S. E. 474; Bank v. Garlington, 54 S. C. 413, 32 S. E. 513; Earle v. Maxwell, 86 S. C. 1, 67 S. E. 962. Therefore it did not affect the validity of the title of J. Q. Marshall that he acquired the interest of his brothers and sisters by devise and conveyance before the death of Mrs. Fair; having acquired all these contingent interests, upon the death of Mrs. Fair the legal title became complete in him.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

CARR v. MOUZON et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 2, 1910.)

1. EJECTMENT (§ 15*)—TITLE FROM COMMON SOURCE—PRIORITY OF DEEDS.

Where both parties claim from the same grantor, the older deed is entitled to priority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 59-62; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

2. REMAINDERS (§ 14*)—CONTINGENT REMAINDERS—ASSIGNMENT.

A contingent remainder is assignable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Remainders, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PREJUDICE.

Where, in an action to recover land, the issue was not whether plaintiff had been in possession for 20 years, but whether the possession for 20 years had been adverse, or was permissive, an instruction that plaintiff show 20 years' adverse possession in M. after conveyance of his interest in 1861, even if erroneous, was not prejudicial to plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4219-4224; Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 60*)—PERMISSIVE POSSESSION—PAPER TITLE.

On an issue whether the possession of M., under whom plaintiff claimed, was adverse or permissive, it was proper to charge that permissive possession could not avail against a paper title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 282-314; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 85*)—ASSERTION OF TITLE—DEED OR MORTGAGE.

The giving of a deed or mortgage by one in possession of land is ordinarily evidence of assertion of title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 244*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SINGLING OUT EVIDENCE.

The court did not err in refusing to single out and emphasize a particular portion of the evidence on the subject of adverse possession, in an action to recover land.

7. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 15*)—EXCLUSIVE POSSESSION—OUSTER.

A parol partition between tenants in common, and exclusive possession of one of the cotenants thereunder, is evidence of ouster from which adverse possession of the tenant who holds under such partition may begin against the others and ripen into a title.

8. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 85*)—PARTITION.

A parol partition between tenants in common and possession thereafter is only evidence of adverse possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 499*)—RECORD—VERBAL REQUEST TO CHARGE.

A verbal request to charge not shown by the record to have been made cannot be reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2295-2299; Dec. Dig. § 499.*]

10. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 104*)—PRESUMPTION OF GRANT.

Presumption of the acquisition of title by deed or grant arises from adverse possession for 20 years, and cannot arise from permissive possession however long continued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 595-602; Dec. Dig. § 104.*]

11. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 68*)—NATURE OF POSSESSION—STATUTES.

Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 101, provides that in every action to recover real property, or the possession thereof, the person establishing the legal title shall be presumed to have been in possession thereof within the time required by law; and the occupation of such premises by any other person shall be deemed to be in subordination to the legal title, unless it appears that such premises have been held and possessed adversely to such legal title for 10 years before the commencement of the action. Sections 102-105 require that possession, in order to be available as adverse, shall continue for 10 years under a claim of title. Held that, where an occupancy is a mere trespass without claim of title, it cannot ripen into a good title, however long continued.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Williamsburg County; T. S. Sease, Judge.

Action by W. H. Carr against S. R. Mouzon and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lee & Askins, for appellant. Kelly & Hinds, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action to recover possession of land. On the 2d day of July, 1860, L. W. Mouzon conveyed by quitclaim deed to his brothers John P. Mouzon, Dunkin K. Mouzon, and Samuel R. Mouzon all his right, title, and interest in two tracts of land in Williamsburg county referred to in the deed as lands "more particularly mentioned in the will of Samuel R. Mouzon, deceased," the father of grantor and grantees. This deed was recorded on May, 27, 1861. A tract of 245 acres, part of the land embraced in this deed, is the subject of controversy in this action. The defendants John P. Mouzon, Dunkin K. Mouzon, the grantees in this deed, and the other defendants, heirs of the grantee, Samuel R. Mouzon, are in possession of the land. The plaintiff claims through L. W. Mouzon by later conveyances as follows: (1) Deed of conveyance from L. W. Mouzon to B. B. Mouzon dated October 10, 1900, covering the tract of 245 acres except a small lot conveyed to a church; (2) mortgage of B. B. Mouzon to A. S. Coker dated October 9, 1907; (3) deed of conveyance from H. O. Britton, clerk, to the plaintiff, dated November 3, 1908, under a judgment of foreclosure under the above-stated mortgage.

If the cause depended on the paper title alone, the plaintiff could have no chance of recovery, because both parties claim through L. W. Mouzon, and it is not denied that the defendants have the older deed from him. Plaintiff's counsel, it is true, contended that the defendants had not acquired title from L. W. Mouzon because at the time he conveyed in 1860 he had, under the will of his father, only a contingent interest in the land. The will is not in the record, and the court cannot assume that the interest of L. W. Mouzon was contingent; but, even if such an assumption could be allowed, the result would be the same, for it is well settled that a contingent remainder is assignable. Allston v. Bank, 2 Hill, Eq. 235; Roundtree v. Roundtree, 26 S. C. 450, 2 S. E. 474; Bank v. Garlington, 54 S. C. 413, 32 S. E. 513; Earle v. Maxwell, 86 S. C. 1, 67 S. E. 962; Rembert v. Evans, 68 S. E. 659.

The plaintiff's case, then, depends upon evidence offered by him of adverse possession for a period of 10 years under the statute, or for 20 years from which a reconveyance to L. W. Mouzon from the holders of the title would be presumed. The evidence on both sides was clear to the effect that in 1876, after the execution of the deed of 1861 by which L. W. Mouzon conveyed to his brothers his interest in the lands devised by his father, there was a partition of the lands among all the brothers; that in the partition the tract in dispute was set apart to L. W. Mouzon; and that he remained in possession of it for more than 20 years before he sold to B. B. Mouzon. The practical issue was thus narrowed down to the inquiry whether the possession of L. W. Mouzon was adverse to his grantees who held the legal title, or in subordination to the legal title and merely permissive. On this issue the plaintiff proved that L. W. Mouzon asserted title in 1892 by executing a deed purporting to convey a lot to a church, and in 1898 by executing a mortgage to W. M. Kinder. In addition to this, there was strong parol evidence to the effect that L. W. Mouzon held the land as his own, in that he collected rents, sold timber, and spoke of the land as his own. On the other side the defendants S. R. Mouzon and D. K. Mouzon testified that the land devised was divided, and the tract in dispute set apart to L. W. Mouzon entirely as an act of kindness on the part of his brothers; the agreement being that by permission of the true owners he should have the use of it for his support. There was evidence from another witness that he had heard L. W. Mouzon say that the land belonged to his brothers. In reply H. H. Kinder, one of the persons who had made the division of the land by request of the brothers, testified that he heard nothing of any agreement that L. W. Mouzon was to hold the land assigned to him in subordination to the title of his brothers.

The exceptions to the charge are very numerous and elaborate; but from the above statement it will be obvious that the material inquiry is whether there was error in stating to the jury the law bearing on the subject of 10 years' adverse possession under the statute, and 20 years' adverse possession from which a grant is presumed, as distinguished from permissive possession in subordination to the legal title. Short reference to the numerous points made by the exceptions will be sufficient to show that there was no error in submitting the issue to the jury.

1. The instruction as to the effect of recording papers was in precise accord with the statute, and certainly did not convey the impression that the defendant was entitled to hold the land under the deed of 1861, without respect to the issue of adverse possession; for the charge as to the right to recover against the legal title on proof of adverse possession for the requisite period was several times repeated.

2. The charge was clear and explicit as to the difference between adverse possession for 10 years under the statute and adverse possession for 20 years which will presume a deed or a grant; but, even if the charge had required that the plaintiff must show 20 years' adverse possession in L. W. Mouzon after conveyance of his interest in 1861, the error would have been of no consequence, for the issue was not whether he had been in possession for 20 years, but whether the possession for 20 years was adverse or permissive.

3. There is no foundation for the exception that the charge was to the effect that the plaintiff could not recover on any adverse possession but his own. In the first request of the plaintiff given to the jury as the law, it was clearly stated that the plaintiff could recover on the possession of L. W. Mouzon adverse to the defendants. The issue being whether the possession of L. W. Mouzon was adverse or permissive, it was proper for the court, in connection with a similar request, to instruct the jury that permissive possession could not avail against the paper title. It is not perceived how this could be regarded a charge on the facts.

4. It is true that the giving of a deed or mortgage by one in possession of land is ordinarily evidence of the assertion of title, but it was not error for the court to refuse to single out and emphasize this portion of the evidence on the subject of adverse possession.

5. Parol partition between tenants in common and exclusive possession of one of the co-tenants thereunder is evidence of ouster, from which adverse possession of the tenant who holds under such partition may begin against the others and ripen into a title. Ewing v. Burnet, 11 Pet. 41, 9 L. Ed. 624; Few v. Killer, 63 S. C. 154, 41 S. E. 85; Green v. Cannady, 71 S. C. 317, 51 S. E. 92.

But even parol partition is only evidence of adverse possession. There was no request that the court should charge specifically on the effect of parol partition between tenants in common. Indeed, L. W. Mouzon, having conveyed away his interest, was not a tenant in common, and any charge on that subject would have been inapplicable. Regarding the setting apart of the land as a gift to him by his brothers, or as a partition by them waiving their rights under the deed of 1861, the question would then remain: What was the nature of the gift or the extent of the waiver? If the gift or the waiver was understood by the parties to extend only to the use of the land by L. W. Mouzon for his life, in subordination to the title he had made to his brothers, there could be no adverse possession. This issue was fully submitted to the jury.

6. Even if there were no other obstacle to the consideration of certain verbal requests to charge set out in the exceptions, it would be sufficient to say that the record does not show that such requests were made.

7. The presumption of the acquisition of title by deed or grant arises from adverse possession for 20 years; it cannot arise from permissive possession, however long continued. The circuit judge did not err in so charging. Trustees v. Meetze, 4 Rich. Law, 52; McClure v. Hill, 2 Mill, Const. 425; Trustees v. Jennings, 40 S. C. 180, 18 S. E. 257, 891, 42 Am. St. Rep. 854.

The remaining point is made by the following exception: "That his honor erred in charging the jury defendant's eighth request to charge, as follows: 'Where a party enters upon land and takes possession without claim of title, his acceptance is subservient to the paramount title, not adverse to it. It is nothing more than a trespass, and, no matter how long continued, can never ripen into a good title, and, where the occupant expressly disclaims title, he cannot, of course, acquire title by adverse possession. The claim must be of title or ownership in fee. A claim simply of an unexpired term of years is not in hostility to, but in accord with, the true title.' The error being that title by adverse possession is founded in trespass, and, in charging the jury that a trespass, 'no matter how long continued, can never ripen into a good title,' the court erred, and thereby excluded from its consideration the possession of L. W. Mouzon, prior to the date of his deed to B. B. Mouzon, and, in effect, told the jury that, if L. W. Mouzon's possession was founded in trespass, it could not ripen into a good title, and in so charging, it is submitted, the court erred."

Sections 102 to 105 of the Code of Civil Procedure clearly require that possession, to be available as adverse in an action for the recovery of real estate, shall continue for 10 years under a claim of title. The claim of title may be inferred from particular actions or the general course of conduct of the occupant in dealing with the land; it is not necessary to prove express notice to the owner of the claim of title. By section 101 of the Code of Procedure it is further enacted: "In every action for the recovery of real property, or the possession thereof, the person establishing a legal title to the premises shall be presumed to have been possessed thereof within the time required by law; and the occupation of such premises by any other person shall be deemed to have been under and in subordination to the legal title, unless it appear that such premises have been held and possessed adversely to such legal title for ten years before the commencement of the action."

It is therefore true, as said by the court, that an occupancy which is a mere trespass without claim of title cannot ripen into a good title. There was in this case no proof of any trespass whatever, for the witnesses on both sides testified that L. W. Mouzon under whom plaintiff claims was in possession of the land for 20 years; that he entered and remained in possession for 20 years with the full consent of the holders of the legal title in pursuance of a parol partition. If this possession after the partition was under a claim of L. W. Mouzon that the land was his own either by virtue of the parol partition or otherwise, then the plaintiff was entitled to recover. On the other hand, if the possession of L. W. Mouzon was not under a claim that the land was his own, but was in subordination to the legal title, the plaintiff could not recover. Examination of the entire case and analysis of the issues involved leads to the conviction that this issue was fairly submitted to the jury. The equitable issue as to the deed from L. W. Mouzon to B. B. Mouzon is not involved in the appeal.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

KENNEDY v. KENNEDY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. August 2, 1910.)

1. EXECUTION (§ 259*)—SALE OF LAND—REGULARITY—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where possession under an execution sale had been maintained for 20 years and the execution book showing the proceedings in the sheriff's office is missing, it will be presumed that all proceedings with reference to such sale were regular.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 740-742; Dec. Dig. § 259.*]

2. EXECUTION (§ 244*)—SALE OF LAND—REQUISITES—ENTERING A JUDGMENT.

Entering a judgment in the "abstract of judgments" is not a prerequisite to a valid sale of land thereunder; failure to do so being a mere irregularity of which no one but the defendant in the action in which the judgment was recovered can take advantage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 673-680; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

3. EXECUTION (§ 320*)—SHERIFF'S DEED—RECITALS.

In general, the recitals in a sheriff's deed that an execution was issued and that a levy made thereunder, is not evidence of the facts recited, except where there is privity between the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 940-945; Dec. Dig. § 320.*]

4. EXECUTION (§ 304*)—DEEDS—RECITALS—STATUTES.

Provisions of the Code relating to the effect of recitals in sheriffs' deeds, adopted March 1, 1870, were inapplicable to a deed based on an execution lodged in the sheriff's office on January 21st of that year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Dec. Dig. § 304.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 930*)—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where the testimony was susceptible of more than one inference, it cannot be successfully contended that the jury disregarded the character of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3757; Dec. Dig. § 930.*]

6. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 100*)—POSSESSION OF PART UNDER INVALID DEED—"AS BEING A CONVEYANCE OF THE PREMISES."

An instruction that possession of a part of a tract of land under a claim made under an invalid deed would give possession of the whole was correct, under Code Civ. Proc. § 102, providing that whenever the occupant, or those under whom he claims, entered under claim of title founded on a claim that a written instrument was a conveyance of the premises and there has been a continued possession of the premises included in such instrument, or some part thereof, under such claim for 10 years, the premises so included shall be deemed to have been held adversely; the words "as being a conveyance of the premises" indicating that the extent of the claim is not dependent on the validity of the instrument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 560-562; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ISSUES.

Where plaintiff's husband claimed title by adverse possession as well as through a sheriff's deed, a request to charge that if plaintiff failed to prove that the judgment debtor was the owner of the land in dispute when the alleged sale was made, then the sheriff's title to the purchaser conveyed no right, and the purchaser transmitted to his heirs no right in the land, and a subsequent conveyance of the tract to plaintiff's husband operated to convey to him no right, was properly refused as eliminating the issue of adverse possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 618-623; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGE ON FACTS.

A request to charge that in order to trace title claimed by plaintiff through the sheriff of C. district to plaintiff's husband, plaintiff was required to show that the defendant named in the execution and sheriff's deed was at the time of the alleged sale the owner of the land, and having failed to make such proof, plaintiff could take nothing by the sheriff's deed was properly refused as a charge on the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 439-441, 446-454, 456-466; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 159*)—WANT OF EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONS.

Under circuit court rule 77, an objection that there was no proof that plaintiff's deceased husband, under whom she claimed title, had paid any taxes on the land during his life should be made by motion for nonsuit, or the direction of a verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PREJUDICE.

Where, in an action to recover land, plaintiff testified that defendant K. cultivated the land by permission of her husband, since deceased, under whom she claimed, K. was not prejudiced by an instruction that if plaintiff's husband had title to the land either because he took possession in 1883, as plaintiff claimed, and held continuously from that time under some arrangement by which he was to redeem it from E., or because of his claiming it by adverse possession, or because of his deed in 1894 from E.'s heirs, if he had title of land, and defendant K. held the land in pursuance of such agreement, that would be holding it in subordination to the husband's title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4219, 4221-4224; Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Clarendon County; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Action by E. Maria Kennedy against Mary L. Kennedy and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant, H. A. Kennedy, appeals. Affirmed.

Exceptions referred to in the opinion are as follows:

1. Because the Honorable J. C. Klugh, presiding judge, erred in refusing the motion for a new trial, which was based upon the following ground: "That the jury disregarded the law as charged by the court, and rendered a verdict contrary thereto, in that the jury were charged: That in establishing title under a sheriff's deed it must appear that there was a valid judgment and execution, and that there was a levy and sale under the execution. That the judgment of Epps v. Kennedy was recovered in Williamsburg county, where debtor and creditor resided, and in order to make valid sale it must appear that the judgment was docketed in Clarendon county and execution issued thereon, and having been so charged, the jury were bound, as a matter of law and of fact, to have found that the judgment had never been docketed or filed in Clarendon county; for it appears from the recitals in the sheriff's deeds and from the proof that the judgment was never lodged in Clarendon county. Nevertheless, the jury disregarded the law so charged, and their verdict shows that it is based upon the finding of the validity of the sale under the Epps judgment, as there is no proof to support the verdict as to the title acquired by actual adverse possession of the whole, or of any possession of a part of the premises under a deed of conveyance, which would give title to the whole"—in that the charge to the jury, as recited in the motion for a new trial was the law of the case, by which the jury was governed, even though the law as so declared may be erroneous, and the jury disregarded such charge; for it appears, both negatively and affirmatively from the deeds of Gamble, acting sheriff, and Clark, sheriff, and from the other testimony, that the judgment recovered in Williamsburg county was never lodged or docketed in Clarendon county, and under the charge as delivered by the court, the jury should have so found, and the jury did not so find, and this is evidenced from the fact that in order to find a verdict for the entire premises, the jury must have found that it was a valid deed, for there is no evidence to support the verdict to the effect that title was acquired by actual adverse possession of the whole premises or of any possession of a part of the premises under a deed of conveyance which would give title to the whole; and the jury were charged that it was the theory of those claiming the land against H. A. Kennedy that their title came through David Epps, under the sheriff's deed, and that excluded the idea of any title from any other source; and it was error on the part of the circuit judge to let the verdict stand, as it was clearly contrary to the law as declared by him.

2. The presiding judge committed error in charging the jury as follows:

"Suppose that the sheriff's sale and the deed made in pursuance of that sheriff's sale was a nullity, yet the deed purports to designate by metes and bounds a tract of land and purports to convey that land to Epps. That becomes a description of the land, showing the extent of Epps' claim under the deed, so it becomes what we call color of title, and by way of writing that shows the extent of the party's claim under the deed, and if Epps took possession of that 200 acres of land under that deed or supposed deed, and held it continuously, either himself or by somebody that was holding it under him and in pursuance of some arrangement with him, if he held it continuously for twenty years from the date of that sheriff's deed, March 3, 1870, that would be sufficient to establish in Epps a title by adverse possession, as I told you a while ago. As the law now is, 10 years' adverse possession gives title, but in 1870 when this sale was alleged to have been made, it required 20 years.

"If it appears that Epps took possession of the land contained in that deed of Gamble, acting as sheriff, and held it continuously for 20 years, that would give title in him to all the land embraced in that deed now, by virtue of the sale, and by virtue of the bar of the statute of limitations; so if he had held the land for 20 years adversely and continuously, that forbids any other person to claim the land as against him. If he had title by conveyance from the sheriff and by the 20 years' adverse possession and died, and that title descended to his heirs, then the conveyance by those heirs to W. W. Kennedy in 1894 would confer upon W. W. Kennedy a good title to the land, and if that should be your conclusion, then the plaintiff must recover, unless there is something else to show that she has been ousted of her right to recover.

"You will observe then that the 20 years' possession from the date of the sheriff's deed in 1870, if it was adverse, whether Epps held it himself by hostile possession or permitted somebody else to hold it by some arrangement under him, would give him title. Only adverse holding would give him title by adverse possession. Under the statute, peaceable possession, whether he held it himself or by those living on the land who recognized his right superior to theirs, peaceable possession of the land 20 years would presume he held it because of a grant from the state, either to himself or to somebody else and the grant came to him, so if he held the land 20 years either peaceably or adversely, continuously, openly, and notoriously, and exclusively of everybody else's rights, even though he may have allowed other people to live there, if they lived there in recognition and in subordination of his rights, then that establishes in Epps the title which this plaintiff relies on, and that title passing to the plaintiff and her children by inheritance would inure to them now as a valid title, upon which they would be entitled to recover the land."

There was error in this charge, so given, in that there was no pretense, or claim on the part of the heirs of W. W. Kennedy or proof that David Epps or his heirs had ever been in possession of the land in question or any part of it for any time whatsoever, or that they ever claimed any part of it; on the contrary, the contention on the part of the heirs of W. W. Kennedy, now suing, was that W. W. Kennedy was in possession of the land in 1883, claiming it as his own, and the claimants based their claim before the jury upon such alleged possession.

There was error further in making reference to any party to this action holding land in subordination to the claim of David Epps or his heirs, in that there was no such claim put forward by the claimants or by H. A. Kennedy, and such charge so given as aforesaid, raised an issue before the jury which, it is respectfully submitted, had a tendency to confuse them and suggest that the land might have been so held, and to the prejudice of the defendant, H. A. Kennedy; and there being error further in this charge because it appeared affirmatively that W. W. Kennedy did not enter into possession of the premises in question, under claim of title, exclusive of any other right, founding such claim upon a written instrument, to wit: Of either the deeds of Gamble or Clark, acting sheriff and sheriff, respectively, or under a deed made to him by the heirs of David Epps; but, on the contrary, he claims to have gone into possession in 1883 and to have held the land independently of any of them; and in that it was a faulty proposition of law to charge the jury that the Code of Civil Procedure contemplated that a person could enter into possession under an invalid deed and by occupying a part of the premises, draw to such part the possession of the whole, it being respectfully submitted that the law does not so contemplate, and the charge is contrary to a proper construction of the statute.

3. There was error on the part of the circuit judge in charging the jury that if they found a verdict against H. A. Kennedy, it should be for the land in dispute, and this was several times done; in that it included the idea that if the plaintiff and her children recovered at all, that they were entitled to the entire premises; whereas, while claiming the entire premises, and while claiming under a deed and also by alleged possession, if they did not find that the plaintiff was entitled to the whole by virtue of a deed or by possession of the whole, but were entitled to a part, based upon actual adverse possession which excluded the idea of holding under a deed, then they would have been entitled only to so much as had been actually occupied by W. W. Kennedy and no more, and there was error in not so instructing the jury.

4. There was error on the part of the circuit judge in refusing to charge the third request of H. A. Kennedy, which was as follows: "That in order to trace the title claimed by plaintiff, through the sheriff of Clarendon district, to the said W. W. Kennedy, the plaintiff is required to show by competent testimony that the defendant named in the alleged execution and deed of sheriff, one J. M. Kennedy, was at the time of the alleged sale the owner of the said tract of land, and having failed to make such proof, the plaintiff can take nothing by the sheriff's deed to David Epps"—in that it contained a correct proposition of law, and should have been so charged; and further in saying that it had not for the last expression it would have been charged, which was virtually charging the request to the effect that title had to be shown in J. M. Kennedy, and having practically so held by refusing the request in its entirety on account of the last expression, there was error for the reason that title in J. M. Kennedy had not been proven, either by possession for so long a time as to give him title, and by attempt to connect him with any grant by any conveyance whatsoever by prescription or by adverse possession.

4. There was error on the part of the circuit judge in refusing to charge the fourth request, which was as follows: "That if the plaintiffs have failed to prove that the said J. M. Kennedy was the owner of the land in dispute at the time of the alleged sale by the sheriff, then the title by said sheriff to the said David Epps conveyed no right of ownership or right of possession of the said tract of land to the said David Epps; and that under such circumstances the said David Epps transmitted to his heirs at law no right or title in or to the said tract of land, and if they thereafter undertook to convey the said tract of land to the said W. W. Kennedy, such conveyance, operated to convey to the said W. W. Kennedy no right, title, or estate in or to the land in dispute"—in that it was a correct proposition of law and should have been charged, and the reasons given by the presiding judge for not charging it because there was no evidence that J. M. Kennedy had any title to the land which David Epps could acquire by the sheriff's deed, nor was there any evidence that he was ever in possession of the land or any part of it at all, and no such claim was made by the plaintiff and her children, and it was error to so hold.

5. There was error on the part of the presiding judge in refusing to charge the defendant's sixth request, which was as follows: "That if the jury find that the said H. A. Kennedy for 10 years antecedent to the commencement of this action was, and had been holding the said premises as his own, adversely to the claim set up by the plaintiff and those under whom she claims, then as against them under the law said H. A. Kennedy has acquired title to the land in dispute and which plaintiff cannot now disturb"—in that it contained a correct proposition of law and should have been so charged, and the reasons given by the presiding judge in refusing to charge it and particularly in holding that he must show an ouster or turning out of everybody else's right, title, and interest in the land; he being in the undisputed possession if he had held it as his own adversely against W. W. Kennedy for the required period, that was sufficient, as no one else was making any claim for the land except the heirs of W. W. Kennedy, and they had to show a better title before they could disturb H. A. Kennedy in his possession.

6. Because there was error in the refusal of the presiding judge to charge the 9th request of this defendant, which was as follows: "As a circumstance in favor of the defendant H. A. Kennedy's claim, the jury may take into consideration the fact, if so proved, of the payment by the said H. A. Kennedy of taxes on the disputed premises, and also the further fact, if such be the case, that no proof has been made that during his lifetime any taxes were paid by the said W. W. Kennedy on said premises"—as it contained a correct proposition of law and should have been so charged, and there was error in holding that there was a charge on the facts.

7. There was error on the part of the presiding judge in not charging the defendant's tenth request, which was as follows: "If W. W. Kennedy's claim to the land was not founded upon a written instrument, judgment, or decree, the parties now claiming the land could recover only so much of the land as was actually occupied, and no other; and in order to so recover, it must appear that W. W. Kennedy had been in the actual, continual occupation, under claim of title, exclusive of any other right, for a period of 10 years; and the jury would have to locate the land, if they so found"—in that it was a correct proposition of law and should have been charged as requested, and in referring thereto, his honor committed further error in holding that if W. W. Kennedy claimed all the land named in any one of the deeds, even though it might not have been a valid deed, yet showing the extent of his claim as color of title, and if he claimed all of the land and showed possession of any particular part of it, any foot of it, under the law was possession of all that was included in the boundaries named in the deed, in that there was no evidence that W. W. Kennedy made any such claim under any of the deeds put in evidence, or that he went into possession under any such deed or founded his claim to possession or claimed thereunder, and it was error to instruct the jury that possession of a part under a claim made under an invalid deed would give possession of the whole, as a person can take no rights whatsoever under an invalid deed.

8. There was error on the part of the presiding judge in not charging the request to charge, which is as follows: "There is no execution and no transcript of execution as a part of the record from Williamsburg county, and hence there is no evidence of a levy and a failure to show the levy, or the search for the execution and its laws, renders the sale under the sheriff's deed void"—as the same contained a correct proposition of law, and it should have been so charged, and was in accordance with the undisputed facts, and it was the duty of the court to have inspected the records and to have instructed the jury that there was an absence from the records of any execution or any reference to it which purported to be a copy or transcript of it; that there was an absence of any evidence of levy and there could not have been any proof lawfully made until there had been proven a search for the execution and inability to find it, and this was not done, and, as a matter of law, was the province and duty of the presiding judge to have construed the records of the judgment sent from Williamsburg, and not to have left anything to the jury to have found in reference thereto, save under his instructions.

9. Because the presiding judge erred further in charging as follows: "As a matter of course, if there was an agreement, if W. W. Kennedy had title to this land, either because he took possession in 1883, as plaintiff claims, and held it continuously from that time under some arrangement by which he was to redeem it from the Eppses, or because of his claiming it by adverse possession, or else because of his deed in 1894, from the Epps heirs if he had title to the land * * * and H. A. Kennedy held the land in pursuance of such agreement, that would be holding it in subordination to W. W. Kennedy's title"—in that it was a charge upon the facts in reference to the possession of W. W. Kennedy in 1883, in the manner above set forth.

10. There was error on the part of the circuit judge in charging the jury as follows: Referring to the claim of H. A. Kennedy and stating that if he claimed the land as his by right of possession, he must show a definite time at which he began to hold the land exclusive of everybody else, and that he had held it continuously from that time until the commencement of the action, or until a sufficient time to ripen into a title in himself—in that if it appeared that he held the land exclusively and adversely as against W. W. Kennedy for the requisite period, that would give him title as against the present claimants.

The court in response to defendant's fourth request to charge stated that it was denied because the proposition excluded the idea that David Epps may have acquired title to the land either by the sheriff's deed, or, if that was a nullity, then by possession of the land for 20 years or more, and excluding that idea, was not a sound proposition.

Purdy & O'Bryan, for appellant. J. H. Lesesne, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This action was commenced, on the — day of — 1908, for the purpose of having the lands described in the complaint sold, to aid in the support and education of the defendants, Mary L., Samuel M., Flora J., and Robert Clarence Kennedy, infant children of the plaintiff, and her late husband, W. W. Kennedy, who died on the 12th of June, 1905. The defendant H. A. Kennedy, a brother of W. W. Kennedy, filed an answer denying that the plaintiff and her children were the owners of the premises, and set up the defenses that he had been in possession of the land for 10 years, holding it adversely, and that he had been in the unobstructed possession thereof, before the commencement of the action, for 20 years, holding it as his own.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and her children for the land in dispute.

The defendant H. A. Kennedy made a motion for a new trial, which was refused, and he appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported. We proceed to consider them.

First exception:

The plaintiff introduced: (1) Deed from P. D. Epps, D. J. Epps, and M. E. Epps, heirs at law of David Epps, to W. W. Kennedy, dated the 19th of October, 1894, conveying the land in dispute; (2) deed from James M. Gamble, coroner of Clarendon county, acting sheriff, to David Epps, dated 7th of March, 1870, conveying the same land, in which deed the following recital appears: "Whereas, by virtue of a writ of fieri facias, issued out of the court of common pleas for the county of Williamsburg, tested the 16th of November, 1867, and returnable according to law, to me directed and lodged in my office, on the 26th of January, 1870, commanding me, the goods, chattels, houses, lands, and other hereditaments and real estates of Jno. M. Kennedy, to levy the sum of —, which David Epps, by the judgment of the said court at Williamsburg courthouse, lately recovered against the said Jno. M. Kennedy—I have levied upon a certain tract of land, in the county of Clarendon aforesaid;" (3) deed from William J. Clark, sheriff of Clarendon county, confirming the deed of James M. Gamble, coroner (acting sheriff), to David Epps, dated 27th of March, 1871, conveying the same land, and containing the same recital; (4) certified copy of judgment roll, in the clerk's office of Williamsburg county, showing judgment recovered in 1867, by David Epps against Jno. M. Kennedy, to which reference was made in said deeds.

Before the plaintiff introduced in evidence the judgment roll from Williamsburg county, the clerk of the court and the sheriff of Clarendon county testified that there was no record of the execution under which the land was sold to be found in Clarendon, in their respective offices; that many of the books of record of the clerk's office, and the sheriff's office, were lost or destroyed about the time said property was sold under execution, in 1870 and 1871; the Republican Party being in power at that time. The sheriff testified that the execution book in his office, covering that period was missing, and that an execution coming from Williamsburg county to that office would properly be entered in the execution book; that there was no evidence of the sale by the sheriff in the salebook from May, 1870, to October, 1878. A. L. Barron, clerk of the court, testified as follows, upon cross-examination: "Q. You have an index to the abstracts? A. Yes, sir. Q. And the rolls? A. Yes, sir. Q. Those old indexes are there, are they not? A. Yes, sir. Q. Covering this period we are talking about? A. Yes, sir. Q. Going from that period, say 1865 and 1866, and coming to 1872, on those indexes, or directing the course of judgments, did you find any entry whatsoever of any judgment of Epps against Kennedy? A. No, sir. Q. I have reference to judgment which was referred to in the sheriff's deed? A. No, sir; I did not. Q. Did you find the evidence of entry of any such judgment on the abstract of judgments? A. No, sir."

There was testimony tending to prove that W. W. Kennedy (who was a son of said Jno. M. Kennedy) went into possession of the land in 1883, and held it continuously and adversely from that time until his death on the 12th of June, 1905. His honor, the presiding judge, charged that all proceedings must be presumed to be regular; and the appellant's attorneys in their argument say that there can be no fault found with this proposition.

It is especially applicable to this case, as W. W. Kennedy claimed the land for more than 20 years. Corbett v. Fogle, 72 S. C. 312, 51 S. E. 884; Smith v. Libby, MSS. Dec. 2 Rice's Dig. 328, cited in Sheriff v. Welborn, 14 S. C. 480.

The entering of the judgment in the book of "abstract of judgments" was not a prerequisite to a valid sale, as a failure in this respect is a mere irregularity, of which no one but the defendant in the action, in which the judgment was recovered, has the right to take advantage. Mason v. Killough Music Co., 45 S. C. 11, 22 S. E. 755.

There was testimony tending to show that H. A. Kennedy was in privity with W. W. Kennedy, and those under whom he claimed; the plaintiff having testified that H. A. Kennedy cultivated a portion of the land, for the support of his father and mother, by permission of W. W. Kennedy. The general rule is that recitals in a sheriff's deed, to the effect that an execution was issued, and that a levy was made thereunder, are not evidence of the facts so recited. Sheriff v. Welborn, 14 S. C. 480. But where there is privity between the parties, the recitals are admissible for the purpose of proving such facts. Brown v. Moore, 26 S. C. 160, 2 S. E. 9. Therefore the recitals in the foregoing deeds were evidence of the facts therein stated.

Furthermore, the provisions of the Code which was adopted on the 1st of March, 1870, were inapplicable to this case, as one of the deeds shows that the execution was lodged in the sheriff's office on the 21st of January, 1870, and the other, that it was lodged on the 26th of January, 1870, which was a compliance with the requirements of the law at that time. Acts of 1791 (7 St. at Large, p. 262, § 5) and 1799 (7 St. at Large, p. 294, § 4); Harrison v. Maxwell, 2 Nott & McC. 347, 10 Am. Dec. 611; Holloway v. Birtwhistle, 2 Nott & McC. 350 (note); Woodward v. Hill, 3 McCord, 241; Walton v. Dickerson, 4 Rich. Law, 568; Warren v. Jones, 9 S. C. 288; Harrison v. Mfg. Co., 10 S. C. 278.

It cannot be successfully contended that the jury disregarded the charge of his honor, the presiding judge, when, as in this case, the testimony was susceptible of more than one inference. This exception is overruled.

Second, third, and seventh exceptions:

The practical question presented by these exceptions is, whether there was error on the part of the presiding judge, "to instruct the jury that possession of a part under a claim, made under an invalid deed, would give possession of the whole." In ruling upon the request set out in the seventh exception, the presiding judge said: "That it is a correct statement of the law based upon a claim, where there is no writing showing the extent of the claim, but as I have charged you, if W. W. Kennedy claimed all the land named in any one of those deeds, even though the deed may not have been a valid deed, yet showing the extent of his claim as color of title, and if he claims all of the land and showed possession of any particular part of it, any foot of it, that under the law was possession of all that was included in the boundaries named in the deed, and I so charge you."

Section 102 of the Code is as follows: "Whenever it shall appear that the occupant, or those under whom he claims, entered into possession of the premises, under claim of title, founding such claim upon a written instrument, as being a conveyance of the premises in question, and that there has been a continued occupation and possession of the premises, included in such instrument, or of some part of such premises, under such claim for ten years, the premises so included, shall be deemed to have been held adversely." The words "as being a conveyance of the premises," show that the extent of the occupant's claim, founded on an instrument of writing, is not dependent upon the validity of such instrument; otherwise there would have been no necessity for this section of the Code. There is a material difference between proving a deed, as a part of a chain of title, and introducing a paper to show the extent of a party's possession. Allen v. Johnson, 2 McMul. 495. The ruling of the presiding judge is fully sustained by Wood on Limitation of Actions, page 529 et seq. These exceptions are overruled.

Fourth, fourth (No. 2), fifth, sixth, and eighth exceptions:

There are two exceptions numbered "4"; we have therefore marked one of them "No. 2." The reasons assigned by the presiding judge, in ruling upon the requests mentioned in said exceptions, are satisfactory to this court, and show that they cannot be sustained.

There is another reason why the request mentioned in the sixth exception was objectionable: Rule 77 of the circuit court is as follows: "The point that there is no evidence to support an alleged cause of action shall be first made by a motion for nonsuit, or a motion to direct the verdict." The point that "no proof has been made that during his lifetime any taxes were paid by the said W. W. Kennedy on the premises," should have been made by motion for nonsuit, or the direction of a verdict.

Ninth exception:

As hereinbefore stated, Mrs. Kennedy, the plaintiff, testified that H. A. Kennedy cultivated the land by permission of W. W. Kennedy. If so, this testimony tended to show that H. A. Kennedy held in subordination to the title of W. W. Kennedy; and we fail to see wherein the charge was prejudicial to the rights of the appellant.

Eleventh exception:

The appellant's attorneys, in their argument, state that their remarks with reference to the fifth exception are applicable to the question presented by this exception. We do not deem it necessary to assign other reasons than those mentioned in disposing of the fifth exception. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

TUCKER v. GAINES.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 2, 1910.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 346*)—ACTION—VARIANCE.

Where plaintiff sued on a writing received from defendant, and alleged a contract existing between him and defendant, he could not recover on the theory that the contract was one made by plaintiff with a third person for plaintiff's benefit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1718-1753; Dec. Dig. § 346.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 187*)—CONSTRUCTION—RIGHT TO SUE.

Defendant wrote plaintiff, "I have agreed to take up" B.'s papers "due you when he moves or when he gathers his crop with you." Held, that such instrument imported an agreement with B., and did not confer on plaintiff a right of action against defendant, except on proof that it was made for plaintiff's benefit, in which event plaintiff would be bound by all the terms of the agreement between defendant and B.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Pickens County.

Action by J. B. Tucker against B. G. Gaines. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bonham, Watkins & Allen, for appellant.
J. P. Carey, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. In 1906, L. H. Brownlee, while a tenant on plaintiff's plantation, became indebted to him in the sum of $205 for a mule, for which plaintiff held his note and a mortgage on the mule. He was also in debt to plaintiff for advances made during the year, to secure which plaintiff held liens on his crop and a mortgage on his cow. On settlement, it was found he owed plaintiff $366.48. Brownlee having agreed with defendant to move to his place, defendant wrote plaintiff, on Nov. 14, 1906, as follows: "Dear Sir: I have agreed to take up one L. H. Brownlee's papers due you when he moves or when he gathers his crop with you. You can come up and transfer me your papers. Trust this will be satisfactory." Brownlee moved to defendant's place, carrying with him the mule and cow and, perhaps, some of his crop. On December 22, 1906, plaintiff tendered to defendant Brownlee's papers, duly assigned to defendant, and demanded payment of the amount due thereon. Defendant refused, stating that he had agreed with Brownlee to take up only the mule debt, and this he offered to do. Plaintiff then brought this action, alleging a contract between himself and defendant whereby defendant agreed to pay Brownlee's indebtedness to him. The judgment below was for defendant.

As the action was brought on an alleged contract between plaintiff and defendant, plaintiff cannot recover upon the theory that a contract was made by defendant with Brownlee for his benefit, because that is not the contract sued on. And, moreover, in that view of the case, it would be necessary for plaintiff to prove such a contract, and he would be bound by all its terms. There is no testimony, outside of defendant's letter, tending to show that he agreed with Brownlee to do more than take up the mule debt, and it is admitted that he offered to do that. Therefore it is necessary to consider only whether the letter evidences a contract between plaintiff and defendant.

We think the proper construction of the letter is that it merely informed plaintiff that defendant had agreed to take up Brownlee's papers. The words, "I have agreed," clearly refer to an agreement already made, but not with plaintiff, for it was admitted that there had been no prior agreement or negotiation between plaintiff and defendant; and the only agreement of which there was any testimony was the one with Brownlee. Clearly, therefore, that was the agreement to which the defendant's letter had reference. It was therefore not an agreement with plaintiff, and affords him no cause of action, unless, as we have said, he can show that it was made for his benefit; and, in that event, he would be bound by all the terms of the agreement between defendant and Brownlee.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by Moore Murphy against the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railway Company for personal injury. Plaintiff was nonsuited, and he appeals. Reversed.

McCullough & Blythe, for appellant. Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an appeal from an order of nonsuit.

The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions raised by the exceptions, are as follows: "That on April 24, 1908, plaintiff was employed as yard switchman in defendant's yards at Greenville, S. C., and had been employed in such capacity for about three years. That on said date plaintiff was ordered by his superior officer to assist in shifting certain cars, consisting of five box cars in the yards of defendant at Greenville, S. C., for the purpose of placing two of said cars next to the engine upon the 'bad order' track for certain repairs. That in order to accomplish this, three of said cars had to be moved further up track No. 6, upon which track said engine and cars were then being operated. That in order to move the said cars, defendant, its agents and servants required on this occasion the said cars to be 'kicked'; that is, to be backed at a high rate of speed for the purpose of imparting to the three cars to be 'kicked' a sufficient momentum to carry them to the desired point, and at the proper time it was expected that they should be cut loose. That plaintiff was on the car farthest from the engine, ready to put on brakes at the proper time, to stop the cars when 'kicked,' as he was ordered and directed to do, when suddenly, without any notice of warning to him, and while the three cars were still attached to the engine and other cars, the said engine suddenly stopped, and plaintiff was violently thrown from said car to the ground between the rails, and said cars ran over his body. That plaintiff's injuries were due to the negligence of defendant, its servants and agents, in requiring said cars to be shifted in this manner; in stopping said engine in such a sudden manner, while the three cars to be shifted were still attached thereto, and in not cutting them loose, so that they might continue south, of their own momentum; by furnishing a defective coupler on the car attached to the engine, and from which the three cars to be shifted were to be cut loose; in not properly inspecting said appliances, so as to see that they were sufficient and adequate for the purpose intended, and in not providing plaintiff a safe place to do the work required of him, and appliances sufficient to do said work; all of which contributed to his injury as the proximate cause thereof."

The defendant denied the allegations of negligence and set up the defense of assumption of risk.

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, on the following grounds: "1. That the plaintiff's injuries were due to the risks of his employment, which he had assumed. 2. That plaintiff's injuries were due to the risks of the peculiar service in which he was engaged at the time, the danger of which he well knew. 3. That plaintiff's injuries were due to the negligence of a fellow servant. 4. That there is no testimony tending to show actionable negligence on the part of the defendant, in the matter of the alleged defect to coupling apparatus." The motion was sustained, and the nonsuit granted on said grounds; thereupon the plaintiff appealed.

The first question that will be considered is whether there was any testimony tending to show negligence on the part of the defendant.

The plaintiff testified as follows: "When you talk about 'kicking' cars, what do you mean? You give a kick signal to the engineer, and he does the rest. What does he do, stop his engine? No, sir; he runs his engine. He runs it slow, or how? He runs it fast. What did you mean when the signal is given to kick cars, what does the engine do? He comes ahead with a fast rate of speed, and when it goes far enough, they give a cut-down signal, and the engine stops then. Suddenly? As quick as he can. Then what is done after the engine stops? He backs back. What is done with the cars? The cars go on up, after they are cut off. What other way is there to get cars upon that track? Take and shove them up in there, and cut them off and put the brakes on, and back in and back out. You can shove them in how? Without kicking them. That is without going so fast? Yes, sir. On this occasion, what did the conductor do? He said he was going to kick three cars in on No. 6 track, and he told me to ride them in there, and not to let them hit the other cars. What rate of speed did the cars attain when he kicked them? Twelve or fifteen miles an hour. While the cars were going that way, what did the conductor do?

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

He gave the engineer a cut-down signal. Did you see him give the cut-down signal to the engineer? Yes, sir. What was the engineer supposed to do when he received that signal? He was supposed to stop his engine as quick as he could. And what did the engineer do? He stopped his engine as quick as he could, and they failed to cut the cars off, and I was jerked off of the car. Cross-examination: You were relying upon the brakeman—what was his name? Hayes. You were relying upon him, to cut the cars off, so that there would be no sudden stopping of the cars? I knew if he cut them off, there would be no sudden stopping. You were sitting there, or standing there, in the position that you have described to the jury, relying upon this brakeman to cut off the cars, so there would be no abrupt stopping of them? Yes, sir. And your opinion is that his failing to do that caused the car you were on to stop suddenly? No, sir; the engine did it. Well, the engine stopped it? Yes, sir. And if the cars had been cut off, you would not have fallen off? I would not have been jerked off. You say you have never known a car to fail to uncouple, and in your opinion it is not a frequent and daily occurrence, known to all of you, that in kicking those cars, they would fail to disconnect, by either not raising the lever high enough, or by raising it too high? No, sir. If they are in good order, they will cut loose. Redirect examination: You stated awhile ago, if something had been in good order, that it would not have done what it did. What do you mean by that? In cutting off the cars, if the lock pin in there had been in good order, it would not have happened. (Objected to by counsel for defendant. He alleges that the defect was in the coupler. Let him prove that. Objection overruled.) When you said if something had been in good order, that it would have uncoupled, did you refer to the brakes or the coupler? The coupler."

Rule 393 in reference to conductors, was introduced in evidence, and is as follows: "They must not allow running or flying switches to be made, where it can be avoided, and when unavoidable, such movements must be made with all the care necessary to absolutely prevent accident."

W. A. Hayes thus testified: "Just explain to the jury how this thing occurred, so far as your observation extended. Well, sir, we were kicking three cars in on No. 6 track. The conductor gave me orders to cut off three cars, and when they were backed in there, I raised the cut-off lever, and it failed to cut off. And then there is a pin here that goes through the couplers? Yes, sir. And then there is a little chain fastened to an iron rod here, and comes out this way, and the lever is here, at the side of the car? Yes, sir. And when you want to uncouple the cars, you lift up that lever, and that brings up the pin, and the couplers are supposed to fly open, and the cars uncouple? Yes, sir. Where were you? On the side of the car. You say you were stationed at the side of the car, for the purpose of cutting it loose, when you got the signal? Yes, sir. Did you get the signal? Yes, sir. What did you do? I jerked the lever up. What were the cars supposed to do then? To come uncoupled. Did they come uncoupled? No, sir. What was the result? I raised the latch spring too high. What was done? Mr. Murphy was jerked from the top of the coal car. What is that (presenting coupling pin)? That is something like a latch pin. Is that a pin that moves up and down? Yes, sir; something like that. What kind of a coupler was it that you had? Climax, I think. What is this for? That works in a little notch back in there. I think that maybe it catches it and holds it. How? To lift it up higher. That is, to keep it from coming too high? Yes, sir; I suppose so. If it is in good condition, what will it do? I suppose it would have to cut loose, if it had been in good condition. Suppose that is wrong (indicating), what would take place? I don't know how bad it would have to be worn to lift it too high. It would have to be worn a good deal for this to come out through there. If it is worn, what will take place? If it is worn, it wouldn't work so well, if it is worn bad. What would it do when you lift it up, if it is worn? Well, I don't think the cars would come uncoupled, if it is worn bad. You don't think the cars would come uncoupled? No, sir; it would raise too high. Did you examine that coupler? No, sir; I did not examine it at all. Those couplers are what are called automatic couplers? Yes, sir."

C. J. Bull testified as follows: "By reason of your experience, are you familiar with this coupling pin (presenting same)? Yes, sir; pretty familiar with it. Explain to the jury there just how that coupler is constructed, and how they are presumed to work, when in good condition? If they are in good condition, when you lift the lever they should cut at once, and there should be no hanging in that at all, if it is in a proper condition, and when you lift the lever they will uncouple. What is that? That is a climax lock pin. Where does that work? In the bottom of the drawhead. What does it do? It is to hold the pin; to keep it from coming out too far, and this too. Now suppose that is in good condition, and that is in good condition (indicating) when you raise the lever, what would happen? It would come uncoupled. Suppose when you raise the lever it comes too high, so it won't uncouple, where is the defect? It is either in this, or in this, when it comes too high. Either one; it is defective (indicating on pin). The defect would be either in this or this (indicating)? Yes, sir; or this. When the defect is in this or this, it will raise too high, and this catches the knuckles, and keeps it from cutting loose. It comes up and slips into the drawhead and catches the knuckles. Instead of coming up straight? Yes, sir; and stopping at the proper place; this comes into the drawhead and catches the knuckles. If that pin was in good condition, what would it do when you raised the lever? It would uncouple. When you jerked this by the knuckles, it is supposed to open here. Cross-examination: As I understand you, there are three places in one of those pins that might wear too much to lift sufficient; two of them there, and that little knot there? It might wear a little at this point? Yes, sir. And it might wear at the knot in the middle sufficiently to lift it too high? Yes, sir. And then it wouldn't uncouple? Yes, sir. And then what else? This here (indicating). At the toe there? Yes, sir. It might wear enough at the toe to make it come too high? Yes, sir. How about here at the back of the top? I don't suppose that could wear too much, if that didn't break off. If it didn't break off, it couldn't come too high. How about the heel? If that would break, it would come too high. There are three places, the knot in the middle, the toe and the back here? Yes, sir. Suppose the chain should break? It wouldn't uncouple then. How would you tell it had worn sufficiently to raise too high? That would be the only way; by lifting it. That would be by lifting at it to see? Yes, sir. The only safe test would be by lifting it? Yes, sir."

W. M. Logan thus testified: "What is that (presenting lock pin)? That is a lock pin. What is that used for? For holding the knuckles in the drawhead. It is used for holding the knuckles in the drawhead, and letting it loose in coupling and uncoupling. It is used for holding the knuckles and letting them loose, in coupling and uncoupling? Yes, sir. What is this here (indicating on coupler)? I call the whole thing the lock pin. Do you know what that is for, that lip? It is to keep it from coming out of the drawhead there. That foot on the lower part? Yes, sir. What is this for, and what is this for (indicating)? That works in a slot in there, and that works somewhere in there. I don't know just where; I never examined it. Do you know what it is intended for? It is intended to hold it in place, and make it couple and uncouple. Suppose that lock pin is in good condition, and it is coupled, and you turn that crank, what would it do? It would uncouple, in my opinion. Suppose these are worn thin, or that, or this (indicating), what is the result? It lets that come up too far, and catch the knuckles. In other words, I want you to give your opinion to that jury, whether or not this coupler in good condition, and with this lock pin in proper condition, when you raise that lever, would it uncouple? Yes, sir, that is my opinion. Can you raise it too high, if it is in a proper condition? No, sir, I don't think so. If the couplers are in good condition, and you raise this crank, or lever, what will happen? It will cut loose. When you drop it, what will happen? They will come together. By simply raising that lever? Yes, sir."

We see no difference in principle between this case and that of Gilliland v. Railway, 86 S. C. 137, 68 S. E. 186. In that case, the coupler failed to connect the cars, while in the present case the coupler failed to disconnect them. In each case the question of negligence depended upon circumstantial evidence, which was similar in its nature. The exceptions raising this question, are therefore sustained.

The next question that will be considered is, whether the testimony showed that the plaintiff assumed the risks that caused his injury. The testimony was susceptible of more than one inference; there was error in refusing to submit this question to the jury.

The next question to be determined is whether the testimony showed that the injury resulted from the negligence of a fellow servant. The only reference which the appellant's attorneys, in their argument, have made to this question, is as follows: "Hayes said in his testimony that he had pulled the lever up too high, and that it was his fault in doing so." This portion of his testimony must be considered in connection with his entire testimony, which shows that this question should have been submitted to the jury.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

WOODS and HYDRICK, JJ., concur in the result.

(86 S. C. 428)

NAPIER v. MATHESON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 26, 1910.)

1. TRIAL (§ 253*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action to recover a parcel of land in a tract, there was evidence that plaintiff's grantor had acquired title by adverse possession before he executed a deed to plaintiff, a charge that plaintiff had shown that he had title to not over four-sixths of the land embraced in the tract, and that he was in possession of more than that proportion and could not recover the balance, and the verdict must be for defendant, was properly refused, because ignoring the evidence of title of plaintiff's grantor by adverse possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 613-623; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

2. EJECTMENT (§ 110*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action to recover possession of one-eighth of an acre of a tract, plaintiff put in a paper title to four-sixths of a 4½-acre tract, under deeds from four of the six children of the deceased owner of the tract, and there was evidence that one of the children had acquired title by adverse possession before the execution of the deed to plaintiff conveying the land in dispute, a charge that plaintiff had shown title to four-sixths of the land claimed, and that if the child alleged to have acquired title by adverse possession had not obtained the title of the two of the children who did not join in the conveyance to plaintiff, the jury could only find for plaintiff for four-sixths of the land in dispute, etc., was not erroneous, as leading the jury to believe that they could but find for plaintiff for at least four-sixths of the one-eighth acre.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 319-326; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—INSTRUCTIONS—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for the possession of one-eighth of an acre of land, the jury found for plaintiff for the land in dispute, a charge was not open to the objection that it led the jury to believe that they could do nothing but find for plaintiff for four-sixths of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4225-4228; Dec. Dig. § 1068.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 229*)—ADMISSIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, in an action to recover one-eighth of an acre of land embraced in a $4\frac{1}{2}$ -acre tract, plaintiff presented a deed from four of the six children of the deceased owner who had been in possession for over 30 years and there was evidence that one of the four children had been in possession for 11 years, the testimony of one of the two children who did not make any conveyance that the child in possession had acquired title by adverse possession was admissible, as against defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 822, 825; Dec. Dig. § 229.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGE ON THE FACTS.

Where, in an action to recover land, defendant set up title by adverse possession dating from the time he had inclosed the land by a fence, a charge that it was for the jury to determine when the fence was built and that if it had been there for 10 years, and defendant had held the land for that time, his title was good, etc., was not a charge on the facts, in violation of the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 413, 439-466; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 353*)—DOCUMENTS—ADMISSIBILITY—PLATS.

In an action to recover possession of land, a plat of the land in dispute, made after the bringing of the action without notice to defendant, is admissible in evidence over the objection of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1500-1508; Dec. Dig. § 353.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County.

Action by C. D. Napier against A. J. Matheson for the recovery of the possession of one-eighth of an acre of land. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following are the exceptions of defendant:

1. His honor erred in not charging defendant's fourth request, to wit: "That the plaintiff has shown affirmatively that he has title to not over four-fifths of the land embraced in tract No. 4, and that he is in the exclusive possession of more than that proportion and cannot recover the balance, and the verdict must be for the defendant" when the proposition requested correctly stated the law applicable to the case before the jury.

2. His honor erred in charging the jury that the plaintiff had shown paper title to four-sixths of the land and was entitled to recover at least that much, when the title shown was to a larger tract of which the part in question was less than the two-sixths not shown, as stated in the complaint, and defendant's holding it was not only entirely consistent with plaintiff's paper title shown, but plaintiff did not show paper title to any part of the two-sixths interest as charged.

3. His honor erred in charging the jury that if Mrs. McMillan had not gotten the title of A. A. and W. D. Rogers, they could only find for plaintiff four-sixths of the land in dispute; the error being that this was a charge practically that he had shown title to four-sixths of the land in dispute, when it appeared by the complaint and the undisputed testimony that the part claimed by the defendant was much less than the shares of either of A. A. and W. D. Rogers, and title to no part of that was shown.

4. His honor erred in charging the jury that they could decide whether W. D. Rogers had conceded the land to belong to Mrs. McMillan and made no claim to it; the error being that it was not a question between Mrs. McMillan and W. D. Rogers, and that any concession as to the ownership of the land by him was no evidence against, and was not admissible to disprove, the title of a third party in possession. (2) That it was the duty of plaintiff to show affirmatively a complete title in himself, good against the world, to the particular land in question, before he could recover the possession thereof from the defendant.

5. His honor erred in charging the jury: "The thing for the jury to say is, When was this fence put there? and you might say that is the pivotal point in this case. If it was there for 10 years before 1906, and Matheson held it for these 10 years, his title is good. If it was put there any time short of 10 years, it does not avail him. That is all there is in the case;" the error being that it was a charge on the facts of the case, and it was an intimation by the judge of his opinion that the question of the statute of limitation was the pivotal fact in the case an elimination of the other defenses of the defendant.

6. His honor erred in charging the jury that a verdict of four-sixths of the land described in the complaint might be brought in when there was no testimony on which such a verdict could have been based, and the charge was injurious to defendant and confusing to the jury.

7. His honor erred in not directing a verdict in plaintiff's favor, when plaintiff proved himself, and it was undisputed, that A. A. Rogers had had one-fifth interest in the $4\frac{1}{2}$ -acre tract, more than the defendant was in the possession of, and there was no evidence whatever that plaintiff had ever acquired his title.

8. His honor erred in not setting aside the verdict and not granting a new trial when it was undisputed "that the plaintiff had shown affirmatively that he had title to not over four-fifths of the land embraced in tract No. 4, and that he was the exclusive possessor of more than that proportion, and the verdict should have been for the defendant.

9. His honor erred in admitting, over objection of defendant, a plat of the land in dispute, when it appeared that it was made after the beginning of the action, and without notice thereof to the defendant.

10. The court erred in charging the jury as follows: "When did Mrs. McMillan go into possession of the land? When did she go out of possession? Her deed to Napier is dated 1st of February, 1904. She was in possession of the land for over 11 years, and did she hold it for 11 years as her own, using it as her own against her brothers, A. A. and W. D. Rogers; did she hold it against them and use it for herself for 11 years? If she did and they were of age, and all the parties were of age, that would give him a good title against them." It being a charge on the facts in violation of the Constitution and error of law in that it charged that possession of one co-tenant for more than 10 years will bar a co-tenant who is out of possession, whereas it takes 20 years to oust a co-tenant.

Townsend & Rogers, for appellant. Stevenson, Matheson & Stevenson, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This action was commenced on the — day of July, 1906, to recover the possession of a lot or parcel of land, containing about one-eighth of an acre. "At the conclusion of the testimony the defendant moved the court to direct a verdict in his favor on the ground that the plaintiff had shown title only to four-sixths of the large $4\frac{1}{4}$ -tract, and that no title whatever had been shown to the remaining one-third of the tract, which was more than the amount defendant was in possession of, which motion was refused." The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported.

First, seventh, and eighth exceptions: These exceptions must be overruled for the reason that if his honor, the presiding judge, had charged the request embodied in the first exception, he would have taken from the jury the consideration of the question whether Mrs. McMillan, plaintiff's grantor, had acquired title by adverse possession before she executed a deed, conveying the land to the plaintiff.

Second and third exceptions: In discussing these exceptions, the appellant's attorneys say: "The only land in dispute was the one-eighth acre described in the complaint; yet his honor charged throughout that the plaintiff had shown title to four-sixths of the land claimed by the plaintiff, and therefore the jury, under his charge, could do nothing but find for the plaintiff at least four-sixths of the one-eighth acre." In the first place, when the charge is considered in its entirety, there is no reasonable ground for supposing that it would mislead the jury; and, in the second place, the verdict of the jury shows that they were not misled, as they found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the land in dispute, and not for four-sixths thereof.

Fourth exception: The charge of the presiding judge in this respect was as follows: "When did Mrs. McMillan go into possession of the land? Her deed, put in evidence, bears date 12th of April, 1892. When did she go out of possession? Her deed to Napier is dated 1st of February, 1904. She was in possession of the land for over 11 years, and did she hold it for 11 years as her own, using it as her own against her brothers, A. A. and W. D. Rogers; did she hold it against them, and use it for herself, for 11 years? If she did, and they were of age, and all the parties were of age, that would give him a good title against them. You read the testimony of W. D. Rogers on the stand, and I will leave it to you to say whether or not he makes any claim to the land. If, by his actions, he has conceded it to belong to Mrs. McMillan, I will leave it to the jury to determine whether or not he has any claim to it. There is enough testimony for me to leave it to the jury to say whether or not Mrs. McMillan ever got by deed of possession the title of A. A. and W. D. Rogers." The testimony of W. D. Rogers tended to show that Mrs. McMillan had acquired title by adverse possession, and was therefore admissible.

Fifth exception: The context shows that when the presiding judge charged that the time when the fence was built was the pivotal point in the case he meant that it was the pivotal point in establishing the defendant's claim of adverse possession, and not that said fact was the turning point in the entire case.

Sixth exception: What has already been said disposes of this exception.

Ninth exception: The cases of Patterson v. Crenshaw, 32 S. C. 534, 11 S. E. 390, and Duren v. Vee, 50 S. C. 444, 27 S. E. 875, show that this exception cannot be sustained.

The appellant's attorneys did not argue the tenth exception; therefore it will not be considered.

Judgment affirmed.

WOODS, J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance, but the reasons stated by Mr. Justice Gary for overruling the fifth and tenth exceptions seem to me unsound. The fifth exception assigns error in this instruction: "The thing for the jury to say is. When was this fence put there? and you might say that is the pivotal point in this case. If it was there for 10 years before 1906, and Matheson held it for these 10 years, his title is good. If it was put there any time short of 10 years, it does not avail him. That is all there is in the case."

The defendant Matheson in his pleadings denied the title of the plaintiff and set up title by adverse possession in himself. By the instruction quoted the court clearly indicated to the jury that the plaintiff had made out his title, and that the only substantial question in the case was whether the defendant had acquired title by an adverse possession, dating from the time he had inclosed the disputed land by a fence. The Constitution forbids judges to charge juries with respect to matters of fact. The inhibition, of course, refers to matters of fact which have any bearing on the material issues involved in the trial. Careful examination of the record leaves not the least room to doubt that the plaintiff's grantor, Mrs. McMillan, had a good legal title to the land when she conveyed to him, unless the defendant had acquired his title by adverse possession. No reasonable jury could have found otherwise. In Edgefield Mfg. Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co., 78 S. C. 73, 58 S. E. 960, the rule was laid down that "this court should not order a new trial when, from an examination of the record, it has no doubt the verdict of any fair jury would have been the same, even if no error had been committed." Applying this rule, as the record shows that the only issue made by the pleadings on which the evidence left any possible doubt was whether the defendant had acquired title by adverse possession, the court will not grant a new trial, even if it be assumed that it was a technical error for the circuit judge to refer to that issue as the pivotal point in the case.

The same reasoning applied to the tenth exception, for the evidence leaves no doubt that Mrs. McMillan did hold the land, claiming it adversely for 11 years before the defendant entered.

STATE ex rel. DAVIS et al. v. STATE BOARD OF CANVASSERS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 30, 1910.)

1. CERTIORARI (§ 68*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—FINDINGS OF FACT.

The court, on certiorari to review the action of an inferior tribunal, will correct errors of law, but will not review findings of fact, unless the findings are contrary to any reasonable conclusion or inference from the evidence, or unless they have no evidence to support them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. §§ 180-182; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

2. CERTIORARI (§ 66*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where, on certiorari to review the action of the State Board of Canvassers, the record showed that all of the testimony heard by the county board of canvassers was not read to the State Board, but it did not show what parts were read and what were not, the court must assume that the findings of the State Board were based on a consideration of the testimony bearing on the facts found.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. § 178; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

3. ELECTIONS (§ 83*)—QUALIFICATIONS OF ELECTORS—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

The statute requiring the production of a registration certificate and proof of the payment of all taxes assessed against an elector, collectible during the previous year, as conditions prerequisite to his right to vote, requires that the proof of payment of taxes shall be by legal and competent evidence furnished by affidavit, or in some other legal form, such as to satisfy a reasonable mind of the truth, and the managers of an election may not dispense therewith.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 77-81; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

4. ELECTIONS (§ 83*)—REGULATIONS—MANDATORY STATUTES.

A statute requiring the production of a registration certificate and proof of payment of taxes assessed against an elector, as conditions prerequisite to his right to vote, is mandatory, and neither the courts nor the managers of an election may dispense with either of the requirements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 77-81; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

5. ELECTIONS (§ 229*)—ILLEGALITY—EFFECT.

Where fraud or illegality in an election is so general that a free and fair expression of the popular will has not been obtained, the whole election will be set aside, but when the polls can be purged of the illegal votes, the illegal votes should be rejected and the legal votes counted, and when that cannot be done the entire polls must be thrown out, where enough illegal votes have been cast to affect the result or to leave it in doubt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 201; Dec. Dig. § 229.*]

6. ELECTIONS (§ 290*)—CONTESTS—REVIEW—"CANVASSING."

An order of the State Board of Canvassers committing to the county board of canvassers of a county the entire record, with instructions to the county board to recanvass the vote of the county and hear and consider the ground of protest filed by the attorney for a contestant, and to take such testimony as may be competent in support and rebuttal thereof, and to determine the result, etc., authorizes the county board to consider testimony in support of another contestant; the word "canvassing" implying investigation; examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 306, 307; Dec. Dig. § 299.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 951-952.]

7. ELECTIONS (§ 289*)—CONTESTS—NOTICE OF CONTEST—EFFECT.

The court in an election contest will not consider any other grounds of contest than those stated in the notice of contest filed, unless the notice is amended so as to include other grounds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 285; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

8. ELECTIONS (§ 259*)—CONTESTS—ORGANIZATION OF CANVASSING BOARD.

In the absence of any statute providing how or by whom meetings of the county board of canvassers of a county shall be called, a majority of the board may call a meeting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 234, 235; Dec. Dig. § 259.*]

9. OFFICERS (§ 108*)—ACT OF MAJORITY OF OFFICIAL BOARD—EFFECT.

Where a board of officers is constituted by law to perform a duty prescribed by law, the act of the majority is binding as the act of the body.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. § 184; Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

10. ELECTIONS (§ 305*)—CONTESTS—DISCRETION OF CANVASSING BOARD.

The time allowed for the production of witnesses before the county board of canvassers of a county, in proceedings to contest an election, must be left to the discretion of the board, and the court will not interfere therewith, except in case of manifest abuse of discretion to the prejudice of the party complaining.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 328; Dec. Dig. § 305.*]

11. ELECTIONS (§ 300*)—CONTESTS—DISCRETION OF CANVASSING BOARD.

A motion addressed to the county board of canvassers of a county for time to procure witnesses in proceedings to contest an election should be supported by affidavit naming the witnesses, and stating their places of residence, so that the board may decide how much time could be allowed within the limit allowed by the State Board of Canvassers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 308; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

12. ELECTIONS (§ 305*)—FINDINGS OF FACT—REVIEW.

A finding of the State Board of Canvassers that an election was fair, and that none of the things complained of affected the result, is not reviewable by the court on certiorari.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 318; Dec. Dig. § 305.*]

13. ELECTIONS (§ 227*)—STATUTES—MANDATORY PROVISIONS.

Civ. Code 1902, §§ 208, 212, requiring the administering to each person offering to vote at an election an oath that he is qualified to vote at the election, and providing that at each precinct a space shall be railed off with openings for the entrance and exit of voters, etc., are merely directory, and a violation thereof will not vitiate the election in the absence of fraud, unless the result was thereby affected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 197-200; Dec. Dig. § 227.*]

Certiorari by the State on the relation of W. A. Davis and another against the State Board of Canvassers to review the action of the Board in an election contest. Petition dismissed.

D. W. Robinson, for petitioners. D. S. Henderson, for State Board of Canvassers.

HYDRICK, J. On the 17th August, 1909, an election was held in Aiken county on the question whether alcoholic liquors should be sold therein. When the county board of canvassers met, on August 24th, to canvass the vote and declare the result, the relators, Davis and Craig, filed notice and grounds of contest of certain precincts, at which the majority of the votes, as certified by the managers, was "for sale"; and two other citizens, Johnson and Powell, filed notice and grounds of contest of certain precincts at which the majority was "against sale." The board adjourned to meet August 30th, to hear these contests. On that day, the attorneys for Johnson and Powell demurred to the grounds of contest filed by relators for insufficiency, in failing to allege that the irregularities and illegalities of which they complained affected the result of the election. The demurrer was sustained, and a motion to amend by making the allegation was refused, and the contest dismissed. The result declared was "for sale," by a majority of 167 votes. On appeal, heard on September 3d, the State Board recommitted the entire record with instructions to the county board "to recanvass the vote for Aiken county, * * * and hear and consider the ground of protest filed by C. E. Sawyer, attorney for protestants, and to take such testimony and evidence as may be competent, offered in support and rebuttal of the same, and to determine the result, and having done so, to transmit to this board the result of said canvass, together with its conclusions and findings upon the ground of protest, as well as all testimony and other records and papers connected with the same, required to be transmitted to this board by section 217 of Code 1902, the same to be returned to this board not later than Thursday, September 9, 1909."

On September 6th, two of the county board, which was composed of three members, issued a notice of a meeting of that board to be held on September 7th, at 11 o'clock, to proceed with the hearing. This notice was served on the attorneys for all parties and the chairman of the board between 10 and 11 o'clock on the 6th. Later, on the same day, the chairman issued a notice for a meeting of the board on the 8th, at 10 o'clock. Pursuant to their notice, two of the board met on the 7th. The regular chairman having sent word that he would not attend, they organized by electing one of their number chairman, and announced their determination to proceed with the hearing.

The attorneys for the relators demurred to the jurisdiction of the board, as thus organized, contending that the meeting was illegal, because it had not been called by the regular chairman. They also moved for a continuance until the next day, on the ground that they had not had time, since receipt of notice of the meeting, to summons their witnesses, some of whom they stated lived more than 20 miles from the courthouse. The demurrer and motion were overruled, and the board limited the time for the taking of testimony to three hours and a half to each side, and for argument to one hour to each side. Four witnesses were examined that day, and the record shows that at the conclusion of the testimony on the next day, relators had consumed only 2 hours and 21 minutes of the time allowed them.

After hearing the evidence and arguments, the board dismissed both contests and certified the results as before. Both sides appealed. The State Board heard the appeal September 10th. As the time within which the board is allowed to perform its duties is limited by statute (Code 1902, vol. 1, § 229), the State Board, finding that it was necessary for them to dispose of the matter on the 10th; as, after that date, it would be functus officio (Ex parte Mackey, 15 S. C. 329; Ex parte Elliott, 33 S. C. 603, 12 S. E. 423), limited the time for the hearing to two hours and a half on each side. The testimony had been taken stenographically, and had not been transcribed, and hence had to be read to the board by the stenographer. The board reserved the right to have such parts of the testimony read by the stenographer as they, or either of them, desired. After hearing so much of the testimony as the respective sides caused to be read and the arguments, the board sustained the contest of both sides as to certain precincts and overruled them as to all others; but, finding that the result was not thereby changed, they dismissed both contests. Thereupon the relators sued out a writ of certiorari in the original jurisdiction of this court to review the action of said board.

In reviewing the action of an inferior tribunal, on writ of certiorari, this court will correct errors of law, but will not review the findings of fact. Ex parte Riggs, 52 S. C. 298, 29 S. E. 645; Welsh v. Board, 79 S. C. 246, 60 S. E. 699. The relators contended, however, that the findings of fact of the State Board relative to the grounds of their contest are not binding upon the court, because they are not judicial findings based upon consideration of the testimony, as the board heard only a part of it. The record shows that all of the testimony was not read to the board, but it does not show what parts were read and what were not. We must assume therefore that the findings of the board were based upon a consideration of the testimony bearing upon the facts found. But findings of fact which are contrary to any reasonable conclusion or inference from the evidence, or which have no evidence at all to support them, may be corrected as errors of law.

Construing the Constitution and statutes of this state, this court has held that the production of a registration certificate and proof of the payment of all taxes, including poll tax, assessed against an elector and collectible during the previous year, are conditions prerequisite to his right to vote; and, that every vote cast without compliance with these conditions is illegal; and that when it appears that enough illegal votes were cast in an election to change the result or make it doubtful, it will be declared void. Wright

v. Board, 76 S. C. 574, 57 S. E. 536; Gunter v. Gayden, 84 S. C. 48, 65 S. E. 948.

The only reasonable inference which can be drawn from the testimony is that one or the other of the above-mentioned conditions—and in some instances both—were not complied with at the following precincts: Banks Mill, Bloomingdale, Kitchings Mill, Otts, Wagener, and Windsor. At some of them, the managers agreed that they would not require the production of registration certificates or proof of the payment of taxes. At some, they required one but not the other. An attempt was made to show compliance with the law by proving that the managers knew the voters personally, and were satisfied that they had registration certificates; and that they had paid their taxes, by showing that the managers either knew or were informed that the sheriff had not been in the neighborhood to levy and collect tax executions, and the inference was that all the people had paid their taxes. Such a palpable attempt at evasion of the law will not be tolerated. Just what proof of payment of taxes, other than the certificate or receipt of the officers authorized to collect taxes, which is made conclusive proof thereof, will satisfy the statute, it is not now necessary to decide. But when the Legislature used the word "proof," it meant legal and competent evidence, furnished by affidavit or in some other legal form, and such as would satisfy a reasonable mind of the truth. The law-making power has declared that a registration certificate and proof of payment of taxes must be produced at the polls. Neither the courts nor the managers of election have any power to dispense with either of these mandatory requirements of the law.

In the elections reviewed in Wright v. Board and Gunter v. Gayden, it appeared that the illegal voting was so general that the whole election was thereby affected, and therefore vitiated. But when the illegal voting is confined to only a few of many precincts, the rejection of the vote of the precincts thereby affected will not necessarily vitiate the entire election. There may be cases, however, in which the number of precincts rejected on account of fraud or illegal voting is so large that the whole election will be declared void, even though the result at the other precincts would remain unchanged. Where fraud or illegality in an election is so general that it appears that a free and fair expression of the popular will has not been obtained, the whole election will be set aside. When the polls can be purged of the illegal votes, this should be done, and only the illegal votes should be rejected, and the legal votes should be counted. But when this cannot be done, the entire polls must be thrown out, if it appears that enough illegal votes have been cast to affect the result at such poll, or to leave it in doubt.

In this case it appears that enough illegal votes were cast at each of the above-named precincts to have changed the result at such precinct, or, at least, to have left it in doubt. As it was not shown by whom or on which side of the question the illegal votes were cast, and as the polls could not therefore have been purged of them, the entire vote at each of said precincts should have been thrown out. Upon the same grounds upon which we have found that the vote at the above-named precincts should have been rejected, the State Board did reject the polls at Creed's Store, a precinct contested by the relators, and also those at White Pond and Silverton, precincts which were contested by Johnson and Powell; and they should have rejected the poll at Montmorenci, another precinct contested by Johnson and Powell.

The next question is whether the county board erred in admitting testimony to support the contest of Johnson and Powell, and whether the State Board erred in sustaining their contest as to certain precincts. The relators contended that, as there was no appeal by Johnson and Powell from the first decision of the county board, they are concluded; also, that, by the terms of the order of the State Board, recommitting the matter, only the relator's contest was to be heard. It is apparent that the contest of Johnson and Powell was filed for no other purpose than to offset the possible effect upon the result of the election by the rejection of some or all of the precincts contested by the relators. Therefore, when the board decided to dismiss the contest of the relators, what would have been the use to consider the other? No matter what disposition had been made of it, in whole or in part, the result would not have been changed. Therefore it was not considered or decided.

But we think the terms of the order of the State Board broad enough to require the consideration of that contest by the county board. It will be noted that "the entire record" was recommitted with instructions to "recanvass the vote for Aiken county," and not merely the precincts contested by relators. In State v. Nerland, 7 S. C. 246, quoted with approval in Ex parte Mackey, 15 S. C. 332, Chief Justice Moses said: "The term (canvassers) employed to designate the duty to be performed by the commissioners would seem to impose an obligation beyond that of merely counting the ballots and comparing the statement of managers. 'Canvassing' implies 'search,' 'scrutiny,' 'investigation,' 'examination,' etc." The fact that the order of the State Board specifically required certain things to be done with regard to the contest of the relators does not exclude the consideration of the other contest, especially when the board were required by that order to recanvass the vote for the whole county, when the contest of relators covered only a few precincts.

With respect to some of the precincts contested by the relators, the petition herein states other grounds than those stated in the notice of contest filed with the county board. The court will not consider any other grounds than those stated in the notice filed. While the statute does not specify any method of procedure in such contests, and while, perhaps, technical precision in pleading should not be required, still reason and justice require that the grounds relied upon should be stated so plainly and clearly that the contestee may prepare to meet them without unnecessary labor or expense; and, unless the notice is amended by order of the board, the contestant will be held to the grounds alleged, and the admission of evidence will be restricted accordingly. As well might the notice specify one precinct, and the contestant be allowed to introduce evidence as to another.

The next question is whether the demurrer of contestants to the jurisdiction of the board, as organized on September 7th, and the legality of that meeting, should have been sustained. The statute does not provide how or by whom meetings of the board shall be called. In the absence of such provision, it was competent for the majority to call the meeting. The rule is that "where a body or board of officers is constituted by law to perform a trust for the public, or to execute a power or perform a duty prescribed by law, it is not necessary that all should concur in the act done. The act of the majority is the act of the body." Abbeville v. McMillan, 52 S. C. 60, 29 S. E. 540.

The next question is whether there was error in not allowing more time for the production of witnesses before the county board, and more time for the hearing of the appeal by the State Board. The time allowed in such cases must necessarily be left to the discretion of such boards, and the court will not interfere, unless there was a manifest abuse of the discretion to the prejudice of the complainant. The time fixed by the statute within which the boards are required to discharge their duties shows that a speedy determination of such contests was contemplated and intended. And there are strong reasons resting in a sound public policy why such contests should be brought to a speedy determination. From the circumstances of the case, both boards were under the necessity to act promptly, and both have found as a fact that the time allowed was sufficient, and we think their finding was warranted under the circumstances. Moreover, the motion addressed to the county board for more time to procure witnesses was not supported by affidavit, as it should have been, naming the witnesses and stating their places of residence, so that the board could the more intelligently have decided how much time could be allowed within the limit allowed them by the State Board.

Section 208, vol. 1, Code 1902, provides that "the managers shall administer to each person offering to vote an oath that he is qualified to vote at this election, according to the Constitution of this state, and that he has not voted during this election." And section 212 provides that "at each precinct, a space or enclosure, such as the managers of election shall deem fit and sufficient, shall be railed off or otherwise provided with an opening at one end or side for the entrance of the voter, and an opening at the other for his exit, as a voting place in which to hold the election. * * * And the ballot box shall be so located as to be in view of persons outside of the polling place, during the time of voting. * * * But one voter shall be allowed to enter any voting place at a time, and no one, except the managers, shall be allowed to speak to the voter while in the voting place casting his vote."

The violation of one or more of the foregoing provisions of the statute is alleged as the ground of contest of the following precincts: Aiken, Oak Grove, Bath, Kneecus Mill, Salleys, Seivern, and Shaws Fork. The state canvassers have found, as a fact, that the election was fair, and that none of the things above mentioned affected the result, and that some of the allegations were not sustained by the evidence. This finding cannot be reviewed.

Moreover, the provisions above quoted are merely directory, and not mandatory or imperative; and it is well settled that the violation of such provisions of a statute as merely regulate the conduct of elections is not, in the absence of fraud, vitiativ, unless it is made to appear that the result was thereby affected. De Berry v. Nicholson, 102 N. C. 465, 9 S. E. 545, 11 Am. St. Rep. 787; Parvin v. Wimberg, 130 Ind. 561, 30 N. E. 790, 15 L. R. A. 775, 30 Am. St. Rep. 254; Patterson v. Watkins, 131 Ala. 387, 31 South. 93, 90 Am. St. Rep. 43; 6 Cyc. 362. These provisions of the statute should, however, be observed by the election officers, whose sworn duty is to administer the law, as enacted by the Legislature. It has been well said that before an election all provisions of the statute should be deemed and held by the officers of the election to be mandatory. Any willful neglect of duty by such officers is made a misdemeanor by statute. Section 284, Cr. Code.

Notwithstanding the errors of the State Board which we have pointed out, we find, upon examination of the vote at the other precincts in the county, that they give a majority "for sale." Therefore the illegalities complained of have not affected the result of the election, as declared by the board. As there was no fraud, and the illegal voting was not so general as to warrant the conclusion that the election was not a free and fair expression of the popular will, it will be sustained.

Petition dismissed.

(36 S. C. 285)

LEWIS et al. v. POPE et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 13, 1910.)

1. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGE AS TO MATTERS OF FACT.

An instruction that a person cannot live on or occupy one tract of land and establish adverse possession, under color of title, over an adjoining tract by proving that he has cut timber on the adjoining tract and hauled it off for use on the tract on which he lived was properly refused, as violating Const. art. 5, § 26, providing that judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 18*)—ACTUAL OCCUPANCY—RESIDENCE.

Actual residence is not essential to the defense of adverse possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 96-98; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 13*)—ELEMENTS.

Adverse possession as applied to real estate is an actual, visible, and exclusive appropriation of land commenced and continued under a claim of right with the intent to assert the claim against the true owner, and accompanied by such an invasion of the rights of the opposite party as to give him a cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 65-76; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 227-236; vol. 8, p. 7568.]

4. TRIAL (§ 260*)—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS.

A refusal to charge that a person cannot live on or occupy one tract of land and establish adverse possession, under color of title, over an adjoining tract by proving that he has cut wood or timber on the adjoining tract, for use on the tract on which he lived, is rendered harmless by charging that before one can succeed in holding lands under a claim of adverse possession, he must prove that he has been in possession for 10 consecutive years, claiming it openly, notoriously, and adversely, and he cannot succeed in his claim by living on another tract and cultivating for a few years a small patch on the tract he claims, or by going on such tract and sometimes cutting wood or timber for use on the tract on which he lives, but he must show that he has been doing that for 10 consecutive years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESUMPTION.

In an action for the possession of land, where defendants show adverse possession by themselves and their ancestors for over 20 years, a request to charge that the mere going on the land while living on another tract and cultivating a part of it for a few years, or occasionally cutting wood on it, is not possession from which it can be presumed that there was a deed was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

6. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 43*)—CONTINUITY OF POSSESSION—TACKING SUCCESSIVE POSSESSIONS.

To sustain the defense of adverse possession under the statute, the defendant is not allowed to tack his possession to that of the party from whom he claims.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 213-225; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 187*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGES AS TO MATTERS OF FACT.

A charge that, while the declarations of a person who has been in possession of land may be given in evidence to show under what right he held it, yet the loose declarations of a man in possession cannot prevail against the truth of the case as shown on the trial, was properly refused, as violating Const. art. 5, § 26, providing that judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 187.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION OF CHARGE AS A WHOLE.

An instruction that the law presumes possession unexplained to be adverse possession, that holding exclusively, and adversely, and openly are the highest acts in the power of the disseisor to indicate his intention, and that those who claim an interest in things must be charged with a knowledge of their status and condition was free from error, where the court also charged that if a plaintiff in an action to recover real property establishes legal title he is presumed to have been in possession within the time required by law, and the occupation of the land by any other person is deemed to have been in subordination to the legal title, and to defeat the legal title the person in possession must show that he has held and possessed the land adversely against such legal title for 10 consecutive years before the commencement of the action.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by R. H. Lewis and others against N. B. Pope and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The grounds of appeal were as follows: 1. Because his honor, as it is respectfully submitted, erred in refusing to charge the plaintiffs' sixth request, to wit: "A person cannot live on or occupy one tract of land and establish adverse possession, under color of title, over an adjoining tract of land by proving that he has cut wood or timber on such adjoining tract and hauled it off for use on the tract on which he lived." 2. Because his honor erred in refusing to charge plaintiffs' thirteenth request, to wit: "When a person claims that he has acquired title to land by being in possession for 20 years, he must prove such possession of such land for 20 consecutive years. The mere going on the land while living on another tract, and cultivating a part of such land for a few years, or occasionally cutting wood on it, is not such possession from which it can be presumed that he had a deed. In all cases the jury must find the truth from the evidence, and if, as a matter of fact, he had no deed, then they cannot presume that he had such deed." 3. Because his honor erred in refusing to charge all of the eighth request of the plaintiffs, to wit: "Where one establishes a legal title to land the law presumes that he has been in possession of the same within the time fixed by the statute, and such title cannot be defeated by an occupant of such land, unless he proves adverse possession in one or the other of the ways which have been explained to you, and even though it does appear that the occupant has been in possession of the same for 20 years this will not presume a deed from the owner of such land, but before such occupant can defeat the legal title he must establish his adverse possession, either under color of title or by actual possession for 10 consecutive years." 4. Because his honor erred in refusing to charge plaintiffs' eleventh request, to wit: "While the declarations of a person who has been in possession of land may be given in evidence to show under what right he held it, yet I charge you that the loose declarations of a man in possession cannot prevail against the truth of the case, as may be ascertained and proved on the trial of such case." 5. Because his honor erred in charging the fourth request of the defendants, to wit: "The law presumes possession unexplained to be adverse possession. Holding exclusively, and adversely, and openly, are the highest acts in the power of the disseisor to indicate his intention. Those who claim an interest in things must be charged with a knowledge of their status and condition."

Sanders & De Pass, for appellants. Stanyarne Wilson and J. B. Atkinson, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an action to recover possession of a tract of land containing about 100 acres. The defendants denied the plaintiffs' title, and set up the defenses of adverse possession, presumption of a grant, estoppel, and laches. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiffs appealed upon exceptions which will be reported.

First exception. In order to understand clearly the question presented by this exception, it will be necessary to refer to the testimony of the defendants' witnesses, which is thus summarized by the respondents' attorneys: "In 1869 T. W. Pope, ancestor of defendants, was in possession. His son, N. K. Pope, says he continued in possession till he, N. K. Pope, went West in 1871. The fenced-in portion, some 11 acres, he cultivated and, in winter, pastured; the rest of the place, woodland, he used for firewood and cattle range. N. B. Pope says: He worked in this cultivated, fenced land for his father in 1871. The cattle were pastured there in winter. This continued till 1876, when the family scattered by deaths and marriages, leaving no one but himself with his father. They thereupon discontinued cultivating, and devoted the place to pasture, till three years after the fence law was enacted, about 1884, and then hauled off the rails and built a fence for the cattle, and let that farm grow up. The tract was used in the only other ways possible; clearing land by cutting timber and selling it for wood, sawing and using it for firewood and sningles. This continued until his father's death in 1900. From the time his father went on the place till his death, he used it as his own, just like his other land, claiming it as his own, and no one interfered with his possession. After his death his children continued to use and occupy it, building houses upon it in 1901 and 1903. In 1904 it was divided amongst them by partition, and has since then been occupied and cultivated by those of the family to whom it was set off. During all the while, for 30 years, the plaintiff Lewis lived in that neighborhood. J. D. Cooley says: That his first recollection was T. W. Pope cultivating some eight or ten acres of the place, and getting wood and pine off of it for his own use. He made no difference in the use of this land and his other lands. In 1876 witness helped pile up fodder and put it in an old house there, along with T. W. Pope's children. Simeon Moore says: That in 1888 he cut down saw timber on the place for T. W. Pope, and sawed there for four or five months—about 200,000 feet. G. B. Morris says: That he was on the place in 1873, and T. W. Pope was then in possession, and he so continued till his death, using it just like he did his other lands, and claiming it as his own; and after his death his heirs took charge of it, but did not divide it up, under the surveyor's advice, because they could not find among his papers a deed to the place. From 1873 to this time the land has not been in possession of any one but T. W. Pope and his heirs. Mrs. Laura Nance says: That from her earliest recollection her father, T. W. Pope, was in possession of the land, cultivating it and pasturing it, and the men bringing in firewood. She left and went West in 1890, returning in 1896, finding him still in possession. Never heard of any one else claiming the land. T. E. Johnson, surveyor, says: That in 1900, after T. W. Pope's death, he surveyed his lands and platted them for his heirs, as shown by Exhibit 1. In doing so he made use of a plat made by J. B. Davis, surveyor, in 1879 for T. W. Pope of his lands, introduced as Exhibit J. This plat J includes the land in dispute. In T. W. Pope's lifetime, Wm. Ramsay got him to survey a tract which lies just east of the tract in dispute, and he (witness) had to locate the line dividing them. In doing so he got T. W. Pope to help him. Pope told him that was his line and Ramsay's. This was the eastern line of the land in dispute. N. B. Pope says: That when Davis made the survey and plat (Exhibit J) for his father, he and his father went along and his father showed Davis the lines by which the survey was made."

There are two reasons why this exception cannot be sustained. In the first place, the request was in violation of art. 5, § 26, of the Constitution, which provides that "judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact," in that it undertakes to say, as matter of law, that certain facts do not constitute adverse possession, whereas the inference from such testimony presents a question of fact to be determined by the jury. 16 Enc. of Law (1st Ed.) 465 et seq.; Whaley v. Stevens, 27 S. C. 549, 4 S. E. 145; State v. Aughtry, 49 S. C. 305, 26 S. E. 619, 27 S. E. 199; Pickens v. Ry., 54 S. C. 498, 32 S. E. 597; Rinake v. Mfg. Co., 58 S. C. 360, 36 S. E. 700; Wood v. Mfg. Co., 66 S. C. 482, 45 S. E. 81; Weaver v. Ry., 76 S. C. 49, 56 S. E. 657, 121 Am. St. Rep. 934; Turbyfill v. Ry., 83 S. C. 325, 65 S. E. 278. The case of Pickens v. Railway, supra, shows that this principle is specially applicable to the case under consideration, as there was testimony, other than that mentioned in the exception, touching the question of adverse possession.

In the second place, actual residence is not essential to the defense of adverse possession. "Adverse possession, as applied to real estate, is an actual, visible, and exclusive appropriation of land commenced and continued under a claim of right, with the intent to assert such claim against the true owner, and accompanied by such an invasion of the rights of the opposite party, as to give him a cause of action." 1 Enc. of Law, 789; 2 Enc. L. & P. 362. "The usual test of entry and possession is actual occupation and residence, cultivation, and improvement of the land. The evidence necessary to establish actual adverse possession, varies in each particular case, depending upon the situation of the property, and the use to which it may be applied. The same rule will not apply equally to cultivated lands, town property, and wild lands. Although there must be actual entry, neither actual occupation, cultivation, nor residence is necessary, where the property is so situated as not to admit of any permanent improvement or cultivation; but where acts of ownership have been done upon lands, which from their nature indicate a continuous claim of property, and are continued long enough, such acts are evidence of an adverse possession for the consideration of the jury." 1 Enc. of Law, 822, 823. "The actual fencing and inclosing of the land are not, unless expressly required by statute, essential to constitute adverse possession, but such acts are very decisive, in determining possession and claim of ownership. Where the property has been properly inclosed, there may be sufficient evidence of claim and ownership without actual residence." 1 Enc. of Law, 828, 829; 2 Enc. L. P. 369-371. "Although possessio pedis does not require actual occupancy, it implies inclosure and use of the ground inclosed. I will not undertake to indicate in what way it should be used. In general it should be cultivated, or perhaps it might be sufficient that it should be used for pasture." Per Butler, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Porter v. Kennedy, 1 McM. 354. But even if there was error it was rendered harmless by charging the following request: "Before one can succeed in holding lands under a claim of adverse possession, he must prove that he has been in possession for 10 consecutive years, claiming it openly, notoriously, and adversely. He cannot succeed in such claim by living on another tract and cultivating for a few years a small patch on the tract he claims, or by going on such tract and sometimes cutting wood or timber, and hauling it off for use on the tract on which he lives, but he must show that he has been doing that for 10 consecutive years."

Second exception. The proposition contained in the first sentence of the request is disposed of by what was said in considering the first exception. The proposition embodied in the second sentence of the request is antagonistic to the doctrine upon which presumptions rest, to wit, that even when there is no proof of a fact, nevertheless, after 20 years, it will be presumed to exist. Riddlehoover v. Kinard, 1 Hill Eq. 376; McLeod v. Rogers, 2 Rich. Law, 19; Corbett v. Fogle, 72 S. C. 312, 51 S. E. 834; Powers v. Smith, 80 S. C. 110, 61 S. E. 222.

"Presumptions may supply the place of positive proof. There are two kinds of presumptions. The one may be called a legal presumption; the other a presumption of fact. The first is wholly unconnected with the idea of belief, in fact, it is opposed to it. It is a mere rule of law to supply those defects of our nature and the nature of things, which cannot otherwise be guarded against. Under this rule the party must rely on a long-continued and uninterrupted possession. The rule invests such possession with the title. I am never led to the consideration of this subject, but my mind involuntarily recurs to the peculiarly happy and lucid exposition of the rule by Lord Chancellor Erskine in the case of 12 Vesey, 266, 267. He observes that it has been said you cannot presume unless you believe. 'But it is because there are no means of creating belief or disbelief that such general presumptions are raised upon subjects of which there is no record or written muniment. Therefore, upon the weakness and infirmity of all human tribunals, judging of matters of antiquity, instead of belief (which must be the formation of the judgment upon a recent transaction), where the circumstances are incapable of forming anything like belief, the legal presumption holds the place of particular and individual belief. Mankind, from the infirmity and necessity of their situation, must, for the preservation of their property and rights, have recourse to some general principle to take the place of individual and specific belief; which can hold only as to matters within our own time, upon which a conclusion can be formed from particular and individual knowledge.' The second is the rule in relation to the presumption of facts. Where the party undertakes to show that, in point of fact, a deed did exist, there he must first prove such circumstances as will evidence the belief of its existence; next, the loss or destruction; and lastly, the contents." Per Colcock, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, in Stockdale v. Young, 3 Strob. 501, note. The second kind of presumption is not involved in this case.

Third exception. The circuit judge charged the request down to the words "which have been explained to you." The second portion of the request would, however, deprive the defendants of the right to rely upon the presumption of a grant, unless they first showed that they had acquired title to the land by adverse possession for the statutory period of 10 years. In order to sustain the defense of adverse possession under the statute, the defendant is not allowed to tack his possession to that of the party from whom he claims. Pegues v. Warley, 14 S. C. 180; Ellen v. Ellen, 16 S. C. 132; Garrett v. Weinberg, 48 S. C. 28, 26 S. E. 3. It was, however, held in the case of McLeod v. Rogers, 2 Rich. Law, 19, that a continuous adverse possession of land for 20 years, by different persons and at different times, is sufficient to raise the presumption of a grant. It will thus be seen that it would have been prejudicial to the rights of the defendants to charge the request.

Fourth exception. When the request was presented the presiding judge said: "I refuse that eleventh request as it stands, but I will cover it in my general charge, before I get through, in a different way." The appellants have not shown wherein the general charge in this respect was prejudicial to their rights, but waiving such objection, the exception cannot be sustained, as the request was in violation of article 5, § 26, of the Constitution, which provides that "judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact."

Fifth exception. In disposing of the request set out in this exception, the presiding judge said: "I will have to charge that request. Holding exclusively, and adversely, and openly are such matters as you may take into consideration, in ascertaining and passing upon the question, as to whether the holding was adverse." When the question presented by this exception is considered in connection with other portions of the charge, especially what was said in charging the plaintiff's first request, it will be seen that it is free from error. The first request and the remarks of the presiding judge are as follows: "If a plaintiff, in an action to recover real property, or the possession thereof, establishes a legal title to the land in dispute, then he is presumed to have been in possession thereof, within the time required by law, and when such is the case, the occupation of the land by any other person is deemed to have been under and in subordination to the legal title, and before such legal title can be defeated the person in possession must show that he has held and possessed the land adversely against such legal title for 10 consecutive years, before the commencement of the action.

"I charge you, as I have already done in sum and substance, whenever a person comes into court, and shows that he has the legal title, or has had it, the law presumes that he is in possession, or that if any one else is in possession, the law presumes that he is there by permission of the owner, the person who owns the legal title to the land. The person in possession claims as a subordinate, but that presumption may be rebutted by evidence. That is the case here, and it is for you to say whether that presumption has been rebutted by the evidence."

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

WOODS, J., concurs in the result. HYDRICK, J., did not sit in this case.

STATE v. DUNCAN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1171*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

Great latitude is allowed in the argument of counsel, provided it is confined to the evidence; but the court on its own motion must check any departure therefrom, and an abuse of the privilege, over objection, so far as to probably affect the verdict, is error requiring a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3126, 3127; Dec. Dig. § 1171.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1171*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

Where the record shows that no other verdict could have been found on any reasonable view of the evidence than was found, improper argument of counsel in departing from the evidence was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3126, 3127; Dec. Dig. § 1171.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 726*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

Where counsel for accused in his argument improperly alluded to the fact that newspapers were urging convictions for homicide, the argument of the state's attorney that there were four indictments for that crime on the docket, but they had nothing to do with the case, and that every case must stand on its own merits, was not ground for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1681; Dec. Dig. § 726.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTION.

A charge on self-defense that if accused used such language to decedent as might reasonably be expected to bring on a physical encounter, and actually helped to bring it on, resulting in the death of decedent, accused could not plead self-defense, and the jury must determine whether accused used to decedent language that was reasonably calculated to bring on a difficulty, etc., properly submitted to the jury the question whether accused acted as a reasonable man, and whether a reasonable man would expect to bring on a difficulty by the use of similar language.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 614-632; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 763, 764*)—INSTRUCTIONS—STATEMENT OF FACTS.

A hypothetical statement of the facts in an instruction, with a statement of the legal result following therefrom, is not a charge on the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. §§ 763, 764.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 823*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ERROR CURED BY OTHER INSTRUCTION.

Where the court charged that unless the state proved beyond a reasonable doubt that accused killed decedent, they must acquit, and that the issue whether accused killed decedent must be determined from the testimony, a statement in a charge explaining the difference between manslaughter and homicide, as to what spirit of heart accused killed decedent out of, was not prejudicial, as conveying to the jury the impression that in the opinion of the court accused had killed decedent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 823.*]

7. WITNESSES (§ 287*)—REDIRECT EXAMINATION—EXPLANATION OF TESTIMONY.

Where a witness for accused, on cross-examination admitted that his wife supported herself, and that he had supported her until recently, and stated that he and his wife did not live together, but were on good terms, it was not error to refuse to allow him to explain why he was separated from his wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 930, 1000-1002; Dec. Dig. § 287.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 656*)—TRIAL—REMARKS OF TRIAL JUDGE.

The remarks of the trial judge in sustaining an objection to a question asked a witness who lived separate from his wife, as to the cause of the separation, that it was bad enough to know that the wife had quit the witness, were not objectionable as reflecting on the character of the witness for veracity or otherwise.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Alken County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Mark Duncan was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Hendersons, for appellant. Solicitor Jas. F. Byrnes, for the State.

HYDRICK, J. Appellant was convicted of manslaughter for the killing of William Brooks. He and Brooks had a fight on Wednesday night, about 8 o'clock, in which appellant admitted that he used his knife and tried to cut Brooks, but did not know whether he had done so or not. After they fought some time, Brooks ran away, and appellant pursued him some distance, but he gave up the pursuit, and returned to the house in front of which the fight occurred, and asked for a gun, saying that Brooks had cut him. He then reported the matter to the town constable, who with a crowd, accompanied also by appellant, went in search of Brooks, but he was not found until the following Friday, when his dead body was found in a field near the place where the fight occurred. His jugular vein was cut, and he died of hemorrhage. There was testimony that Brooks had been drinking during the afternoon of Wednesday with two other men, and that one of them had been heard to threaten, after they had separated, to find him and whip him, because he had carried off their liquor. But there was no testimony that they, or either of them, or any other person, had any difficulty with Brooks after the fight with appellant, or even that any one saw him, until his dead body was found.

The following statement is taken from the record: During the course of his argument before the jury, Mr. D. S. Henderson, of counsel for the defense, referred to the policy of newspapers crying for conviction of persons charged with homicide, stating he was tired of it. The solicitor, in opening his argument to the jury, referred to the remarks of Mr. Henderson, and stated no such charge could be made against Mr. Henderson, because he was always asking for acquittals; that at a former term, he (Mr. Henderson) had stated before a jury the number of acquittals he had secured in homicide cases. At this point, Mr. Henderson objected, stating: "The solicitor, in his argument to this jury, has no right to say anything about my acquitting people, and I object to it, and want my objection put on the record. I call him to order. The Solicitor: I withdraw that then. The Court: You have no right to argue that, Mr. Solicitor. Proceeding, the solicitor stated: But, if everybody is not guilty it is remarkable that it should be necessary for four homicides to have been committed within a radius of four miles of Bath. Mr. Henderson: I want to call the solicitor to order again. He has no right to say to the jury that, within a radius of four miles of Bath, four homicides have been committed. The Court: Is that a fact? The Solicitor: Yes; there are four indictments in this court so alleging and counsel will admit it. Mr. Henderson: There is no such testimony in this case. The Court: I understand, if it is a matter of public record, I think the solicitor has a right to refer to it. Mr. Henderson: I object. The Court: Yes, sir." The solicitor stated that everybody knew that there were four indictments for such homicides, and counsel for the defense couldn't deny it, but that all this has nothing to do with the facts of this case. As said by Mr. Henderson, every case, like every tub, must stand on its own bottom.

Error is assigned because the court allowed the solicitor, over the objection of appellant's counsel, to state to the jury that four homicides had been committed within four miles of Bath, the place of the homicide in question. There can be no doubt that the ruling was erroneous. The fact that other homicides had been committed had no relevancy whatever to the issues before the court in this case. The only question which has given this court serious concern is whether the reference to other homicides, made, as it was, under the sanction of the court, was so prejudicial to appellant as to call for a reversal of the judgment. Counsel on both sides in every case, but most especially in criminal cases, should be careful not to inject into the case prejudicial matter by way of statement or argument, which does not properly arise out of the evidence before the court, or inference which may reasonably and legitimately be drawn from it. Within the four corners of the evidence, great latitude in argument is allowed. But it is the duty of the court, of its own motion, to check any departure from the record. And when abuse of privilege of argument is allowed, against objection, to such an extent that it appears probable that the verdict was thereby affected, a new trial will be granted. The law guarantees every litigant a fair and impartial trial, and this has not been secured, where the verdict has been influenced by consideration outside of the evidence.

But, as said in State v. Robertson, 26 S. C. 118, 1 S. E. 444: "It is often a matter of difficulty to draw the line sharply between argument and unauthorized statement, between what is and what is not allowable, and as this pertains to the conduct of the cause, it must, to a large extent, be left to a wise discretion of the circuit judge." In State v. Williamson, 65 S. C. 248, 43 S. E. 673, the court said: "It is undoubtedly the duty of the circuit court, when appealed to, to repress any flagrant breach by counsel of the rules governing fair and legitimate argument, and for manifest abuse of discretion in this regard, from which it is probable that defendant was prejudiced, this court would set aside the verdict." It is argued that it is impossible to say when and to what extent the case of a litigant is prejudiced by the unauthorized statements of counsel. But it certainly will not do to say that for every departure from the record, the verdict of the jury will be set aside. If the record shows that no other verdict could have been found upon any reasonable view of the evidence, we are safe in concluding that no harm was done. If, however, an examination of the record and consideration of all the circumstances, imputing fair and average intelligence and honesty of purpose to the jury, leads to the conclusion that the result was probably affected, then, we think, a fair and impartial administration of the law demands a new trial.

In deciding the question, it is not improper to consider the circumstances under which the alleged abuse of the privilege of argument arose. When one attorney injects extraneous matter into the case, he arouses a strong temptation in his opponent to reply to it, even though it may be necessary to travel outside the record to do so. And where one so provokes his adversary, he greatly weakens his claim upon the court to relieve him from the evil consequences thereby brought upon himself. He is the author of his own injury. Now, in this case, it appears that appellant's attorney was the first to breach the rule of legitimate argument. No doubt his allusion to the crying of newspapers for conviction in homicide cases, and his inveighing against such a course, caused the solicitor to feel that it was incumbent upon him to justify such a course on the part of the press by mentioning the fact that so many homicides had been committed within so small a radius. No doubt, too, defendant's counsel, realizing the powerful influence exercised by the press in enlightening and moulding public sentiment, and in arousing it to civic righteousness, felt called upon to warn the jury lest that sentiment had been so aroused as to demand a victim. But that does not justify or excuse his traveling outside of the record, for his purpose could better have been accomplished by proper requests for instructions to the jury as to their duty under such circumstances, which, coming from the court, would have had much greater influence with the jury.

The record does not show that the solicitor made any other or further comment than the mere mention of the fact that there were four indictments for homicide on the docket, and concluded by saying: "All this has nothing to do with the facts of this case. As said by Mr. Henderson, every case, like every tub, must stand on its own bottom." We think this went very far to correct his error; for he thereby admitted that the other indictments had nothing to do with this case, and that it should be tried on its own merits. After a careful consideration of all the circumstances and the testimony in the case, we do not think appellant is entitled to a new trial on this ground. In Ball v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 85 S. W. 226, the prosecuting attorney said, in his closing argument, that more than a score of men, perhaps, had been killed in the city of the homicide, and nothing had been said about it because the people there were afraid to talk about it; and in Sturgeon v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 102 S. W. 812, the prosecuting attorney said to the jury: "I have tried to do my duty fairly. It remains, gentlemen, for you to do yours; and the records of this court show that there are now confined in the county jail some 23 murderers." In both cases, the court held the remarks were not prejudicial.

In declaring the law of self-defense, the judge charged: "If one man uses bad language, if Duncan used such language to Brooks as might reasonably be expected to bring on a physical encounter, and actually helped to bring on a physical encounter, which resulted in the death of Brooks, then the law closes Duncan's mouth to plead self-defense. That is a matter for the jury to determine. Did Duncan use to Brooks language that was reasonably calculated to bring on a fight, and actually helped to bring it on, and as a result of that fight, was Brooks killed? If so, Duncan is wrong about bringing on the fuss, and cannot plead self-defense."

The errors assigned are: (1) That the jury should have been charged that the defendant would not be deprived of his right of self-defense, "unless the language used by him and his manner of using it were such as to give him personally just reason to suppose that his language to the deceased would probably result in a personal difficulty, and that he actually so believed, or reasonably should have so believed, and that the jury believed he so believed"; and (2), that the charge that if the jury found certain facts to exist, then Duncan was wrong about bringing on the fuss, and could not plead self-defense, was a charge on the facts.

We think both assignments are untenable. It certainly would not do to let the defendant be the sole judge of whether the language used by him might reasonably be expected to bring on a difficulty. The jury were the judges of that fact, just as they were of the fact whether the defendant acted in all other respects as a man of ordinary reason, prudence, and firmness. When the judge said "such language as might reasonably be expected," etc., it certainly conveyed the idea that it must be such as a reasonable man would expect would bring on the difficulty, whether that man was the person using the language, or the person to whom it was used, or any other. The defendant must be required to measure up to the standard of a reasonable man. State v. McKellar, 85 S. C. 236, 67 S. E. 314.

It has been decided too often to require citation of cases that a hypothetical statement of the facts with a statement of the legal result following thereupon, is not a charge upon the facts. During the course of his charge, while explaining the difference between murder and manslaughter, the judge said: "Now, what spirit of the heart did Duncan kill Brooks out of?" It is alleged that this was a charge on the facts, because the judge thereby conveyed to the jury the impression that, in his opinion, Duncan had killed Brooks, which was denied by the defendant, and contested in evidence and argument.

Standing alone, the sentence quoted appears to be obnoxious to the objection urged. But, when it is considered in the connection in which it was used, and in connection with the whole charge, we are satisfied that the jury did not take it as an expression or even an intimation of his honor's opinion. For, in response to defendant's first request, the judge instructed the jury "that should they find that the state has not proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the deceased, William Brooks, came to his death by violence at the hands of the prisoner, Duncan, then they should acquit the prisoner forthwith." Again, after he had charged the requests, and was proceeding to deliver his general charge, he instructed the jury as follows: "Now, the first issue for you is, did Duncan kill Brooks? That lies at the threshold of the case. If Brooks is dead, did Duncan kill him? and that is a matter that you will have to determine from the testimony in the case. You have heard the testimony, and you know the place; you have got your common wits about you, and taking all the testimony into consideration, are you certain beyond a reasonable doubt that Duncan killed Brooks; or, have you a reasonable doubt? If you have a reasonable doubt, stop there and that ends the case."

After submitting that issue to the jury, he then instructed them that, if they were satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Duncan did kill Brooks, they should then proceed to inquire of the circumstances of the killing, and whether it was done in self-defense, or whether it was murder or manslaughter; and, in explaining the difference between murder and manslaughter, the question complained of was asked. The explanation of the law of self-defense and the difference between murder and manslaughter was necessarily based upon the supposition that Duncan killed Brooks. And the judge expressed what had been assumed merely for the purpose of explaining and declaring the law in that view of the case. Under these circumstances, we are satisfied the defendant suffered no prejudice.

On cross-examination of one of defendant's witnesses, the solicitor asked him: "Who supports your wife?" He answered: "She supports herself at the present time. I supported her until a short time ago." On the examination in reply, in response to a question by defendant's counsel, the witness stated that he and his wife did not live together, but were on good terms. Defendant's counsel then asked him the cause of their separation, which, upon objection by the solicitor, was excluded, the judge saying: "It is bad enough to know that she quit him." Error is assigned in refusing to allow the witness to explain why he was separated from his wife, and in making the remark above quoted, which, it is claimed, tended to discredit the witness before the jury. The cause of the separation of the witness and his wife was wholly irrelevant and properly excluded. The remark of the court complained of was not intended and could not have been construed as any reflection upon the character of the witness for veracity or otherwise. Judgment affirmed.

TURBYFILL v. ATLANTA & C. AIR LINE RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1910.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR.

Railroad crossings are inherently dangerous and were so regarded by the law before the statute requiring signboards with the words "railroad crossing" printed thereon, and the blowing of the whistle and ringing of the bell when approaching the crossing, which was enacted not for the purpose of declaring the crossing dangerous, but merely to minimize the danger; hence any error in allowing witnesses, in an action for death at a crossing, to give their opinion as to whether the crossing was dangerous was harmless, both under the statute and common law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161-4170; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for death at a railroad crossing, a charge that if deceased was killed because of neglect to give the statutory signals, and such neglect "contributed to her death" defendant is responsible and must answer in damages, unless deceased was guilty of gross or willful negligence, or was violating the law, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of her death, was not erroneous where from time to time throughout the charge the court charged in effect that when the word "contributed" was used, whether applied to the alleged negligence of the defendant or the contributory negligence of plaintiff, it was necessary that it should be a proximate cause of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-713, 715, 716, 718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for death at a crossing, where the court charged that the Supreme Court has said one of the purposes of requiring the signals to be continued is to give notice of the location of the train and the rapidity of its approach, especially when, "as it is alleged in the case," it cannot be seen on account of a curve or other obstruction, the quoted words were used merely by way of illustration in calling attention to cases where the statute is especially applicable, and did not render the instruction a charge on the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-431, 435; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—ISSUE OF—FOR JURY—WHEN.

The issue of negligence should go to the jury, when the facts which, if true, would constitute evidence of negligence are controverted; when such facts are not disputed, but there may be a fair difference of opinion as to whether the inference of negligence should be drawn; and when the facts are in dispute, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom are doubtful.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 333-346; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS COVERED BY CHARGE GIVEN.

Requested charges substantially covered by a charge given are properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMING FACTS.

In an action for death at a crossing, a charge that in this case the evidence shows that deceased was of age and was living apart from the parent, and as it fails to show that she contributed anything for the support or aid of the parent, no damages can be allowed on this account, was properly refused as being a charge upon the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-431, 435; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1067*)—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

Where the court had already charged on the question of damages substantially as requested, any error in refusing a further charge thereon was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4229; Dec. Dig. § 1067.*]

8. DEATH (§ 86*)—ACTION FOR WRONGFUL DEATH—DAMAGES.

In an action for death at a crossing, it is not essential that the person for whose benefit it is brought should have been dependent on the deceased, or that he should have suffered pecuniary loss, and the amount of the recovery being his absolute property, his life expectancy is not an element of damages to be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 112-114, 119; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—EXCEPTIONS—FAILURE TO ARGUE—REVIEW.

Exceptions not argued on appeal will not be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; J. W. Devore, Judge.

Action by I. M. Turbyfill as administrator of the estate of Belinda R. Hand, deceased, against the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 83 S. C. 325, 65 S. E. 278.

The exceptions referred to in the opinion are as follows:

Exceptions.

It is respectfully submitted, that his honor erred:

1. In allowing the witness, I. M. Turbyfill, to be asked the following questions: "Q. Was that a dangerous crossing or not? Q. Did you consider it so?" And in permitting him, against the objection of the defendant, to answer the same. And also in permitting the following questions to be asked the witness Parker Grier: "Q. Was that a dangerous crossing? Q. Did you consider that a dangerous crossing?" And in permitting the witness to answer the same against the objection of the defendant. And also in permitting the following question to be asked the witness O. N. Moore: "Q. State whether or not that is a dangerous crossing?" And in allowing the witness to answer the question, against the objection of the defendant. The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that this was permitting these witnesses to give their opinion on one of the material issues in the case.

2. In charging the plaintiff's fifth request, to wit: "If the jury find that the deceased was killed at the time and place alleged because of neglect to give the statutory signals, and such neglect contributed to her death, then the defendant is responsible for her death and must answer in damages therefor, unless they further find that the deceased was guilty of gross or willful negligence, or was violating law, and that such gross or willful negligence or violation of the law was the proximate cause of her death." The error being, as it is respectfully submitted: (a) That by this charge his honor instructed the jury substantially that if the deceased was killed at the place alleged because of the neglect of the defendant to give statutory signals, and that such neglect contributed to her death, that the defendant would be liable therefor, thereby leaving the jury to believe that if such neglect contributed in any manner to her death the defendant would be liable; whereas, it is respectfully submitted that his honor should have charged that before the defendant would be liable it must be shown that the neglect to give the statutory signals contributed as a proximate cause to her death. (b) Because his honor further erred in charging this request, because it is respectfully submitted that when his honor charged the jury that the defendant would be liable if the failure to give the statutory signals contributed to the death of the intestate, unless the jury should further find that the deceased was guilty of gross or willful negligence, or was violating the law, and that such gross or willful negligence or violation of the law was the proximate cause of her death, he, in substance, charged and instructed them that gross or willful negligence or violation of law on the part of the plaintiff before it would exonerate the defendant must be "the proximate cause of her death;" thus substantially charging them that this gross or willful negligence or violation of law on the part of the deceased must be the sole cause of her death; whereas, it is respectfully submitted, that even if the defendant was guilty of violating the statute, and even if such violation did contribute as "a proximate cause" to her death, yet that the defendant would not be liable if the deceased was guilty of gross or willful negligence which contributed as "a proximate" cause to her death.

3. Because, as it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in charging the plaintiff's twelfth request, to wit: "I charge you further that the Supreme Court of our state has said, 'One of the purposes of requiring the signals to be continued is to give notice of the location of the train and the rapidity of its approach, especially when, as it is alleged in this case it cannot be seen on account of a curve or other obstructions.'” The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that by this charge his honor charged upon the facts, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of 1895, and intimated to the jury that the train could not be seen by the deceased on account of a curve or other obstruction. Whereas, it is respectfully submitted, this was one of the material facts in the case to be determined by the jury from the evidence introduced, and his honor erred in so charging.

4. Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in refusing to charge the defendant's third request, to wit: “(3) The object of the law in requiring a railroad company to ring the bell or sound the whistle of an engine for 500 yards continuously before reaching a crossing is to give notice of the approach of the engine, its location, and the rapidity of its approach, to persons expecting to cross the track at the crossing, but if a person who is expecting to cross the track at such crossing knows that the train is approaching, knows its location and the rapidity of its approach, by any other means, then the object of the statute has been accomplished; and if a person, with the knowledge that a train is approaching within 500 yards, and knows its location, and the rapidity of its approach, does enter on the track without exercising ordinary care and caution and is injured by collision with the train, and if it appears that the failure to exercise ordinary care and caution contributed to the injury, it cannot be said that the failure to ring the bell or sound the whistle caused the injury.” The errors being, as it is respectfully submitted: (a) That this was a sound proposition of law applicable to the facts in the case, and his honor erred in not submitting the question to the jury and in allowing them to determine whether if a party, intending to cross a railway track, knew of the approach of the train, its location and the rapidity of its approach by means other than the giving of the signals required by the statute, was required to exercise ordinary care and caution before entering on the track; and, further, that his honor by refusing to charge this request took from the jury and prevented them from determining whether a person intending to cross the track, and who knew of the approach of its engine, its location, and the rapidity of its approach, by means other than by the giving of the signals required by the statute, would be guilty of such contributory negligence as would defeat a recovery. It being respectfully submitted that when a person does know of the approach of an engine, its location, and the rapidity of its approach, either by sight or hearing, or by any other means other than the giving of the signals required by the statute, and that notwithstanding such knowledge the person does enter upon the track and is injured, it then becomes a question for the jury to determine whether or not such person failed to exercise ordinary care and caution, and whether such person was guilty of such contributory negligence as would exonerate the railroad company. (b) That his honor overlooked the distinction existing between the common law and the statute in actions of this kind, and limited the jury to the consideration of the defense under the statute.

5. Because his honor erred in failing to charge defendant's fourth request, to wit: “(4) If a person who expects to cross a railway track at a crossing knows of the approach of the train, that it is within 500 yards of such crossing, knows its locality, and the rapidity of its approach, and such knowledge is derived either from the ringing of the bell or the sounding of the whistle continuously for 500 yards before the train reaches such crossing, or because the person saw and heard the train for this distance, then it is the duty of such person to exercise ordinary care and caution to avoid coming into collision with the train, and if he fails to exercise ordinary care and caution, and such failure contributes or aids or helps in producing the injury—that is, if it combines and concurs with the negligence of the railroad company in causing an injury—there can be no recovery.” The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that by refusing this request his honor took from the jury the question of the contributory negligence of the deceased and her failure to exercise ordinary care and caution, provided the jury found from the facts that the deceased had knowledge of the approach of the engine within 500 yards, its location, and the rapidity of its approach; whereas, it is respectfully submitted, that this request was a sound proposition of law, applicable to the facts of the case, and should have been submitted to the jury; and, further, as it is respectfully submitted, it is the duty of a person who expects to cross a railway track, and who sees or knows that a train is approaching within 500 yards, and who knows the location of the engine and the rapidity of its approach, to exercise ordinary care and caution to avoid coming into collision with the train, and that the failure of a person so situated and under such circumstances to exercise ordinary care and caution is contributory negligence, and if such person does fail under such circumstances to exercise ordinary care and caution, and such failure does combine and concur with the negligence of the railroad company as a proximate cause in bringing about the injury there should be no recovery, and his honor erred in not so instructing the jury.

6. Because his honor erred, as it is respectfully submitted, in refusing to charge defendant's sixth request, to wit: “(6) If a person carelessly leaves a safe place and carelessly goes into a place of danger when, by the exercise of slight care, such person could and would know that it was dangerous, then such person may be said to have been guilty of gross negligence, because the failure to exercise slight care is gross negligence." It being respectfully submitted that this request embodied a sound proposition of law applicable to the facts in this case, and his honor erred in not so charging the jury. It being respectfully submitted that this request embodied a correct definition of what is gross negligence, and this being one of the material defenses of the defendant, his honor, we respectfully submit, erred in not so defining gross negligence and in refusing to charge this request.

7. Because his honor erred, as it is respectfully submitted, in refusing to charge defendant's fourteenth request, to wit: "(14) The failure to stop, look and listen before entering upon a highway crossing, where it contributes as a proximate cause to an injury, is contributory negligence." The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that under the decisions of this court, where the failure to stop, look and listen before entering on a railroad track contributes as a proximate cause to the injury, such failure is contributory negligence, and his honor erred in not so instructing and charging the jury, and that by so refusing his honor took from the jury the question whether there was a failure to stop, look and listen on the part of the deceased, and whether such failure—if it existed—contributed as a proximate cause to her injury, thereby leaving the jury to believe that even though the deceased did fail to stop, look, and listen before entering upon the highway crossing, and even though such failure contributed as a proximate cause to her injury, that still she would not be guilty of contributory negligence.

8. Because his honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's fifteenth request: "(15) If a person is injured by collision with a train at a highway crossing, and if the evidence shows that such person failed to stop, look, and listen before going on the track, and that if he had stopped, looked, and listened he would have known that he could not cross without great danger of being injured, then the failure to stop, look, and listen—if they existed—may be said to have contributed as a proximate cause to the injury." It being respectfully submitted that this request embodied a sound proposition of law applicable to the facts of this case and should have been charged; and, further, that by such refusal his honor, as it is respectfully submitted, erred, in that by refusing this request he took from the jury the question whether the failure on the part of the deceased to stop, look and listen—if such existed—before going on the track was contributory negligence on her part, such as would defeat a recovery, even though she might have known or did know that she could not cross without great danger of being injured. Whereas, it is respectfully submitted that, in any case brought to recover damages by collision with an engine at a highway crossing, if the evidence shows that there was a failure to stop, look, and listen before going on the track, and that if such person had stopped, looked, and listened he would know that he could not cross without great danger of being injured, then the failure to stop, look, and listen—if they existed—is contributory negligence, and the jury should have been so instructed.

9. Because, as it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's sixteenth request, to wit: "(16) If the evidence shows that a person intending to cross a railway track could, by the exercise of slight care, have seen and known that it was very dangerous to attempt to cross such track, then if the evidence shows that such person failed to exercise slight care, and that this failure contributed as a proximate cause to an injury by collision with a train, there can be no recovery, even though the signals were not given as the statute required." The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that this was a sound proposition of law applicable to this case and should have been charged. It being respectfully submitted that it is the duty of a person intending to cross a railway track to at least exercise slight care to know whether it is very dangerous to attempt to cross such track, and if in any case the evidence does show that the person injured did fail to exercise slight care, and that such failure did contribute as a proximate cause to an injury by collision with a train, then there can be no recovery, even though the company did fail to give the signals as the statute required, and his honor, as it is respectfully submitted, erred in not so instructing the jury.

10. Because, as it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's third request on the measure of damages, to wit: "(3) In this case the evidence shows that the deceased was of age and that she was living apart from the parent, and as the evidence fails to show that the deceased contributed anything, either in money or services, for the support or aid of the parent, no damages can be allowed on this account." The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that as there was no evidence in this case showing, or tending to show, that the mother, for whose benefit this action is brought, received anything from the deceased, either in money or by way of service for her support or aid, and the evidence further showing, beyond contradiction, that the mother was living apart from the deceased, his honor erred in refusing this request, thereby permitting the jury in their estimate of damages to include the loss of money and the services of the deceased.

11. Because his honor, as it is respectfully submitted, refused to charge the defendant's sixth request, on the question of damages, to wit: "(6) The action in this case is brought for the benefit of the parent, and in considering what amount of damages should be allowed—if the jury determine that any should be allowed at all—the jury should take into consideration the age of the parent, and as the parent could not receive any aid, or support, or assistance, or comfort beyond her life the jury should not render a verdict for an amount which would extend beyond the life of such parent; that is to say, they should not allow damages for a length of time beyond which they think the parent might reasonably be expected to live." The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that this action being brought for the benefit of a parent over 60 years of age, and the statute providing that the jury can only give such damages as are proportionate to the injury sustained by the party for whose benefit the action is brought, his honor should have instructed the jury that in estimating the damages done the beneficiary—the mother in this case—they should not allow any damages for a time beyond which such beneficiary might reasonably be expected to live, and that by refusing this request his honor permitted the jury to give damages for an unlimited time; whereas, it is respectfully submitted that the injury or damages done the beneficiary by the wrongful death of the deceased must of necessity cease at the death of the beneficiary, and the jury should have been instructed as the defendant requested.

12. Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in not charging the defendant's first request as to the contributory negligence of the deceased, without modification, to wit: "(1) It is the duty of a person who is approaching a railroad crossing, known to be dangerous, to be on the alert and to be vigilant to avoid being injured;" and in modifying the same by inserting the words, "if he knows it." The error being, as it is respectfully submitted: (a) That by this modification his honor led the jury to believe that it was not the duty of a person attempting to cross a railroad track at a highway crossing to be on the alert and to be vigilant to avoid being injured, unless such person had actual knowledge that such crossing was dangerous. It being respectfully submitted that it is the duty of a person who is attempting to cross a railroad track, at any time or place, to be on the alert and to be vigilant to avoid being injured, and his honor erred in not charging this request as it was written. (b) That by this modification his honor overlooked the distinction as to the rights and liabilities of the parties, under the statute and under the common law.

13. Because, as it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in modifying the defendant's second request as to the contributory negligence of the deceased, to wit: "(2) A person who is approaching a railroad crossing known to be dangerous—if the exercise of due care and caution demands it—should be on the alert and should stop, look, and listen before entering on the track, and if such person does enter on the track without exercising such care as ordinary caution, under the circumstances, would demand, and his failure to exercise such care combines and concurs with the negligence of the railroad company as a proximate cause in producing the injury, then the jury would have a right to find that such person was guilty of contributory negligence." And in modifying the same by inserting the words "and knows it." The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that his honor by this modification led the jury to believe that a person attempting to cross a railroad track at a highway crossing was not required to stop, look, and listen, if due care and caution demanded it, unless such person had actual knowledge that such crossing was dangerous; whereas, it is respectfully submitted, it is the duty of a person at all times, in attempting to cross a railroad track, if the exercise of due care and caution demands it, to be on the alert and to stop, look, and listen before entering on the track, even though such person may not have actual knowledge of the fact that such crossing is dangerous, and his honor should have charged the request as submitted without modification.

14. Because his honor erred in charging the plaintiff's eleventh request to charge, to wit: "(11) I charge you that if you should find that the deceased saw and heard the train, or should, by the exercise of care, have seen and heard it, nevertheless this would not deprive the plaintiff of the right to recover and would not relieve the defendant from the obligations and penalties of the law, if he failed to give the signals as required by the statute, unless you further find that the deceased was guilty of gross or willful negligence, or was at the time violating the law." The error being, as it is respectfully submitted: (a) That by this charge his honor instructed the jury that if the defendant failed to give the signals, and notwithstanding this, yet if the deceased saw and heard the train, the plaintiff in this action could recover, unless the deceased was guilty of gross or willful negligence, or was at the time violating the law; whereas, it is respectfully submitted, that if the deceased saw and heard the train it was not necessary for the defendant to show that she was guilty of gross or willful negligence or was violating the law in order to prevent a recovery. (b) That by this charge his honor overlooked the distinction between the right of the plaintiff to recover under the statute and under the common law, thereby limiting the scope of the defense to the evidence required under the statute, and preventing the jury from considering the evidence as to the contributory negligence of the deceased under the common law.

Sanders & De Pass, for appellant. Wilson & Osborne, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained through the wrongful acts of the defendant, in causing the death of plaintiff's intestate.

The complaint alleges: That at Duncans, S. C., the railroad crosses the public highway. That on the 9th day of November, 1906, Miss Belinda Rutledge Hand, was traveling along said highway, when she was struck and killed at said crossing, by the engine of a train, operated by the Southern Railway Company, under and by virtue of its lease or other contract, with the defendant company. That her death was caused by the negligence, recklessness, and wantonness of the defendant, through said Southern Railway Company, in the following respects: (a) The train was off schedule time by several hours, and was running within a few minutes of the schedule time of train No. 11, for which latter train Duncans Station was a regular stopping station, the place of stopping being east of said highway. (b) The train approached said crossing at a very great and excessive rate of speed, some 60 miles an hour, notwithstanding the fact that by reason of the curves of the track east of the crossing and obstructing buildings along the line or side of the track, that crossing was such as to demand of approaching trains a slow rate of speed, of which fact said operating company had been repeatedly notified, warned, and cautioned by municipal authorities of said town for the protection of its residents, which notifications and warnings were willfully and wantonly disregarded. (c) The bell was not rung, nor whistle sounded by the engineer or fireman of said train, at a distance of 500 yards from said crossing, nor kept ringing or whistling, until the engineer had crossed said highway; such omission being in violation of the statute law of the state. (d) In having no one at said crossing to warn or inform her of the approach of said train, as ordinary prudence required for a train approaching such a crossing at such an excessive speed. (e) Neither the engineer nor fireman were looking ahead down the track, as was their duty, which neglect contributed as a direct cause to said injury.

The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint and set up the defenses of contributory negligence and assumption of risk. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $4,700, and the defendant appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported.

First exception. In their argument the appellant's attorneys say: "If this action was brought under the statute alone, on account of the failure to ring the bell or blow the whistle, the admission of this evidence, might have been harmless, but the complaint contains allegations of common law, as well as of statutory negligence." Railroad crossings are inherently dangerous, and were so regarded by the law, before the statute was enacted. The statutory provisions were not enacted for the purpose of declaring the crossing to be dangerous, but to minimize the danger, by requiring signboards with the words "railroad crossing" printed thereon, and the blowing of the whistle and the ringing of the bell, when approaching the crossing. Therefore, even if the ruling was erroneous, it was harmless, both as to the statutory and common-law causes of action.

Second exception. This part of the charge is free from error when considered in connection with other portions thereof. Time and again throughout the charge his honor, the presiding judge, instructed the jury, in effect, that when the word "contributed," whether applied to the alleged negligence of the defendant or the contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, it was necessary that it should be a proximate cause of the injury. We deem it only necessary to cite two instances: "A railway company may fail to ring the bell or sound the whistle, as the statute required, and such failure might contribute to an injury, but unless such failure does more than merely contribute to the injury, there can be no recovery, because our Supreme Court has said that such failure must contribute as a proximate cause to the injury complained of; otherwise there can be no recovery." "If it appears that a person was injured by collision with a railway train at a highway crossing, and that such person failed to exercise slight care, and that such failure on the part of the injured person, to exercise slight care combined and concurred in any degree whatsoever with the failure of the railway company to ring the bell or sound the whistle, as required by the statute, as a proximate cause in producing the injury, then there can be no recovery against the railway company, on account of the failure to ring the bell or sound the whistle, as the statute requires."

These were requests which were charged by the presiding judge. The case of Lee v. Ry., 84 S. C. 125, 65 S. E. 1031, shows that even if there was error in the use of the word "contributed," it was rendered harmless by the charge embodied in said request. In that case the court said: "His honor struck out the word 'caused,' and substituted for it, the words 'contributed to.' This charge made the language of the request conform to the language of the statute. It would have been error if his honor had not already charged the jury the plaintiff's seventh request, to wit: 'When the law speaks of an act of negligence as contributing to the injury, it means as a direct and proximate cause thereof, without which the injury would not have occurred.' This court has held that 'when the law speaks of an act of negligence as contributing to an injury, it means as a direct and proximate cause thereof'—citing Bowen v. Ry., 58 S. C. 222, 36 S. E. 590, Burns v. Ry., 65 S. C. 234, 43 S. E. 679, Duncan v. Greenville County, 73 S. C. 254, 53 S. E. 367, Turbyfill v. Ry., 83 S. C. 325, 65 S. E. 278."

Third exception. The words, "as it is alleged in this case," were used merely by way of illustration, in calling attention to cases, where the statute is specially applicable.

Fourth, fifth, seventh, and eighth exceptions. "The issue of negligence should go to the jury: (1) When the facts which, if true, would constitute evidence of negligence are controverted. (2) When such facts are not disputed, but there may be a fair difference of opinion, as to whether the inference of negligence should be drawn. (3) When the facts are in dispute, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom are doubtful." 16 Enc. of Law, 465 et seq. (1st Ed.); Whaley v. Stevens, 27 S. C. 549, 4 S. E. 145; State v. Aughtry, 49 S. C. 305, 26 S. E. 619, 27 S. E. 199; Lampley v. Ry., 71 S. C. 156, 50 S. E. 773; Pickens v. Ry., 54 S. C. 498, 32 S. E. 567; Rinake v. Victor Mfg. Co., 55 S. C. 179, 32 S. E. 983; Wood v. Mfg. Co., 66 S. C. 482, 45 S. E. 81; Weaver v. Ry., 76 S. C. 49, 56 S. E. 657, 121 Am. St. Rep. 934; Turbyfill v. Ry., 83 S. C. 325, 65 S. E. 278.

On the former hearing in this case (83 S. C. 325, 65 S. E. 278), the court had under consideration exceptions raising similar questions, and overruled them, on the ground that they were concluded by the case of Weaver v. Ry., 76 S. C. 49, 56 S. E. 657, 121 Am. St. Rep. 934, in which the court said: "The presiding judge could not have charged the request, without intimating to the jury the inference to be drawn from the facts, therein so carefully set out in detail. The instructions would have been in violation of article 5, § 26, of the Constitution, and were therefore properly refused."

Sixth and ninth exceptions. These exceptions are overruled on the ground that the refusal to charge the requests therein mentioned was not error, because they had already been substantially charged in the first request of the defendant, which was submitted to the jury.

Tenth exception. In the first place, this request would have been a charge upon the facts, and in the second place, the presiding judge charged the defendant's first, second, fourth, and fifth requests relative to the measure of damages, which show that even if there was error in refusing the third request, it was not prejudicial to the rights of the appellant.

Eleventh exception. The ruling of the presiding judge is sustained by the case of Trimmer v. Ry., 81 S. C. 213, 62 S. E. 209. Upon request, the appellant's attorneys were granted permission to review that case, as to this question. The court, however, adheres to the doctrine therein announced.

Twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth exceptions. The appellant's attorneys have not argued these exceptions; therefore they will not be considered.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. NEWTON et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 5, 1910.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1026*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—HARMLESS ERROR.

Rulings complained of must not only be erroneous, but they must materially affect the rights of the party complaining.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4029; Dec. Dig. § 1026.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1046*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where the result would have been the same whether the language of the circuit judge in his opinion complained of was stricken out or allowed to remain, the language of the judge was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4134; Dec. Dig. § 1046.*]

3. WILLS (§ 17*)—DEVISE TO ILLEGITIMATE CHILD—RIGHT OF SURVIVING WIFE.

A husband living in a sister state, deserted his wife and daughter there, and purchased land in South Carolina and had the same conveyed to a trustee for his benefit and to those he might direct by will. He subsequently executed a will whereby he gave all his property to a bastard child. His legitimate daughter died during his lifetime. Held that, under Civ. Code 1902, § 2487, limiting the amount of property devisable to illegitimate children to one-fourth of testator's estate, the surviving wife was entitled to a half of three-fourths of his entire estate; so that only the remainder would pass under the will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 40-42; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—QUESTIONS NOT ARGUED.

An exception not argued will not be considered on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 931*)—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

Where the referee sustained objections to testimony and there was nothing in the record to show that the circuit judge reversed the rulings, a party could not urge that such testimony was received; for, in the absence of any showing, it must be presumed that the circuit judge discarded incompetent testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3766; Dec. Dig. § 931.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 731*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY.

An assignment that the circuit judge erred in forestalling the referee in the judgment of facts yet to be proved is too general to be considered on appeal.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Action by Mary B. Williams against R. C. Newton and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 84 S. C. 98, 65 S. E. 959.

The following is the decree of the circuit judge and the exceptions thereto:

Frank Williams and Mary Blaine Gillespie were married in West Virginia about the year 1868, and lived together for many years. One child was born to them, who died many years ago after reaching maturity. About the year 1887 Frank Williams left his wife and daughter and engaged in railroad construction in several states, and finally about 1890 or 1891 he came to South Carolina and built the bridge of the C. S. & N. R. R. over the Great Pee Dee river. While engaged in this work he formed a little illicit connection with a woman named Mary Jane Quick, which resulted in the birth of an illegitimate son, Frank Quick, the principal defendant herein. Williams lived a depraved life thereafter and seems to have absolutely deserted his wife and children. They were reduced to straits for a livelihood in their distant home and kept a boarding house where the daughter, deprived of a father's protection and restraining care, fell into evil ways. The wife, according to the testimony of Frank Williams' nephew, J. S. Williams, who lived near her in West Virginia, as well as other witnesses, her neighbors, bore a good reputation and lived a correct life. Yet Frank Williams, in his voluntary absence from them, denounced both his wife and daughter to strangers with foulest accusations and in vilest language. He repeatedly expressed his determination that they should have nothing of his property, and he appears to have cherished this as a fixed purpose and set about a concerted plan to carry it out. He purchased two tracts of land in Marlboro county, where he made his home, and had them conveyed to C. S. McCall as trustee, to hold "for the sole" use and benefit of the said Frank Williams, allowing him the absolute "use and control thereof, and make title to same to whomsoever the said" Williams may at any time direct, either by written indorsement thereon "during his life or by his last will duly made." This deed bears date July 27, 1900. The said Frank Williams executed his last will on January 8, 1902, and having died shortly thereafter, said will was duly admitted to probate. By his last will he appointed C. S. McCall his executor and directed him to "take charge of any property of which I may die seised" and possessed, "or of which I may have the power of disposition, to be disposed of as hereinafter provided for." Then referring to the deed above set out, the testator declared his intention that the will be construed in connection with and as supplementary to the deed, and in case of conflict between the two documents that the manifest intention of the deed shall prevail. By said will he, in effect, gives in trust for the use and benefit of Frank Quick aforesaid and his heirs all his property of every kind, including the real estate mentioned in the said deed, with contingent remainder over to William Williams, the testator's brother.

This action was commenced in September, 1904, against C. S. McCall, as trustee and executor, Frank Quick, and William Williams. C. S. McCall died shortly afterwards and R. C. Newton was appointed trustee by the court and substituted as a defendant. The complaint sets forth two causes of action, first, for dower; second, to annul said will in so far as it attempts to give to the bastard son of the testator more than one-fourth part of the real, clear value of the estate of Frank Williams. On demurrer that these two causes of action are improperly united the court sustained the demurrer and ordered that the cause be divided into two separate and distinct actions. On appeal by defendants this order was affirmed. 82 S. C. 227, 64 S. E. 219.

The case was tried before me on the second of said actions. The trustee alone seems to have answered to the merits. His answer puts in issue practically all the allegations of the complaint, and as special defense alleges that the plaintiff has assigned and transferred all the interest claimed by her in this case to another, and that she has no legal status in this action. With reference to this last-mentioned defense it may be said here that no competent evidence was offered in support of it. The only testimony offered upon it was that R. C. Newton, the defendant, who was permitted to testify over repeated objections of plaintiff's counsel, to certain statements made to him by his own attorney of declarations made to said attorney by the plaintiff. This was bold hearsay and the objections to it should have been and are now sustained. This defense is overruled.

The case was referred to a referee to take and report the testimony and "to make a statement of the account in accordance with the contention of each party and report the same." From this order the defendants appealed, and on motion, the appeal was dismissed. 84 S. C. 98, 65 S. E. 959.

The opinion and judgment of the Supreme Court dismissing the said appeal was filed October 29, 1906. Promptly thereafter the referee proceeded to hold reference for the purpose of executing the said order of reference. After devoting two days to the case and taking such testimony as was offered by plaintiff, the defendants offering no testimony, the plaintiff moved the referee to adjourn the reference and report the testimony in time for a hearing at the then approaching term of court. This motion the referee refused, and thereafter the plaintiff moved the court, on due notice, to vacate the order of reference and to proceed with the trial of the case upon the testimony already taken in the case de bene esse and that taken by the referee, together with much as might be offered at the trial by either side. This motion was heard by me. The history of the litigation in the case impressed me that the defendants were delaying the trial of the cause by every practicable device. Frank Williams died in January, 1902, nearly eight years ago. This action was commenced in September, 1904, and has been pending more than five years with no other progress than the determination of two dilatory appeals by the defendants, both of which have been decided against them, and the partial taking of the testimony. The unreadiness of the defendants or their unwillingness to proceed prevented the referee from completing his duties under the order of reference in the two days which he devoted to the case. The plaintiff is a woman advanced in years and said to be in needy circumstances. The peculiar nature of the case and the provisions of the statutes make it highly probable that her rights, if she has any, will be entirely lost unless determined in her lifetime—certainly any benefit to her will be. She has been thwarted by the dilatory tactics of the defendants for five years since she began to assert her rights. The delay which has already supervened is a reproach to the administration of justice. Further unnecessary delay would be a denial of justice. These considerations constrained me to order a final reference and report by the referee and the trial of the case before me, under the provisions of the order which appears in the record.

The testimony fully establishes the material allegations of the complaint and brings the case clearly within the provisions of the statute of 1795 (5 St. at Large, p. 271, § 4; sections 2368 and 2487 of Civ. Code, 1902). The fact that the testator resorted to the device of a trust and the intervention of a trustee can make no difference in the result. Gore v. Clarke, 37 S. C. 537, 16 S. E. 614, 20 L. R. A. 465, and cases therein cited. This seems to have been a part of his plan to evade the statutes and cut his wife and children out of any part of his estate. The daughter seems to have died before her father, so that the wife alone now invokes the statute which will interfere with the disposition of his property by the testator.

It was long ago determined by the court, and the decision has been reaffirmed in many subsequent cases, that the statute insures to the protection of his only wife and legitimate children, and that next of kin, even grandchildren, cannot invoke the benefit of its provisions. Breithaupt v. Bauskett, 1 Rich. Eq. 485. The act of 1795 was copied verbatim in the modification of 1872, in the chapter on conveyances at page 425, and again at page 444 in the chapter on wills, with modification to suit the subjects. The same arrangement was followed in the General Statutes of 1882, §§ 1785 and 1866, but in the former section the words "only in favor of wife and legitimate children" were interpreted as an amendment, thus formally enacting the construction given to the act by the court. His arrangement with the amendment appears in the revisions of 1893, §§ 1887, 1999, and in the Civil Code of 1902, §§ 2368 and 2487. So that in the present case it is clear that the testamentary provisions are to be treated as void only to the extent of the interest of the wife, and are good against all the world besides.

The statute recognizes as valid the legacy and devise to the extent of one-fourth of the estate even as against the wife. So that her interest is the remaining three-fourths, and as to that it is the same as if her husband had died intestate. Breithaupt v. Bauskett, supra. That is to say, under the statute of distributions the plaintiff, as the widow of Frank Williams, would be entitled to one-half of three-fourths of his entire estate if he had made no attempt to dispose of so much of it by his will; and such is the extent of her interest as against the will. The remaining five-eighths of the estate must go according to the dispositions made of it by the testator.

It is so adjudged and decreed.

The following are the grounds of appeal on the part of the defendants R. C. Newton, trustee, and Frank Quick:

1. Because his honor erred in finding that the defendants unduly obstructed the progress of the case.

2. Because he erred in taking the case away from the referee and ordering it on for trial on the ground that all the delays had been caused by the defendants, and the appellants allege that this was an abuse of his discretionary powers as chancellor.

3. Because he erred in holding that the history of the litigation in the case showed that the defendants were delaying the trial by every practicable device.

4. Because his honor erred in holding that the unreadiness of defendants or their unwillingness to proceed prevented the referee from completing his duties under the order of reference.

5. Because his honor erred in holding that the plaintiff had been thwarted by the dilatory tactics of the defendant for over five years since she began to assert her rights, and that the delay which has already super-vened is a reproach to the administration of justice.

6. Because his honor erred in finding that the plaintiff was in needy circumstances; there being no proof on this point.

7. Because his honor erred in holding that the case came within the provisions of the statute of 1795 (sections 2368 and 2487 of Civil Code of 1902), when he could have held that the testator, Frank Williams, never did have any title to the property in question and only had the power of appointment.

8. Because his honor erred in not holding that the contingent remainders created by the will of Frank Williams defeated any claim that the plaintiff might have under the statute.

9. Because his honor erred in holding that the title was vested in Frank Williams, and that the widow was entitled to dower; it being respectfully submitted that the question of dower was not before him.

10. Because his honor erred in animadverting upon the conduct of the defense, as it is respectfully submitted that his animadversions were without foundation in fact, and that the record shows that the defense has been conducted upon a plane of professional honor and duty, and the appellants respectfully ask that this court order the same expunged from the record, both as regards the trustee and the attorneys in the case.

11. Because the presiding judge erred in sustaining the referee who admitted the depositions over objection of attorneys for defendants, and for allowing the depositions to be opened; it being respectfully submitted that the envelope enclosing the depositions taken in North Carolina showed that it had not been taken before Charles Strayhouse, Esq., clerk of the court of Orange county, in the state of North Carolina, according to the notice given for the taking of the depositions; but that they were taken, as shown by the indorsement by a commissioner, and further that there was no indication of seal on the envelope, and further did not show that the testimony as taken by him and kept in his hands until the depositions were deposited in the postoffice, as required by law.

12. Because the presiding judge sustained the ruling of the referee in allowing the parentage of the defendant to be proven by hearsay and reputation, it being submitted that under the allegations of the complaint it was error to admit general reputation and hearsay on this point; it being error to hold that bastardy is provable by reputation.

13. Because his honor erred in forestalling the referee in his judgment of facts yet to be proven.

Newton & Owens, for appellants. Livingston & Muller, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The complaint alleges two causes of action, one for dower, and the other, to have the bill of the testator declared a nullity, in so far as it attempts to give to his illegitimate son more than one-fourth of his real estate.

The facts are fully stated in the decree of his honor, the circuit judge, which will be incorporated in the report of the case. The defendant appealed upon exceptions which will also be reported.

The first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and tenth exceptions cannot be sustained, for the reason that it is not only incumbent upon the appellant to show that the rulings were erroneous but also that they materially affected his rights. Whether the language of which the appellant complains is struck out or allowed to remain, the result would not be changed. It cannot therefore be successfully contended, that the remarks of the circuit judge were prejudicial to the rights of the appellant.

The seventh and eighth exceptions are overruled, for the reasons stated in the decree.

The ninth exception was not argued; therefore it will not be considered.

The eleventh exception cannot be sustained, as there is nothing in the record showing that the envelope containing the depositions was not sealed and properly indorsed. It is true the appellant's attorneys made the objection to the admissibility of the depositions on said grounds, but the respondent's attorneys contended that they were properly sealed and indorsed; the referee and circuit judge so ruled, and the appellant has failed to show that the ruling was erroneous.

The twelfth exception must be overruled on the ground it appears from the record that the referee sustained all objections to testimony, tending to prove the illegitimacy of the son by general reputation; also that he ruled out all declarations of the mother, tending to show that Frank Quick was a bastard. There is nothing in the record showing that the circuit judge reversed the rulings of the referee in this request. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, it is to be presumed that the circuit judge, in reaching his conclusions, discarded all incompetent testimony. Williams v. Halford, 73 S. C. 119, 53 S. E. 88. Furthermore, not only were there circumstances tending to prove that Frank Quick was illegitimate, but there was likewise positive testimony to that effect, which was introduced without objection.

The thirteenth exception is too general to be considered; but waiving such objection, it has not been made to appear that the ruling was prejudicial to the rights of the appellant.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

CORDRAY v. SAVANNAH UNION STATION CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 629, 657, 659)—EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 56*)—CERTIFICATION—SUPPLEMENTARY CERTIFICATE—REMITTING TO LOWER COURT FOR ADDITIONAL CERTIFICATION.

Where the judge of the superior court signed a bill of exceptions as of a certain date, after the rendition of the judgment to which exception was taken, there is no provision of law for counsel to suggest that such certificate did not speak the truth in this respect, and for this court to require the judge to make an additional certificate as to the time when and the circumstances under which he signed the original certificate, with a view to determining whether it was signed within due time after the judgment was rendered, or was filed within the time prescribed by the statute after it was signed.

(a) This court has held that, when the judge of the superior court has signed a certificate to a bill of exceptions, he has exhausted his power in that regard, and cannot add a supplementary certificate explanatory of the first. Woolf v. State, 104 Ga. 536, 30 S. E. 796. See, also, Dyson v. Southern Ry. Co., 113 Ga. 327 (3), 38 S. E. 749.

(b) This case does not fall within the exception to this rule provided by the act of August 22, 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 84). In this connection, see Jones v. State, 127 Ga. 281, 56 S. E. 453.

(c) If it were permissible, generally, to return a bill of exceptions to the presiding judge for further certification, it would not be done in a case where the motion for that purpose states that the judge, "at the suggestion of counsel, antedated said bill as of May 4th, the date upon which the same had been tendered to the judge originally."

(d) Section 5557 of the Civil Code has reference to defects which can be removed during the term. If supplemental certificates were allowed to be made by a judge to a bill of exceptions, the limitations prescribed by the statute upon the time within which he should certify thereto would be practically destroyed.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 660, 663*)—BILLS OF EXCEPTION—REMITTING FOR CLERK'S ADDITIONAL CERTIFICATION.

The act of a clerk in filing or transmitting a paper does not stand on the same basis as the act of the judge in signing the certificate to the bill of exceptions, which, with the bill of exceptions, constitutes the writ of error. Generally, upon proper suggestion, made in due time, that the date of filing entered by the clerk upon the bill of exceptions was erroneous, the clerk will be ordered to certify to this court the correct date of filing. But his certificate cannot be traversed, or extrinsic evidence be introduced to combat it. McDaniel v. Columbus Fertilizer Co., 109 Ga. 284 (1), 34 S. E. 598.

(a) Where counsel stated in his place that there was an error in the date of the entry of filing entered by the clerk on the bill of exceptions, and moved that this court order the clerk to certify as to what was the correct date of such filing, and thereupon adverse counsel produced a certificate, under seal, of the deputy clerk who made the entry, stating that it was correctly made, and on the date when the paper was handed to him for filing, and that there was no error in the entry, this court will decline to grant the motion to require a further certificate from the deputy clerk covering the same ground.

(b) No such application was made in this case, as in the case of Cooper v. Nisbet, 118 Ga. 872, 45 S. E. 692.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2844-2847, 2853, 2855; Dec. Dig. §§ 680, 683.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 627*)—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—TIME FOR FILING.

The certificate to the bill of exceptions being dated May 4, 1909, and the filing having taken place on May 24th, it was not filed within the time prescribed by law, and the writ of error must be dismissed. Civ. Code, § 5554; Jones v. State, 127 Ga. 281, 56 S. E. 453.

WORKINGMEN'S UNION ASS'N et al. v. REYNOLDS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)CORPORATIONS (§ 189)—ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 70*)—ACTIONS—AUTHORITY TO BRING—PLEADING—DEMURRER.

The court committed error in dismissing the petition upon general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 706-722; Dec. Dig. § 189; Attorney and Client*, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by the Workingmen's Union Association and others against J. S. Reynolds and others. From a judgment dismissing the petition on demurrer, plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

A complaint was brought in the name of a corporation and certain individuals as members thereof, making substantially the following allegations: The corporation is an order "charitable and social in its nature and purposes, and was not organized for individual pecuniary profit and gain." Eighteen named members of the corporation falsely and fraudulently conspired for the purpose of excluding all other members thereof, consisting of about 800 in number, from having any voice in the control of the corporation, and for the further purpose of selling its property and distributing among themselves the proceeds of the sale, "and thereby to injure and defraud said corporation and your petitioners as members thereof." As a part of the fraudulent scheme the defendant members of the order sent to a large number of its members a notice that they were due the corporation a specified sum, and, unless it was paid at the time and place of a called meeting in the city of Savannah, such members would be expelled from the order. About 800 members of the order appeared in response to the notice, but were prevented from attending such meeting by the police of Savannah at the instance of the defendant members, who notified the police that those appearing in response to the notice would come for the purpose of creating disorder and violating the law, and they were thereby prevented from an opportunity of protesting against said notices and from participating in the proceedings for which the meeting was called, and from protesting against the claim that they owed the society anything. The defendant members were the only ones present at the called meeting, and they decided to sell a certain piece of real estate belonging to the association. In pursuance of a resolution passed by the defendant members at a subsequent meeting, the property was sold for $2,300 to John F. Jones, who participated in the design of the defendant members to defraud the association. Certain of the defendant members, fraudulently claiming to be officers of the association, but not lawful officers thereof, executed to Jones a deed to the property in the name of the corporation. The defendant members, after paying "the recorded indebtedness of the association against the property" out of the purchase money, distributed the balance thereof among themselves. The defendant members were not the true and lawful representatives of the corporation, and had no right to bind it in the deed, and the "transaction was ultra vires the rights and powers of the corporation." It was prayed that the deed be declared false and fraudulent and a cloud upon the title of the corporation, and that Jones be required to tender it into court for cancellation and account for the rent, income, and profits he had received from the property; that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the property and account to the court for the rents, income, and profits pending a reorganization of the order, and, when it was duly reorganized, that the funds be turned over to it to be used for its legitimate objects and purposes. It was further prayed that the defendant members of the order be required to account to it for the purchase money received by them from Jones, and that the same be decreed to be the assets of the corporation "free from any claim whatever on the part of the said John F. Jones or of the said other defendants." Jones was never served with a copy of the petition or process, and did not appear and plead. General and special demurrers were filed in the name of the other parties who were named as defendants, and the court passed an order that "the demurrer is sustained to the petition, with the individual members as parties, with the right to amend on or before June 8, 1907," on which date another order was passed providing that the privilege to amend was extended to June 15, 1907, on which date an amendment was filed by the plaintiffs striking the names of the individual members of the order as plaintiffs, after which general and special demurrers were filed; and to the order of the court sustaining the general demurrer and dismissing the petition the plaintiff excepted.

Oliver & Oliver, for plaintiffs in error.
Cann, Barrow & McIntire, for defendants in error.

HOLDEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The petition does not show on its face that the suit in the name of the corporation was unauthorized by those duly empowered by the corporation to institute suit in its behalf. The presumption is that the attorney at law who signed the petition as counsel for the corporation had the authority of the proper officers of the corporation to appear and bring such suit; and this presumption can only be overcome in the manner provided for in Civ. Code, § 4423. Peoples' Mutual Fire Ins. Co. v. De Loach, 113 Ga. 802, 39 S. E. 466; Lester v. McIntosh, 101 Ga. 675, 29 S. E. 7; Dobbins v. Dupree, 36 Ga. 108.

The suit was instituted by the corporation against certain of its members and an alleged purchaser of its property from the latter, charging that for the reasons stated the sale was fraudulent and made without authority, and praying that the deed be canceled and a receiver appointed to take charge of the property and hold its income and profits for the benefit of the corporation, and that the purchaser account to the corporation for the income and profits he had received therefrom, and also praying that the defendant members of the corporation be required to account to it for the purchase money received by them for the property, and that the same be decreed to be assets of the corporation free from any claim of the purchaser or of the other defendants who had appropriated the same to their own use. The corporation could not have the deed canceled, the property placed in the hands of a receiver, and the income and rents thereof paid to the corporation, and also recover from the defendant members of the corporation the purchase money paid to them. A suit to cancel a deed and recover the rents, income, and profits of the property would be a repudiation of the alleged illegal sale; while a suit to recover the proceeds of such sale from the defendants to whom they were paid would be a ratification of the alleged illegal sale, and the remedies sought in the two instances are inconsistent. This, however, does not make the petition subject to general demurrer. The fact that the purchaser was not served with the petition and process, and did not appear and plead, might be sufficient to prevent a cancellation of the deed and the granting of other relief based on a repudiation of the sale, to the granting of which the purchaser would be a necessary party to the case; but such fact would not afford a ground to dismiss the petition on general demurrer, as the allegations of the petition authorized a recovery by the corporation of the purchase money received by the defendant members thereof, on the theory of a ratification by the corporation of the alleged illegal sale. If the sale made in behalf of the corporation was illegal, and the corporation ratified it, or if it was legal, the defendant members of the corporation receiving and appropriating to their own use the purchase money arising therefrom would be liable in an action by the corporation to account therefor. The court erred in dismissing the petition upon general demurrer.

PARK v. FOGARTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WILLS (§ 733*)—CONSTRUCTION.

From an examination of the entire will under construction (which is set out at length in the statement of facts), it is apparent that the word "estate," appearing in the last clause of the fifth item of the will, was used by the testator as denoting all the residue of his property, both real and personal, after the executor had "wound up the business" of the testator in accordance with the directions contained in the will (which would include the payment of debts and the special legacies named in the seventh item of the will), and that the testamentary scheme was that the executor was to hold intact the entire corpus of such property until the youngest child attained the age of 21 years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1825; Dec. Dig. § 733.*]

2. WILLS (§ 733*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES CREATED.

The eighth item of the will did not make a specific devise of "the residence No. 815 Telfair," mentioned therein to the legatee named in said item by the testator as "my daughter Lizzie," but was a direction that when the time for division provided for in the will arrived, namely, at the majority of the youngest child, such legatee should then receive this residence, at a valuation of $2,500, as a part of her share of the property devised to her. Such legatee was not entitled to the use or possession of, or the income from, the residence until the youngest child arrived at the age of 21 years. Jordan v. Miller, 47 Ga. 346.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1825; Dec. Dig. § 733.*]

3. WILLS (§ 733*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES CREATED.

Until the time for distribution arrived, the residence referred to in the preceding headnote would be a part of the general property of the estate of the testator, and the income therefrom belongs to the estate, subject to administration by the executor in accordance with the terms of the will in the same manner as the income from other property of the estate.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by D. G. Fogarty, executor of Patrick D. Horkan, and others, against E. H. Park. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This case arises on a petition filed by the executor for direction as to the construction to be placed upon the will of his testator. In an agreed statement of facts, used upon the hearing before the judge to whom the case was submitted, the following facts are set forth: "(1) The testator's will was drawn by himself. (2) That testator died August 19, 1906, leaving as his sole heirs at law the following children: Elizabeth (styled Lizzie in his will), then aged 21 years, William, then aged 19 years, George, then aged 12 years, and Tom, his youngest child, then aged about 10 years. (3) That none of these children was then married, and that they all lived with their father at 813 Telfair street, Augusta, Ga.; their aunt, Miss Marie Molony, residing with the family and assisting testator's daughter in managing their domestic affairs. (4) That at the time said will was made Miss Elizabeth Horkan was a young lady, just of age, that William Horkan was then a minor, and that Tom and George Horkan were young school boys." It was further agreed "that at the time of the death of P. D. Horkan he conducted, in the city of Augusta, Ga., a large wholesale and retail dry goods store," and "that at the present time, all debts and legacies having been paid, other than legacies to children, the estate is worth approximately $120,000."

The will in question was as follows:

"Know all men by these presents that I, Patrick D. Horkan, in the name of God, and of sound mind and capable of with disposing of my earthly goods, do make this my last will and testament and wish and desire my estate to be disposed of according to the laws of Georgia. It is my wish and desire that all my debts and the debts of P. D. Horkan be paid in full.

"First. It is my wish and desire that all local or city bills be paid at once, and paid out of the receipts of the current business of the store.

"Second. As I owe large amounts to the banks of the city for borrowed money, for the keeping up and enlarging the business of P. D. Horkan & Co., and as the said different banks of the city hold as security for the loans the various stocks and collaterals that I own, it is my desire that they be paid, and the collaterals be taken up and returned to the administrator of my estate; and to enable said administrator to promptly discharge those debts and have said securities returned, I authorize the use of fifty thousand dollars of the life insurance to be issued to cancel those debts. The merchandise debts that the firm of P. D. Horkan & Co. owes to be paid out of the current receipts of the store.

"Third. It is my will and desire that the business run on and be continued not longer than the present leasehold of the store now occupied by P. D. Horkan & Co., and the stock of goods on hand be not sacrificed in bulk, but sold to the best and most favorable advantage. The business to be wound up before October 1st, year 1907. I desire that Sam P. Thomas be continued as head clerk in charge, as he is most familiar with the trade and customers, and whose integrity I regard highly. The administrator can buy for cash such goods and domestics, thread and any other that is necessary to do; keeping intact and in healthy condition the general assortment, but no other merchandise is to be bought.

"Fourth. I appoint and designate D. G. Fogarty administrator of my estate, and the said D. G. Fogarty and Miss Maria Mollony, my beloved sister in law, guardians for my children.

"Fifth. When my business is wound up, the amount of money on hand to be placed at interest, or invested in real estate until Thomas my youngest child is of legal age, and then the estate to be equally divided between the survivors of my children, share and share alike.

"Sixth. The amount of my life insurance I desire collected, and as far as can be possible in the judgment of the administrator to be kept together intact for investment. The amount is one hundred thousand dollars, carried in the following societies: Catholic Knights, Equitable Life, Mutual of New York, Mutual of N. J., New York Life, Northwestern of Milwaukee. The administrator can use one-half of this to pay off the banks my debts and take up the collaterals that they hold. The last two policies in the Equitable Life I desire to be reserved and not used. The stock of merchandise and accounts are large, and I desire all the debts to be paid out of the business.

"Seventh. I desire that my administrator be required to give no bond for his carrying my desires and the articles of this will and testament. I desire that Miss Mollony receive one thousand dollars of my estate for her kind services to my children. I desire the pastor of St. Patrick's Church to receive one hundred dollars for masses for my soul, and my remains be placed right beside those of my beloved departed wife.

"Eighth. It is my desire that the residence No. 815 Telfair be given to my daughter Lizzie, as part of her portion of my estate and same to be taken at $2500.00. The present residence 813 Telfair which was owned by my departed wife, I desire to be used jointly and in common by my family until Thomas is of age, and then to be disposed of as my children regard best for them.

"Ninth. I will and desire that my sister-in-law, Miss Mollony be made guardian jointly with D. G. Fogarty, both to see that George and Tom are well educated out of their share of the income from estate. That all of them shall be allowed the income to live on that is received or derived from net income.

"Tenth. I desire all my debts paid as soon as possible out of sales from the merchandise and accounts now on hand.

"Eleventh. It is my desire that my son William assist D. G. Fogarty all he can to make a successful sale of the stock of merchandise now on hand.

"Twelfth. It is my desire, when the debts are all paid off, that the administrator take back from banks the collaterals and in his judgment hold or sell, any of the stocks for reinvestment that he regards best. I desire that all investments or money invested shall be put in real estate as far as possible, and that my estate shall be managed according to the laws of the state of Georgia. Signed this the sixth day of March, nineteen hundred and six. 6th March, 1906.

"Patrick D. Horkan."

It was the contention of the plaintiff in error that, under the fifth item of the will, only the cash money which the executor had on hand after winding up the business of the testator as directed by the will was to constitute "the estate" which was to be divided among the survivors of the testator's children when the youngest child became of legal age, and that she was entitled to receive from the executor her share of the remaining property of the estate. She also contended that, under the eighth item of the will, the residence therein mentioned was a specific legacy to her and became her property in fee simple, that she was entitled to its immediate use and enjoyment and to the income therefrom from the death of the testator, and that such income was not subject to distribution by the executor as general income of the estate. The court below rendered a decree holding adversely to each of these contentions, the effect of the decree being to adjudge that a proper construction of the will was that the plaintiff in error was to receive none of the corpus of the estate until the youngest child became of age; that until then the residence property remained a part of the corpus of the estate; and that the income therefrom was subject to equal distribution to all the children of the testator along with other income of the estate. To this decree the plaintiff in error excepted, making assignments of error thereon which raised the contentions above stated.

RONEY v. CRAWFORD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1910.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 228*)—ACTION BY TRUSTEE ON SUBSCRIPTION TO STOCK.

In a suit by a trustee in bankruptcy of a corporation to recover of a subscriber to the capital stock the balance due on his subscription contract, the subscriber is not entitled to a credit of dividends unless such dividends had been earned by the corporation when declared. The instructions of the court on this subject were in accord with the principles enunciated in this case when before this court on a former occasion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

2. LOTTERIES (§ 15*)—SUBSCRIPTION TO STOCK—RIGHT OF RECOVERY.

The bankrupt corporation was a debenture company, and its creditors were those who had purchased its certificates. The defendant pleaded, in bar of the suit to recover an unpaid stock subscription, that the business of the debenture company was a lottery forbidden by law, and that its debenture holders were in pari delicto, and the suit could not be maintained for their benefit by the trustee in bankruptcy. Held, the lottery statutes (Pen. Code 1895, §§ 406, 408) make penal the selling of lottery tickets, and not their purchase. Assuming the business of the debenture company to come within the operation of the lottery statutes, yet under the allegations of the plea and the evidence the investors in the certificates, who did not participate in the management and operation of the company, would not be in pari delicto with the company so as to defeat a recovery of money invested in the enterprise.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by T. C. Crawford, trustee in bankruptcy of the Augusta Debenture Company, Limited, against H. C. Roney. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error; plaintiff filing cross-exceptions. Affirmed.

Jos. B. Cumming and C. H. & Rodney Cohen, for plaintiff in error. Wm. H. Barrett, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The action is by T. C. Crawford, trustee in bankruptcy of the Augusta Debenture Company, Limited, against H. C. Roney, to recover a balance due on a stock subscription. The case has been twice before considered by this court. 126 Ga. 763, 55 S. E. 499; 130 Ga. 515, 61 S. E. 117. In the former trials the defendant contended that the company had earned and declared dividends on his stock sufficient to discharge all liability on his subscription contract, except the sum of $56.32, which he offered to pay. At the last trial the defendant amended his plea by alleging that the business engaged in by the debenture company was a lottery scheme, calculated to defraud, contrary to public policy, and prohibited under the laws of the state; that the company issued certain debenture certificates of the forms attached to the plea, and when the company failed there were no creditors other than holders of debentures; and that the suit is proceeding solely in the interest of such debenture holders. The court refused to strike this amendment on demurrer, and submitted this phase of the case on the theory that if the business of the debenture company was that of a lottery the debenture holders were in pari delicto. Exceptions are taken to his instructions and refusals to charge on this subject. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant moved for a new trial, which being refused he brings error.

1. The court instructed the jury that the defendant would not be entitled to the stock-dividend credit unless the dividend had been actually earned at the time it was declared, and that dividends on corporate stock can only be declared and paid out of net profits, and refused to instruct them that, if the dividend was declared by the directors in good faith and received by the stockholders in the belief that the same had been paid out of the profits, the defendant would be entitled to a credit for such dividend upon his stock subscription; even though such dividend was paid out of the capital stock. The charge of the court was in accord with the principles enunciated in the case in 130 Ga. 515, 61 S. E. 117. In that report the evidence submitted by the plaintiff to show that the dividend claimed by the subscriber had not been actually earned was examined and held sufficient to carry the case to the jury on that issue. The same evidence was produced upon the second trial, and is sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury, which was adverse to the defendant.

2. According to the averments of the amended plea, it is contended that the present suit is an effort to collect assets of a bankrupt corporation, who was engaged in the business of a lottery for the purpose of reimbursing the debenture or lottery-ticket holders. The plea is projected upon the theory that the debenture holders and the debenture company are in pari delicto. It is a general rule of universal application that courts of justice will not allow one in pari delicto to enforce an executory contract, or recover back amounts paid upon an illegal contract. For the purpose of determining the merits of the defense set up in the amended plea, we will assume that the corporation was engaged in a lottery scheme as alleged in the plea. Let it be observed, however, that the action by the trustee in bankruptcy is not to recover money to pay any prize, but to collect the unpaid stock subscriptions as assets of the bankrupt corporation for the purpose of paying such claims as are legally chargeable against the bankrupt's estate. Lotteries have ever been deemed as contrary to public policy, but the keepers of lotteries were not denounced as criminals by the common law. The rule of pari delictum, which finds expression in the maxims, "ex turpi causa non oritur actio," and "in pari delicto melior est conditio defendentis," forbids a suit upon an illegal contract where both parties knowingly and intentionally engage in the illegal act. But there are exceptions to the general rule, which have been recognized by the courts from the earliest times. One of these exceptions or limitations grows out of the nature of the particular transaction, and is thus expressed by Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, in a comparatively recent English case, "You cannot ask the aid of a court of justice to carry out an illegal contract; but in cases where the contract is actually at an end, or is put an end to, the court will interfere to prevent those who have, under the illegal contract, obtained money belonging to other persons on the representation that the contract was legal, from keeping that money." Sykes v. Beadon, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 170, 193. The reason for this rule is thus stated in 2 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 842: "When the contract is illegal, so that both parties are to some extent involved in the illegality, but are not in pari delicto—that is, both have not, with the same knowledge, willingness, and wrongful intent, engaged in the transaction, or the undertakings of each are not equally blameworthy—a court of equity may, in furtherance of justice and of a sound public policy, aid the one who is comparatively the more innocent, and may grant him full affirmative relief, by canceling an executory contract, by setting aside an executed contract, conveyance, or transfer, by recovering back money paid or property delivered, as the circumstances of the case shall require."

In the charter of the debenture company there was no suggestion that a lottery business was intended. The various certificates issued by it contained very alluring inducements to the investor, and were calculated to appeal very strongly to the cupidity of those uninitiated in the intricacies of modern finance. Our Penal Code denounces as criminal the sale of anything representing a chance in a lottery, gift enterprise, or other similar scheme or device; but no penalty is imposed upon the purchaser of a chance in any lottery scheme. Pen. Code 1895, §§ 406-408. If the debenture company was really engaged in a lottery scheme, then it would be guilty of a misdemeanor in the conduct of such business; but those who did nothing more than purchase debenture certificates would not be affected with the corporation's criminality. The lottery acts of 14 George III, c. 76, forbade the insurance of lottery tickets. It was held in Jaques v. Golightly, 2 Wm. Bl. 1073, that money paid as a premium for insuring lottery tickets may be recovered back, though the winnings, if any, cannot be recovered, the contract being void by the statute; and the Chief Justice is reported to have said: "The statute is made to protect the ignorant and deluded multitude who, in hopes of gain and prize, and not conversant in calculations, are drawn in by the office keepers." In Mount v. Waite, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 434, which was an action to recover money which the plaintiff had paid to the defendant for insuring lottery tickets, Chancellor Kent said: "The plaintiffs here committed no crime in making the contract. They violated no statute, nor was the contract malum in se. I think, therefore, the maxim as to parties in pari delicto does not apply, for the plaintiffs were not in delicto." And this rule has been very generally followed by the American courts. Becker v. Wilcox, 81 Neb. 476, 116 N. W. 160, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 571, 129 Am. St. Rep. 690, and cases cited in the notes; also, authorities cited in the opinion of Lumpkin, J., when on the trial bench, which will be found in the case of Equitable Loan & Security Co. v. Waring, 117 Ga., at page 632, 44 S. E., at page 320, 62 L. R. A. 98, 97 Am. St. Rep. 177. There is nothing in the pleading or the evidence which charges that the debenture holders actively participated in the furtherance of the business of the defendant. They were simply purchasers of certificates from the debenture company, and did not participate in the management of the corporation's affairs. So that it becomes immaterial to decide whether the particular business in which the debenture company was engaged was that of a lottery, inasmuch as, under the allegations in the pleadings and under the proof submitted, the debenture holders were not in pari delicto with the debenture company, even if it be conceded that the debenture company conducted a lottery, which is not decided. The court gave the defendant the benefit of a defense to which he was not entitled; and he has no cause of complaint as to the accuracy of instructions in the submission of that defense, when such instructions were not calculated to injuriously affect his other defense. The charge on the burden of proof was not erroneous.

The case was fairly tried on the real issue, under appropriate instructions, and the judgment refusing a new trial is affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Irvin Alexander and Hugh Alexander against the City Council of Augusta and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Irvin Alexander and Hugh Alexander instituted suit to enjoin the city council of Augusta and its agents, J. J. Twiggs and J. D. McGee, from the commission of alleged acts of trespass in taking and removing certain trees and earth from the land of plaintiffs, and prayed for other relief. The defendants, in answer, alleged a right in the city to take the property under the power of eminent domain, as conferred by and in conformity with the provisions of the act approved December 27, 1845 (Acts 1845, p. 138), incorporating the Augusta Canal Company, as amended by the act approved December 19, 1849 (Acts 1849-50 p. 85). The object of the Augusta Canal Company, as declared in the act of incorporation, was to "provide for the construction of a canal for manufacturing purposes and for the better securing an abundant supply of water for the city" of Augusta. The provisions of the act which related to the manner of obtaining a location for the construction of the canal were contained in sections 5 and 6, as follows:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that in case the line of said canal, or the raceways, wasteways, or towpath therewith connected, shall pass through the lands of any person or persons with whom the present commissioners, or their successors, or the future managers of said canal, hereafter to be elected, as provided in the second section of this act, have not made or cannot make a satisfactory agreement as to the terms upon which the same may be extended over or through such lands, the said commissioners, or their successors, or the said managers, as the case may be, shall nevertheless have the right to establish, open and construct the said canal, raceways, waterways, (wasteways) and towpaths through and over the same, and that the damages, if any, sustained by the proprietor or proprietors of such lands shall be ascertained and assessed by five appraisers, of whom two shall be nominated by said commissioners or managers, two by such proprietor or proprietors and the fifth by the four so nominated, whose award, or that of a majority of them, certified in writing under their hands and seals, in duplicate, one part for each of the parties in interest, shall be recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county in which such lands are situated; and if not appealed from, as hereinafter provided, shall operate as, and have the force and effect of, a judgment vesting in said company the right of way over and through such lands; upon which award, so recorded, and not appealed from, if any sum is thereby awarded as damages to said proprietor or proprietors, the said clerk shall, after the expiration of thirty days from the time of the record thereof, issue execution for the same, under the usual form of executions founded upon judgment of the court, returnable to the next superior court of said county, which after execution may be levied on any property of the company, either real or personal. But in case either of the parties should be dissatisfied with the decision or award of the said appraisers, such dissatisfied party or parties may, within ten days after the recording of the same, exercise his, her, or their right of appeal, by making known his, her or their intention, by a written notice served upon the adverse party, and upon the said clerk, whose duty it shall be thereupon to suspend the issue of execution, and enter a memorandum of such appeal on the appeal docket of his court, to be tried by a special jury at the next term, which trial shall be final, vesting in the company the said right of way, and, in case of damages, entitling the person for whom they are found to a judgment and execution therefor. Provided, that the appraisers hereinbefore mentioned, before entering upon the discharge of their duties as such (shall) severally take and subscribe an oath before some judicial officer of the State, well and truly and impartially to determine and award in the premises.

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that in case it should be necessary, in the further construction or further extension, deepening, or widening of said canal, or its raceways, wasteways, or other improvements or works therewith connected, to use any earth, clay, stone, gravel, or other materials, on or near the line of said canal or other works, and the said commissioners or managers and the proprietor or proprietors of the land from which such earth, clay, stone, gravel, or other materials are to be taken, cannot agree upon the terms on which the same may be procured for the purposes aforesaid, it shall nevertheless be lawful for said commissioners or managers to take and use the same, and the damages, if any, shall be assessed, the right of appeal, if desired, exercised, and the ultimate award or judgment shall be enforced as provided in the preceding section of this act, in relation to the right of way, and assessment and collection of damages awarded by the appraisers, or found by a special jury on appeal. Provided, that no difference or disagreement between the said company and any landholders shall be a ground for injunction against said commissioners, managers, or company, or otherwise suspend or impede any of the works contemplated in this or the preceding section of this act, which shall proceed without delay or interruption, upon the said commissioners, managers, or company tendered to such landholders sufficient security for the payment of such damages as may be assessed or found for him as aforesaid; upon the sufficiency of which said security the judge to whom application may be made shall decide, and who, if he deems the same insufficient, shall require other or additional security to be offered within three days; on the failure or refusal to give which, an injunction may issue; but any injunction granted against said commissioners, managers, or company shall be dissolved so soon as such security as the judge of the superior court of the Middle district of this State may deem sufficient shall have been given by said commissioners, managers or company."

The act of 1849 was an act to amend several acts in relation to the city of Augusta, and to amend the act passed on December 27, 1845, to incorporate the Augusta Canal Company. It provided that, upon being authorized by a vote of the stockholders in said company, the corporation should "be authorized to sell, transfer, and convey to the city council of Augusta the canal, its appurtenances, and all other property and effects belonging to said company, upon such terms and stipulations as may be agreed upon," and that "upon such purchase and conveyance the city council of Augusta shall be vested with all the power, authority and privileges conferred on said company by the act incorporating it, and shall be subject to all the liabilities therein prescribed." The act further provided: "That, in case of such purchase and conveyance, the corporate power and authority of the city council of Augusta shall be extended over, upon, and for one hundred feet on each side of the said canal, through its whole extent, and to Stalling's island above Bull sluice in Savannah river, so far as to allow the said city council to pass all ordinances and perform all acts necessary to the use of said canal, and the protection of it and its appurtenances from injury. And be it further enacted, that if the city council of Augusta shall at any time hereafter deem it advisable to sell and transfer the said canal and its appurtenances to any individual or individuals, the shall be authorized to do so by ordinance passed by them for that purpose; and thereupon the purchaser or purchasers from them shall be vested with all the powers and privileges and subject to all the liabilities specified in the act incorporating the Augusta Canal Company." The judge refused the injunction, and the plaintiffs excepted.

ATKINSON, J. 1. The record discloses that the material taken from the land was intended to be used in making repairs to the Augusta Canal. It was urged that the power of eminent domain conferred by the act of 1845, as amended by the act of 1849, properly construed, did not extend to the right to take material for repair work, but was restricted to taking it for work of original construction. In making this contention counsel referred to certain language contained in section 6 of the act of 1845, which declared that the power of eminent domain might be exercised for the purpose of obtaining certain material necessary to be used in "the further construction, future extension, deepening, or widening of said canal, or whatever raceways, wasteways, or other improvements, or works connected therewith," and asserted that the repairs to the banks of the canal more than 50 years after the construction thereof was not contemplated. This construction of the act is too narrow. One of the declared objects intended to be accomplished by the construction of the canal was the better securing of an abundant supply of water for the city. The matter of creating and maintaining the canal was a thing to be accomplished by artificial means. The nature of the artificial waterway was not such as that when once constructed it would remain so permanently. On the contrary, it was such that natural agencies would tend to its destruction, and the object to be accomplished would fail unless the work of maintenance were kept in progress. As to such an enterprise, the work of construction would never be at an end. Considered in the light of the subject-matter which the Legislature had under consideration, the words "further construction," as contained in the act of 1845, should be construed as referring to repair work as well as work of original construction.

2. It was contended that in so far as the act of 1845, set forth in the statement of facts, incorporating the Augusta Canal Company, as amended by the act of 1849, authorized the exercise of the power of eminent domain, it was repealed and superseded by article 1, § 3, par. 1, of the Constitution of 1877 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5729), which declared that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public purposes without just and adequate compensation being first paid"; also, that it was superseded by the act approved December 18, 1894 (Acts 1894, p. 35), "to provide a uniform method of exercising the right of condemning or taking private property," as now contained in Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4657-4686, inclusive. The act of 1845, above mentioned, properly construed, authorized the taking of property before actual payment of damages to the landowner. The Constitution of 1877, supra, forbade it. By article 12, § 1, pars. 3 and 4, of the Constitution of 1877 (Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5934, 5935), existing laws not in conflict with the Constitution of the state, or with the supreme law of the land, were preserved; but there was no provision for saving existing laws which were repugnant to the Constitution. The Legislature provided in the act of 1845 that property might be taken before actual payment of damages to the landowner, and the provision in the Constitution of 1877, which declared that private property should not be taken without compensation being first paid, were inconsistent, and the latter repealed so much of the former as authorized the taking of property without first making payment of the damages incurred. The act of 1894, supra, was a general law, and provided different procedure from that prescribed by the act of 1845 for taking property under the exercise of the power of eminent domain. This general law did not specifically name the act of 1845, but it was so comprehensive as to make it apparent that the general law was intended to repeal all existing legislation, local as well as general, in regard to the method of exercising the power of eminent domain. Where such intention exists, a general law will repeal a local law, though it is not specially named. Crovatt v. Mason, 101 Ga. 252, 28 S. E. 891. The general law did not purport to confer upon any corporation the right to exercise the right of eminent domain, but only to provide in what manner corporations having the right to exercise the power might exercise it. Georgia Railroad Co. v. Union Point, 119 Ga. 809, 47 S. E. 183; Georgia Railroad Co. v. Decatur, 129 Ga. 502, 59 S. E. 217.

In so far as the act of 1845 provided a different method of exercising the right of eminent domain from that prescribed in the act of 1894, it was superseded by the latter act. Hence, by giving effect to the Constitution of 1877, in the manner above indicated, and to the act of 1894, the act of 1845, as amended by the act of 1849, was superseded in so far as it authorized the taking of private property under the power of eminent domain without first paying the damages, and in so far as it authorized the taking of such property under condemnation proceedings different from those specified in the act of 1894. In support of the contrary view, it was argued that under the doctrine of the Dartmouth College Case, as recognized and applied in the case of Gardner v. Georgia Railroad & Banking Co., 117 Ga. 522, 43

S. E. 863, the city acquired, under the act of 1845, rights which could not be taken away. Article 1, § 3, par. 1, of the Constitution of 1877 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5729), requiring the payment of damages before the taking of property under the power of eminent domain, and the act of 1894, which prescribes the procedure under which property may be taken for private purposes, should not be so applied as to work an impairment of any contract or destroy any vested right acquired under the act of 1845. The Constitution expressly prohibits such application. Article 4, § 1, par. 6 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5902); article 12, § 1, par. 5 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5936). But neither the Constitution nor the act referred to had such effect. The former allowed the power of eminent domain to be exercised, but only provided that damages should be paid before the property could be taken. The latter merely provided a different method of taking property under the power of eminent domain by persons having the right to exercise it. These changes in the law were remedial in character, and did not impair any contract or impair any vested right under the doctrine of the Dartmouth College Case. The case differs from Gardner v. Georgia Railroad & Banking Co., 117 Ga. 522, 43 S. E. 863. That case involved the act approved December 14, 1835, amending the charter of a railroad corporation, wherein it was expressly declared that under the power of eminent domain the decision rendered in the condemnation proceedings provided for "shall vest in the company the fee simple of the land in question." Laws Ga. 1835, p. 228, § 15. In the case cited it was said in the opinion that under the act of 1894, providing a method of taking property, etc., only an easement in the property could be acquired, and that there was a substantial difference between such an estate and the fee simple which could be acquired under the act of 1835, supra; and thereupon it was declared that, in so far as the act of 1894 was inconsistent with the exercise of the charter rights specified in the act of 1835, it had no application to the defendant company. The act of 1894 does not declare that the only interest in the property appropriated under its provisions which would pass to the person exercising the power of eminent domain would be an easement; but its language relative to that matter is: "Such an interest in the property taken as may be necessary to enable the corporation or person taking to exercise their franchise or conduct their business; and whenever the person or corporation shall cease using the property taken for conducting their business, the said property shall revert to the person from whom taken, his heirs or assigns." Under this language any interest might be taken which would be necessary to a proper exercise of the franchise or conducting of the business. The necessities of the franchise might require an absolute conversion of the property, such as earth taken for the construction of railroad beds, etc. The act of 1845, as amended by the act of 1849, being the act involved in the present case, did not declare in express language that the judgment in the condemnation proceedings provided for therein should vest the fee to the property in the person exercising the power of eminent domain. It merely declared that the trial should be final, "vesting in the company the said right of way." It did no more than authorize the taking of property for specified purposes, which, in effect, limited the use of the property to the purposes specified, so that the person taking acquired such interest therein, but no greater or less interest than was necessary for the enjoyment of the franchise. This was in keeping with the general rule that in condemnation proceedings corporations acquire only such interest in the property taken as may be necessary for the enjoyment of the franchise. Whatever might have been the difference in the character of the estate acquired when the property was taken under the act of 1835 from that when acquired under the general law of 1894, the same difference did not exist where the property was taken under the provisions of the charter of the Augusta Canal Company, as granted by the act of 1845 and amended by the act of 1849. In the latter case the interest acquired would be substantially the same as that which could be acquired if the property were taken under the general law of 1894. It thus appears that the Constitution did not deprive the corporation of its right to exercise the power of eminent domain, and that the act of 1894 did not restrict the character of the estate which, under the provisions of the act of 1845, the corporation could have acquired in the property taken under the power of eminent domain. The substantial rights were unaffected. The provisions of the former act relative to proceedings by which property might be taken were not subject-matter of substantial right in the party undertaking to condemn.
